Ecdemus and Demophanes, two Philosophers.

Philopamen the last famous man of Greece.

for his whole image is yet to be seene in the city of DELPHES, excellently well done, as if he were alive. And for that they report of his hostesse in the city of MEGARA, who tooke him for a serving man: that was by reason of his curtesie, not standing vpon his reputation, and bicause he went plainly besides. For the vnderstanding that the Generall of the ACHAIANS came to Inne there all night, he besturred her, and was very busie preparing for his supper, her husband peradventure being from home at that time: and in the meane season came Philopemen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his backe. The simple woman seeinge him no better apparelled, tooke him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging, and so prayed him to lende her his hande in the kitchen. He straight cast off his cloke, and beganne to fall to hewe wodde. So, as Philopemen was busie about it, in commeth her husband, and findinge him riuinge of wodde: ha ha ha, sayd he, my Lorde Philopemen, why what meaneth this? Truly nothing else, sayd he in his DORICAN tongue, but that I am punished, bicause I am neither fayer boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintus Flaminius sayed one day vnto him, seeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philopemen, thou hast fayer handes, and good legges, but thou hast nobelly, for he was fine in the waite, and small bodied. Notwithstandinge, I take it this ieaftinge tended rather to the proportion of his army, then of his body: bicause he had both good horsemen, and footemen, but he was often without money to pay them. These geastes, schollers haue taken vppe in schooles, of Philopemen. But now to discend to his nature and conditions: it seemeth that the ambition and desire he had to winne honor in his doings, was not without some heate and wilfulness. For, bicause he would altogether followe Epaminondas steppes, he shewed his hardines to enterprise any thing, his wilde come to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no money could corrupt him: but in ciuill matters and controuersies, he could hardly otherwhiles keepe him selfe within the bondes of modesty, patience, and curtesie, but would often burst out into choller, and wilfulness. Wherefore it seemeth, that he was a better Captaine for warres, then a wise gouernor for peace. And in deede, euen from his youth he euer loued fouldiers, and armes, and delighted maruclously in all martiall exercises: as in handling of his weapon well, riding of horses gallantly, and in vawting nimble. And bicause he seemed to haue a naturall gift in wrestling, certaine of his frendes, and such as were carefull of him, did wishe him to geue him selfe most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made such profession, would be no hinderance to their martiall exercises. Aunswere was made him againe, that the disposition of the persone, and manner of life that wrestlers vsed, and such as followed like exercises, was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a fouldier, and specially touching life and limme. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe them selues in good plight, by much sleeping, eating, and drinking, by laboring, and taking their ease at certaine howers, by not murthering a iotte of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to loose the force and strength of their body, if they did surfit neuer so litle, or passed their ordinary course & rule of diet. Where fouldiers contrariwise are vsed to all change, and diuersitie of life, and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnesse, and scarfity, and to watche in the night without sleepe. Philopemen hearing this, did not only forsake those exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards beinge Generall of an army, he fought by all infamous meanes he could to put downe all wrestling, and such kinde of exercise, which made mennes bodies vnmeet to take paines, and to become fouldiers for to fight in defence of their contry, that otherwise would haue bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his booke and schoolemasters, and beganne to weare armor in inuasions the MANTINEANS vsed to make vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get some spoyle on a fodaine, or to destroy a parte of their contry: Philopemen then would euer be the foremost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leasure, he vsed much hunting in time of peace, all to acquainte his body with toyle and trauell, or else he would be digging of his groundes. For he had a fayne mannor, not passinge twenty furlonges out of the city, whether he would walke commonly after dinner or supper, and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lye vpon some ill fauored matresse, as the meanest laborer he had, and in the morninge by breake of the day, he went out with his vine men to labor in his vineyard, or else with his plough men to follow the plough, and

A and sometimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his frendes and other officers of the same. Whatsoeuer he could spare and get in the warres, he spent it in buying of goodly horses, in makinge of fayer armors, or payinge his poore contry mens ranfome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goodes & reuenue, he sought only to increase them, by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the iustest and best way of getting of goodes. For he did not trifle therein, but employed his whole care and study upon it, as one that thought it fit for euery noble man & gentleman so to trauaill, gouerne, and increase his owne, that he should haue no occasion to couet or vsurpe another mannes. He tooke no pleasure to heare all kinde of matters, nor to read all sortes of bookes of Philosophy: but thole onely that would teache him most to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to read Homers workes, sauinge those places onely that stirred vp mens hartes most vnto valliantnes. But of all other hories, he specially delighted to read Euangelus bookes, which treated of the discipline of warres, how to set battells, and declared the actes and geastes of Alexander the great, sayinge: that men shoulde euer bringe his wordes vnto deedes, onlesse men would take them for vaine stories, and things spoken, but not to profit by. For in his bookes of the feates of warre, and how battells shoulde be ordered, he was not only contented to see them drawn and set out, in cartes and mappes: but would also put them in execution, in the places them selues as they were set out. And therefore, when the army marched in order of battell in the field, he would consider and study with him selfe, the fodaine vientes and approaches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they comming downe to the valley, or going out of a plaine, were to passe a riuer or a ditche, or through some straight: also when he shoulde spread out his army, or else gather it narrow: and this he did not only forecast by him selfe, but would also argue the same with the Captaines that were about him. For Philopemen doubtlesse was one of the odde men of the worlde, that most esteemed the discipline of warre, (and sometime peradventure more then he needed) as the most large field and most fruitfull ground that valliantnes could be exercised in: so that he despised & contemned all that were no fouldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes kinge of LACEDÆMON, came one night vpon the fodaine, and gaue an assault to the city of MEGALOPOLIS, so lustely, that he draue backe the watche and got into the market place, and wanne it. Philopemen hearinge of it, ranne immediatly to the rescue. Nevertheless, though he fought very valliantly, and did like a noble fouldier, yet he could not repulse the enemies, nor driue them out of the city. But by this meanes he got his citizens leasure, and some time to get them out of the towne to saue them selues, stayinge those that followed them: and made Cleomenes still waite vpon him, so that in the end he had much ado to saue him selfe beinge the last man, and very fore hurt, & his horse also slaine vnder him. Shortly after, Cleomenes beinge aduertised that the MEGALOPOLITANS were gotten into the city of MESSINA, sent vnto them to let them vnderstand, that he was ready to deliuer them their city, lands, & goods againe. But Philopemen seeinge his contrymen very glad of these newes, & that euery man prepared to returne againe in haste: he stayd them with these perswasions, shewing them that Cleomenes deulfe was not to redeliuer the city, but rather to take the together with their city: foreseeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keepe naked walles and empty houses, and that him selfe in the ende should be compelled to goe his way. This perswasion stayed the MEGALOPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occasion to burne and plucke downe a great parte of the city, and to carry away a great summe of money, and a great spoyle. Afterwardes, when kinge Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIANS against Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the toppe of the mountaines of Sellasia, and kept all the passages and wayes vnto them out of all those quarters: kinge Antigonus set his army in battell hard by him, determining to set vpon him, and to driue him thence if he could possibly. Philopemen was at that time amongst the horsemen with his citizens, who had the LEUCANS on the side of them, beinge a great number of footemen & excellent good fouldiers, which did shut in the taile of all the army. So they were commaunded to stand still, and to keepe their place, vntill such time as they did shew them a redde coate of armes on the toppe of a pyke, or place, from the other wing of the battell, where the king him selfe stoode in person. ding this straight commaundement, the Captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to see if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAÏANS contrariwise, kept their place and order, as they were commaunded. Eucledas, Cleomenes brother, perceiving thus their enemies footemen were feuered from their horsemen, sodainly sent the lightest armed souldiers & lustiest fellows he had in his bands, to geue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behinde, to proue if they could make them turne their faces on them, because they had no horsemen for their garde. This was done, and these light armed men did maruelously trouble and disorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopomen perceiving that, and considering howe these light armed men would be easily broken and driuen backe, since occasion selfe enforced them to it: he went to tell the kings Captaines of it, that led his men of armes. But when he saw he could not make them vnderstand it, and that they made no reckening of his reasons, but tooke him of no skill, because he had not yet attained any credit or estimation to be iudged a man, that could inuent or execute any stratageme of warre: he went thither him selfe, and tooke his citizens with him. And at his first comming, he troubled these light armed men, that he made them flee, and slue a number of them. Moreover, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them geue a lusty charge vpon the enemies, whilest they were thus troubled and out of order: he left his horse, and marched a foote vpon hill and downe hill, in rough and stony wayes, full of springs and quauemyres, being heauely armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fightinge in this sorte very painefullly and vneasily, he had both his thighs past through with a dart, hauinge a leather thonge on the middle of it. And though the blow did not take much holde of the fleshe, yet was it a stronge blow, for it pierced both thighs through & through, that the iron was seene on thother side. Then was he so combered with this blow, as if he had bene shackled with irons on his feete, and knew not what to doe: for the leather fastened in the middle of the dart, did greue him maruelously, when they thought to haue pulled the darte out of the place where it entred in, so as neuer a man about him durst feele his hands to it. Philopomen on the other side, seeing the sight terrible on either side, and would soone be ended: it spited him to the guttes, he would so faime haue bene among them. So at the length he made such struggling, putting backe one thigh, and setting forward an other, that he knapped the staffe of the darte a funder, and made them pull out the two troncheons, the one on this side, and the other on the other side. Then when he saw he was at liberty againe, he tooke his sword in his hande, and ranne through the middle of them that fought, vnto the foremost ranckes, to meete with the enemy: so that he gaue his men a newe corage, and did set them on fyre with enuy, to followe his valliant deede. After the battell was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN Captaines, to proue them: who moued the horsemen to deuide them selues, and giue the charge, before the signe that was commaunded. They aunswered him, that they were forced to doe it against their willes, because a young MEGALOPOLITAN gentleman gaue a charge with his company, before the signe was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played the part of a wife and valliant Captaine. This exployte, together with Antigonus testimony, gaue great reputation vnto Philopomen, as we may easily imagine. So king Antigonus maruelously intreated him he would serue with him, and offered him a bande of men at armes, and great entertainment, if he would go with him. But Philopomen refused his offer, and chiefly, because he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commaunded by any. Notwithstandinge, because he could not be idle, he tooke sea, and went into Creta, where he knewe there were warres, onely to continue him selfe in exercise thereof. So when he had serued long time with the CRETANS, which were valliant souldiers, and very expert in all policies and feates of warre, and moreover were men of a moderate and spare dyet: he returned home againe to ACHAÏA, with so great credit and reputation of euery one, that he was presently chosen Generall of all the horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he found de many horsemen very ill horsed, vpon litle lades, such as might be gotten cheapest, & how they vsed not to goe them selues in persone to the warres, but did sende other in their steade: and to be shorte, how they neither had hartes, nor experience of the warres, and all because the Generalls and Captaines of the people of the ACHAÏANS that serued before him, did take no heed

A to those matters, as feareinge to offend any, because they had the greatest authority in all these thinges, would leaue no parte of his charge and duty vndone, but went him selfe in persone to all the cities, to perswade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horsed, and well armed, that they might winne honor in the fildes, be able to defend them selues, and overthrow their enemies. And where perswasion could doe no good, there he would set fynes vpon their heades that so refused, and did vse to mulster them oft, and did acquaine them with tilting, turning, and barriers, and one to fight with an other, and at such times and places specially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the lookinge on: that in shorte space he made them very forward, proper, and ready horsemen, whose chieftest property, to keepe their order and ranckes in the battell. So as when necessitie serued for the whole company of horsemen to turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or else euery man by him selfe: they were so thoroughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe set in battell ray, did seeme as it were to be but one body, they remoued so together, and withall so easily, and at all times, and so oft, as turne they would on the one side, or on the other. Now in a great battell the ACHAÏANS had with the ÆTOLIANS and the ELIANS, by the riuier of Larissus: Demophantus, Generall of the horsemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to fight with Philopomen, who also made towards him, and gaue him first such a blow with his speare, that he strake him starke deade. When Demophantus fell to the grounde, his souldiers fled by and by vpon it. This wanne Philopomen great honor, who gaue no place to the youngest men in fighting most valliantly with his owne handes: nor to the oldest men in wise dome, for the wise leading of his army. In deede the first man that made the people of ACHAÏA grow in power and greatnes, was Aratus: for before his time ACHAÏA was of small reckening, because the cities of the same stooode deuided betwene them selues, and Aratus was the first manne that made them ioyn together, and stablished amongst them an honest ciuill gouernment. Whereby it happened, that as we see in brookes and riuers where any litle thinge stoppeth and falleth to the bottome, which the course of the water bringeth downe the streame, there the rest that followeth doth vse to stay, and goe no further: euen so in the cities of GRECE that were in harde state, and fore weakened, by faction one against an other, the ACHAÏANS were the first that stayed themselves, and grewe in amity one with the other, and afterwards drew on the rest of the cities into league with them, as good neighbours and confederats. Some by helpinge and deliueringe them from the oppression of tyrans, and winninge other also by their peaceable gouernment and good concord: they had a meaninge in this wise, to bringe all the contrie of PELOPONNESVS into one body and league. Neuertheless, while Aratus liued, they depended most upon the strength and power of the MACEDONIANS: first with stickinge vnto kinge Ptolomie, and then vnto Antigonus, and last to Philip, who ruled in manner all the state of GRECE. But when Philopomen came to gouerne, and to be the chieftest man, the ACHAÏANS beinge stronge enough to resist the strongest, would marche then no more vnder any other bodies ensigne, nor would suffer any more straunge gouernors or Captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it seemed) was somewhat to soft and colde for the warres, and therefore the most thinges he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, and by the kings frendshippes with whome he was great, as we haue at large declared in his life. But Philopomen beinge a manne of execution, hardy and valliant of persone, and of very good fortune, in the first battell that he euer made, did maruelously encrease the corage and hartes of the ACHAÏANS: because vnder his charge they euer foiled their enemies, and alwayes hadde the vpper hande ouer them. The first thinge Philopomen beganne withall at his comming, he chaunged the manner of settinge of their tables, and their facion of arminge them selues. For before they caried litle light targettes, which because they were thinne and narrowe, did not couer halfe their bodies, and vsed speares farre shorter then pykes, by reason whereof they were very light, and good to skirmishe and fight a farre off: but when they came to ioyn battell, their enemies then hadde great vantage of them. As for the order of their battelles, they knewe not what it ment, nor to cast them selues into a snail or ringe, but onely vnto the square battell, nor yet gaue it any such fronte where the pykes of many rankes might puse together, and where the souldiers might stande so close, that their targettes should touch one another, as they do in the Squadron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reason whereof, they were soone broken, and ouerthrowen. Philopemen reformed all this, perswading them to vie the pyke and shielde, in steade of their little target, speare, or borestaffe, and to put good moryrans or burganettes on their heades, corseletes on their bodies, and good rasses and greaues to couer their thighes and legges, that they might fight it out manfully, not geuinge a foote of ground, as light armed men that runne to and fro in a skirmishe. And thus hauinge perswaded and taught the younge men to arme them selues throughlie, first he made them the bolder and more coragious to fight, as if they had bene menne that coule not haue bene overcome: then he turned all their vaine superfluous charge, into necessarie and honest expences. But he coule not possibly bring them altogether from their vaine and riche apparell, they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceede another: nor from their sumptuous furniture of houles, as in beddes, hangings, curious seruice at the table, and delicate kinde of dihes. But to beginne to withdrawe this desire in them which they hadde, to be fine and delicate, in all superfluous and vnecessary things, and to like of things necessarie, and profitable: he wished them to looke more nely to their ordinarie charge about them selues, takinge order as well for their apparell, as also for their diet, and to spare in them, to come honorable armed to the felde, for defence of their contrie. Thereupon, if you had looked into the golde smithes (hoppes, ye should haue seene nothinge else in their handes, but breakinge and batteringe of pottes of golde and siluer, to be cast and molten downe againe, and then gildinge of armors and targettes, and fitting of bittes. In the shoue places for the runninge of horses, there was mannedging and breakinge of younge horses, and younge men exercisinge armes. Womens handes also were full of moryrans and heade peeces, whereto they tyed goodly braue plumes of feathers of sundry colours, and were also full of imbrodered arminge coates and callockes, with curious and very riche workes. The fight of which brauerie did heaue vpp their hartes, and made them gallant and liuely: so as enuy bred straight in them who shoulde doe best seruice, and no way spare for the warres. In deede, sumptuousnesse and brauerie in other sightes, doth secretly cary mens mindes away, and allure them to seeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied, and womanlike perones: bicause this sweete ticklinge, and intinsing of the outwarde fence that is delighted therewith, doth straight melt and soften the strength and courage of the minde. But againe, the sumptuous cost bestowed upon warlike furniture, doth incourage and make great a noble harte. Euen as Homer sayeth it did Achilles, when his mother brought him newe armor and weapons, she hadde caused Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete: who seeinge them, coule not tarie, but was straight sette on fyre with desire to occupie them. So when Philopemen hadde brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good passe, to come thus brauely armed and furnished into the felde, he beganne then to exercise them continuallie in armes: wherein they did not onely shewe them selues obedient to him, but did moreouer strue one to excell another, and to doe better then their fellows. For they liked maruelous well the orderinge of the battell he hadde taught them, bicause that standinge so close together as they did, they thought surely they coule hardly be ouerthrowen. Thus by continuance of time, beinge muche vsed to weare their armor, they founde them a great deale easier and lighter then before, besides the pleasure they tooke to see their armor so braue, and so riche: insomuch as they longed for some occasion to trye them straight vpon their enemies. Now the ACHAIA at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyranne of LACEDEMON, who fought by all deuise he coule with a great armie, to become chiefe Lorde of all the PELOPONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the contrie of the MANTINIANS, Philopemen straight marched towards him with his army: so they mett bothe not farre from the cite of MANTINEA, where by and by they put them selues in order of battell. They both hadde entertaigned in paye a great number of straungers to serue them, besides the whole force of their contrie: and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his straungers gaue such a lustie charge vpon certaine slingers and archers beinge the forlorne hope whome

Philopemen

A Philopemen had cast of before the battell of the ACHAIA to beginne the skirmishe, that he ouerthrow them, & made them flie withal. But where he should haue gone on directly against the ACHAIA that were ranged in battell ray, to haue proued if he coule haue broken them: he was very buisie, and earnest still, to follow the chafe of them that first fled, and so came hard by the ACHAIA that stood still in their battell, and kept their rankes. This great ouerthrow fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIA were but cast away. But Philopemen made as though it had bene nothinge, and that he set light by it, and spying the great fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the spurre, whom they had ouerthrowen, and straying so farre from the battell of their footemen, whome they had left naked, and the field open upon them: he did not make towards them to stay them, nor did strue to stop the that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered the to take their course. And when he saw that they were gone a good way from their footemen, he made his man-marche upon the LACEDEMONIANS, whose sides were naked, hauing no horsemen to gard them: and so did set vpon them on the one side, and ranne so hastily on them to winne one of their flankes, that he made them flie, and flue withall a great number of them. For it is said, there were foure thousand LACEDEMONIANS slaine in the field, bicause they had no man to leade them: and moreouer, they say they did not looke to fight, but supposed rather they had wonne the felde, when they saw Machanidas chasing still those vpon the spurre, whom he had ouerthrowen. After this, Philopemen retyred to mete Machanidas, who came backe from the chafe with his straungers. But by chaunce there was a great broade ditch betwene them, so as both of them rode vpon the bankes sides of the same, a great while together, one against another of them: thone side seeking some conuenient place to get ouer and flie, & the other side seeking meanes to kepe them from starting away. So, to see the one before the other in this sorte, it appeared as they had bene wild beastes brought to an extremity, to defend them selues by force, from so fierce a hunter as Philopemen was. But whilest they were strutting thus, the tyrans horse that was lusty and coragious, and felt the force of his masters spurs pricking in his sides, that the blood followed after, did venter to leape the ditch, comming to the bankes side, stood upon his hindmost legges, and aduanced forward with his foremost feete, to reach to the other side. Then Simmias and Polyanus, who were about Philopemen when he fought, ran thither straight to kepe him in with their bore staues that he should not leape the ditch. But Philopemen who was there before the, perceiuing that the tyrans horse by lifting vp his head so high, did couer all his maisters body: forooke by and by his horse, and tooke his speare in both his hands, and thrust at the tyran with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditch. In memory whereof, the ACHAIA that did highly esteeme this valliant acte of his, and his wisdom also in leadeing of the battell: did set vp his image in brasse, in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, in the forme he slue the tyran. They say, that at the assembly of the common games called Nemea, (which they solemnise in honor of Hercules, not farre from the cite of ARGOS) and not long after he had wonne this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the seconde time of the tribe of the ACHAIA, and beinge at good leasure also by reason of the feast: he first shewed all the GREECIANS that were comethither to see the games and pastimes, his army raunging in order of battell, and made them see how easily they removed their places euery way, as necessity and occasion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their rankes, and that with a maruelous force & redines. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the musitians play, and sing to their instrumentes, who should winne the best game, beinge accompanied with lusty young gentlemen apparelled in purple clothes, and in skarlet coates & callockes they ware upon their armor, being all in the flower of their youth, and well giuen & disposed: who did greatly honor & reuerence their Captaine, & besides that, shewed the selues inwardly of noble hartes, beinge incouraged by many notable battells they had fought, in which they had euer attained the victory, & gotten the vpper hand of their enemies. And by chaunce, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the musitian, singinge certaine poemes of Timophemus, called the Perfes, fell into these verses.

mended.

When he had sweetely song out alowde these noble verses, passingly well made: the whole Assembly of the GREECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to see the games, cast all their eyes straight vpon Philopoemen, and clapped their hands one to an other for ioy, because of the great hope they had in him, that through him they shoulde soone recover their auncient reputation, and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy mindes of their auncesters. And as yonge horse that doe alwayes looke to be ridden by their ordinarie riders, if any straunger get vp on their backs, do straight waxe straunge to be handlede, and make great ado: euen so, when the ACHAIIANS came to any dangerous battell, their hartes were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopoemen, on whom still they depended and looked. And when they sawe him euer, the whole army reioycied, and desired straight to be at it, they had such confidence in his valliantnesse and good fortune: and truly not without cause. For of all men, their enemies did feare him most, and durst not stand before him: because they were afraid to heare his name only, as it seemed by their doings. For Philip king of MACEDON, imagining that if he could finde meanes to dispatche Philopoemen out of the way, howsoever it were, the ACHAIIANS would straight take parte againe with him: sent men secretly into the city of ARGOS, to kill him by treason. Howbeit the practise was discovered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GREECIANS generally, and taken for a cowardly and wicked Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS layed siege to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainly to haue wonne it at the first assault: there rose a rumor fodainely amongst them, that Philopoemen came to aide the city, and was not farre from it with his army. But it was a false reporte. Notwithstandinge, the BOEOTIANS were so scared, that for feare they left their scaling ladders behinde them, which they had set against the walls to haue scaled the towne, and fled straight to saue them selues. An other time, when Nabis the tyrant of LACEDEMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had taken the city of MESSINA vpon the sodaine: Philopoemen being then a priuate man, and hauinge no charge of soldiers, went vnto Lysippus, General of the ACHAIIANS that yere, to perswade him that he would send present aide vnto them of MESSINA. Lysippus told him, it was to late now to goe thither, and that it was but a lost towne, not to be holpen: considering the enemies were in it already. Philopoemen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither him selfe with the force of MESSINA only, not staying for the assembly of the MEGALOPOLITANS, that were in doubtfull about it, to giue him commission by voyces of the people to take them with him: but they all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man that by nature was worthiest of all other to commaunde them. Now when he came neere vnto MESSINA, Nabis hearinge of his comminge, durst not tary him, though he had his army with in the city, but stole out at an other gate, and marched away in all the haste he could, thinking him selfe a happy man and he could so escape his handes, and retire with safety, as in dede he did. And thus was MESSINA, by his meanes, deliuered fro captiuitie. All that we haue written hitherto concerning Philopoemen, falleth out doubtlesse to his great honor and glory: but afterwards he was greatly dispraised for a iorney he made into Creta, at the request of the GORTYNIANS, who sent to pray him to be their Captaine, being sore troubled with warres at that time. Because Philopoemen went then to serue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyrant Nabis had greatest warres with the MEGALOPOLITANS, in their owne contry: they laid it to his charge, either that he did it to flee the warres, or else that he sought honor out of season with foreine nations, when his poore citizens the MEGALOPOLITANS were in such distresse, that their contry being lost and destroyed, they were driuen to keepe them within their city, and to sell all their voide groundes and streetes in the same with corne, to susteine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almost hard at their towne gates. And the rather, because him selfe making warres with the CRETANS, and seruing straungers beyonde the sea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occasion to slander him that he fled, that he would not tary to fight for defence of his contry. Againe, there were that sayd, because the ACHAIIANS did choose other for their Generall, that he being a priuate man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had maruelously intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that coulde not abide to lie idlely, and that desired specially aboute

A all things to serue continually in the warres, and to put in practise his skil and discipline in the leading of an army. The wordes he spake one day of king Polonius doth witnesse as much. For when there were some that praised king Polonius highly, saying that he trained his army well, and that he still continued his persone in exercise of armes: It is not commendable for a king (sayd he) of his yeares, to delite in traininge his men to exercise armes, but to doe some acte him selfe in persone. Well, in the ende, the MEGALOPOLITANS tooke his absence in such euill parte, that they thought it a peece of treason, and would needs haue banished him, and put him from the freedome of the citie: had not the ACHAIIANS sent their Generall Ariste-netus vnto them, who would not suffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although otherwise there was euer contention betwene them about matters of the common wealth. Afterwards, Philopoemen perceiuing his contrymen made no more accompt of him, to spight them withall, he made diuerse small villages and cities rebell against them, & taught them to say, & to giue it out, that they were not their subiects, neither payed them tribute from the beginning: and he made them stande to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the city of MEGALIPOLIS, before the councill of the ACHAIIANS. These things happened shortly after. But whilest he made warres in Creta for the GORTYNIANS, he shewed not himselfe a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open warres: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vse their owne policies, fine deuises, & ambushes against them selues. And made them know also, that all their crafts, were but childish sportes as it were: in respect of those that were deuised, and put in execution, by a wise experienced Captaine, and skilfull to fight a battell. So, Philopoemen hauing wonne great fame by his actes done in Creta, returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, where he founde, that Philip king of MACEDON had bene ouercome in battell, by Titus Quintus Flaminus: and that the ACHAIIANS ioyning with the ROMAINES, did make warre against the tyrant Nabis, against whom he was made Generall immediatly vpon his returne, and gaue him battell by sea. In the which it seemed he fell into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the euent of this battell fallinge out much worse with him, then was looked for, in respect of his former corage and valliantnesse. But as for Epaminondas, some say he returned willingly out of ASIA, and the Iles, without any employe done, because he would not haue his contrymen fleshed with spoyle by sea, as fearing least of valliant souldiers by lande, they would by litle and litle (as Plato layd) become dissolute mariners by sea. But Philopoemen contrariwise, presuming vpon the skill he had to set the battell in good order by lande, would needs take vpon him to do the same by sea. But he was taught to his cost to knowe what exercise and experience ment, and howe stronge it maketh them that are practised in thinges. For he lost not onely the battell by sea, beinge vnskillfull of that seruice: but he committed besides a fowler error. For that he caused an old shippe to be rigged, which had bene very good of seruice before, but not occupied in forty yeares together, and imbarcked his contrymen into the same, which were all likely to perith, because the shippe had diuerse leakes, by fault of good calking. This ouerthrow made his enemies despise him vterly, who perswaded them selues he was fled for altogether, and had giuen them sea roome: whereupon they layed siege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopoemen beinge aduertised thereof, imbarcked his men fodainely, and set vpon his enemies ere they wist it, or had any thought of his comming: and founde them straggling vp and downe, without watch or garde, by reason of the victory they had lately wonne. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and set fyre vpon his enemies campe, and burnt it euery whitte: and in this feare and hurly burly, slue a great number of them. Shortly after this stealing upon them, the tyrant Nabis also stole upon him againe vnwares, as he was to goe through a maruelous ill and dangerous way. Which made the ACHAIIANS amazed at the first, thinkinge it vnpossible for them that they could euer scape that daunger, considering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopoemen bethinking him selfe, and considering the nature & scituacion of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainly then, that the chieft point of a good souldier, and man of warre, was to know how to put an army in battell, accordinge to the time and scituacion of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battell a litle, and forced it accordinge to the scituacion of the place, wherein he was compassed: and by doinge this without trouble or busines, he tooke away all feare of daunger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in A such fierce wise, that in a shorte time he put the all to flight. And when he perceived that they did not stie all in troups together towards the city, but scatteringwise, abroad in the fieldes in euery place: he caused the trompet to sound the retreat. Then he commaunded the chafe to be followed no further, for that all the contry thereabout was full of thicke woddes and groues, very ill for horsemen: and also because there were many brookes, vallies, and quagmyres which they should passe ouer, he encamped him selfe presently, being yett broade day. And so, fearinge least his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he sent a great number of ACHAÏANS, & laid them in ambush amongst the brookes and hilles neere about it, which made great slaughter of Nabis souldiers, because they came not altogether in troups, but scatteringly one after another as they fled, one here, an other there, and so fell into their enemies handes, as birdes into the fowlers net. These acts made Philopomen singularly beloued of the GREECIANS, and they did him great honor in all their Theaters and common assemblies. Whereat Titus Quintus Flaminius, of nature very ambitious, and couetous of honor: did much repine, and was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Consul of ROME should haue place & honor amongst the ACHAÏANS, before a meane gentleman of ARCADIA. And he imagined he had deserued better of all GREECE, then Philopomen had: considering, howe by the onely proclamation of an heraulde, he had restored GREECE againe to her auncient liberty, which before his comming was subiect vnto kinge Philip, and vnto the MACEDONIANS. Afterwardes, Titus Quintus made peace with the tyrant Nabis. Nabis was shortly after very traitorously slaine by the ACHAÏANS. Whereupon the C itie of SPARTA grew to a tumult, and Philopomen straight taking the occasion, went thither with his army, and handeled the matter so wisely: that partly for loue, and partly by force, he wanne the city, & ioyned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAÏANS. So was he maruelously commended and esteemed of the ACHAÏANS for this notable victory, to haue wonne their tribe and communalty so famous a city, and of so great estimation. For the city of SPARTA was no smale increase of their power, and being ioyned as a member of ACHAÏA. Moreover he was by this meanes, the loue and good will of all the honest men of LACEDÆMON, of the hope they had to finde him a protector and defender of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis house and goodes were solde, as forsitt to the state: they resolued in their counsell to make him a present of the money therof, which amounted to the summe of fixe score talents, D and sent Ambassadors purposely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopomen shewed himselfe plainly to be no counterfeate honest man, but a good man in deede. For first of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durst presume to offer him this money, but every man was asfraid to tell him of it: and euery body that was appointed to do it, made some excuse or other for them selues. Notwithstandinge, in the ende they made one Timolau to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar frend, and also his hoste. And yett the same Timolau when he came vnto MEGALIPOLIS, & was lodged & entertained in Philopomenes house, did so much reuerence him for his wise talke and conseruation, for his moderate diet, and iust dealing with all men: that he sawe there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to speake to him of the present he had brought him, B but founde some other occasion to excuse the cause of his comming vnto him. And beinge sent vnto him againe the second time, he did euen as much as at the first time. And making a third prooffe, he ventured at the last to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good will the city of SPARTA did beare him. Philopomen became a glad man to heare it: and when he had heard all he had to say to him, he went him selfe vnto the city of SPARTA. There he declared vnto the counsell, that it was not honest men, and their good frends, they should seeke to winne and corrupt with money, considering they might commaund their vertue vpon any occasion, without cost vnto them: but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by feditious orations in counsell did mutine, and put a whole cite in vtrope to the ende that hauing their mouthes stopped with giftes, they should trouble them the lesse in the common wealth. For, said he, it is more necessarie to stoppe your enemies mouthes, and to sowe vp their lippes from libertie of speaking: then it is to keepe your frendes from it.

So

A So noble a man was Philopomen against all couetousnesse of money. Shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS beginning to stirre againe, Diophanes (who was then General of the ACHAÏANS) beinge aduertised of it, beganne to prepare to punish them. The LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side preparing for the warres, did set all the contry of PHELOPONNESVS in armes. Hereupon Philopomen sought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that kinge Antiochus, and the ROMAINES, being at warres together at that present time, and they both hauing puissant armies one against an other in the midst of GREECE: it was meete for a good General and wise gouernour, to haue an eye to their doings, to be careful of the same, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thinge within his contry at that instant, but then rather to dissemble it, and not to seeme to heare any fault whatsoever they did. Diophanes would not be perswaded, but entred the territories of LACEDÆMON with a great army, and Titus Quintus Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the city of SPARTA. Philopomen was so madde with their doings, that he tooke upon him an enterprise not very lawfull, nor altogether iust: neuerthelesse, his attempt proceeded of a noble minde, and great corage. For he got into the cite of SPARTA, and beinge but a priuate person, kept out the General of the ACHAÏANS, & the Consul of the ROMAINES for entring the city: & when he had pacified all troubles and seditions in the same, he deliuered it vp againe as it was before, into the handes of the communalty of the ACHAÏANS. Neuerthelesse, him selfe being afterwards General of the ACHAÏANS, did compell the LACEDÆMONIANS to receive those home againe whom they had banished for certaine faultes, and did put foure score naturall C borne citizens of SPARTA vnto death, as Polybius writeth. Or three hundred and fifty, as Arrian saies: an other historiographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the walles of the city, and rased them to the grounde, and tooke away the most parte of their territories, and gaue them to the MEGALOPOLITANS. All those whome the tyrannes had made free denizens of SPARTA, he compelled them to departe the contry of LACEDÆMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAÏA, three thousand only excepted, who would not obey his commaundement: all those he solde for slaues, and with the money he made of them (to spight them the more) he builta goodly fayre walke within the cite of MEGALIPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDÆMONIANS all the mischief he coulede, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their most grieuous misery: he did a most cruell and vniust acte towards them. For he compelled D them to leaue the discipline and maner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of olde time instituted: and made them to follow the maner the ACHAÏANS vsed, in liue of their olde grounded contry custome, because he sawe they would neuer be humble minded, so long as they kept Lycurgus order and institution. Thus were they driuen to put the heades in the choller, by the miserable mishappe that befell them: and in all despight, to suffer Philopomen in this maner to cut a sunder (as it were) the sinewes of their common wealth. But afterwardes they made sure to the ROMAINES, that they might be suffered to enioy their auncient discipline againe, which being graunted them, they straight left the maner of the ACHAÏANS, and did set vp againe as much as was possible (after so great miserie and corruption of their maners) their olde auncient customes and orders of their contry. Now about the time the warres F beganne in GREECE, betwene the ROMAINES and kinge Antiochus, Philopomen was then a priuate man, and without any authority. He seeinge that kinge Antiochus lay still in the cite of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feast and loue, and had married a younge maide farre vnmeeete for his yeres: and perceiving that his SYRIAN souldiers wandered vp and downe the townes in great disorder, playing many lewde partes without guide of Captaines: he was very fory he was not at that time General of the ACHAÏANS, and tolde the ROMAINES, that he enuied their victory, hauing warres with enemies that were so easily to be overcome. For (sayd he) if fortune fauored me that I were General of the ACHAÏANS at this present, I woulde haue killed them euery man in the cellers and tipping houses. Now when the ROMAINES had overcome Antiochus, they beganne to haue surer footing in GREECE: and to compasse in the ACHAÏANS of all sides, and specially, by reason the heades and gouernors of the cities about them did yelde to the ROMAINES, to winne their fauor. And now their greatnesse grewe in half, by the fauor of the goddes, so as they were become the monarche of the whole worlde, who brought them nowe to the ende that fortune had determined. Philopamen in the meane A time did like a good pylor, bare hard against the billowes and roughnesse of their waues: and though for the time he was forced to giue place, and to let things passe, yet for all that he was against the ROMAINES, and did withstande them in the most parte of their proceedinges, by seeking euer to defend the liberty of those, who by their eloquence & well doinge caried great authority among the ACHAÏANS. And when Aristenetus MEGALOPOLITAN, (a man of great authority among the ACHAÏANS, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the ROMAINES) sayd in open Senate among the ACHAÏANS, that they should deny the ROMAINES nothings, nor shew them selues vnthankfull to them: Philopamen hearing what he sayd, held his peace a while, and suffered him to speake (though it boyled in his hart, he was so angry with him) and in the ende, breaking all patience, and as one ouercome with choller, he sayd. O Aristenetus, why haue you such hast to see the vnfortunate ende of GREECE? An other time, when Manius, Consull of ROME (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make request to the counsell of the ACHAÏANS, that such as were banished from LACEDÆMON, might retorne home into their contry againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius also did earnestly intreate them: Philopamen was against it, nor for any hatred he bare vnto the banished men, but because he would haue done it by his owne meane, and the only grace of the ACHAÏANS, to the ende they should not be beholding for so good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the ROMAINES. Afterwardes he him selfe, being Generall of the ACHAÏANS, did restore them wholly to their owne againe. Thus was Philopamen sometime, a litle to bolde and quarrellous, by reason of his great stomake: and specially when any man of authority sought for to haue things. Lastly, C beinge three score and tenne yeares of age, he was the eight time chosen Generall of the ACHAÏANS, and hoped well, not only to passe the yeare of his chage in peace and quietnes, but also all the rest of his life without any sturre of new warres, he saw the affaires of GREECE take to good successe. For like as the force & strength of sickenes declineth, as the natural strength of the sickely body empaireth: so through all the cities and people of GREECE, enuy of quarrell and warres surceased, as their power diminished. Neuerthelesse, in the end of his yeares gouernment, the goddes diuine (who iustly punish all insolent wordes and deedes) threw him to the grounde, as they suffer a ryder vnfortunatly to take a fall of his horse, beinge come almost to the ende of his carriere. For they wryte, that he beinge in a place on a time amongst good companie, where one was maruelously praised for a good Captaine, sayd vnto them: D why, masters, can ye commend him that was contented to be taken prisoner aloue of his enemies? Shortly after came newes that Diocrates MESSENIAN (a priuate enemy of Philopamenes for certaine controuersies past betwene them, and a man generally hated besides, of all honorable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawn the city of MESSINA from the deuotion of the ACHAÏANS: and moreouer that he came with an army to take a towne called COLONIDE. Philopamen was at that time in the city of ARGOS, sicke of an agew, and yet hearing these newes, tooke his iorney toward MEGALIPOLIS, making all the hast he could possible, so that he came aboue foure hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence toward MESSINA, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at armes of the lustiest and wealtheft MEGALOPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the city, and willingly offered them selues to goe with him for the goodwill they bare him, and for the desire they had to follow his vallianties. Thus went they on their way towards the city of MESSINA, and marched so longe, that they came nere vnto the hill of Euander, where they met with Diocrates & his cōpany, & gaue so fierce an onset on them, that they made them all turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a reliefe of foue hidred men to Diocrates, which he had left to keepe the contry of MESSINA. The flying men that were scattered here & there, seeing this supply, gathered them selues againe together, and shewed vpon the hills. Philopamen feareinge to be enuironned, and beinge desirous to bring his men safe home againe, who most of loue had followed him: beganne to marche away through narrow bulshy places, him selfe being in the rewerd, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, & skirmished with them, only to driue them away from followinge of the rest of his company, and not a man that durst once set upon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him.

How-

A Howebeit Philopamen sundry times venturinge farre from his company, to geue these young noble men leasure to faue them selues one after another: tooke no hede to him selfe that he was alone, enuironned on euery side with a great number of ennemles. Notwithstandinge, of all his enemies there was not a man that durst come to hande strokes with him, but still flinging and shooting at him a farre of, they draue him in the end amongst stony places betwene hewen rocks, where he had much a doe to guide his horse, although he had spurred him that he was all of a gore blood. And as for his age, that did not lette him but he might haue saved him selfe, for he was strong and lusty by the continuall exercise he tooke: but by cursed happe, his body beinge weake with sickenes, and weary with the long iorney he had made that day, he founde him selfe very heauy and ill disposed, that his horse stumbling with him, threwe him to the grounde. His fall was very great, and brused all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer sturred nor spake: so that his enemies thinkinge he had bene dead, came to turne his body to strippe him. But when they saw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once upon him, and tooke him, and bounde both his hands behinde him, and did all the villany and mischief they could vnto him, and such as one would litle haue thought Diocrates would haue vied in that sorte, or that he could haue had such an ill thought towards him. So, they that taried behinde in the city of MESSINA, were maruelous glad when they heard these newes, and ranne all to the gates of the city to see him brought in. When they saw him thus shamefully bounde, and pinnioned, against the dignity of so many honors as he had receiued, and of so many triumphes and victories as he had passed: the most parte of them wept for pitie, to consider the mishappe and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so litle certainty, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there some curious speeche to runne in the mouthes of the people by litle and litle, that they should remember the great good he had done vnto them in times past, and the liberty he had restored them vnto, when he expulsd the tyrant Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to please Diocrates, sayd they should hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a dangerous enemy, and that would neuer forgieue man that had once offended him: and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Diocrates, then euer he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiuing such open shame by him. Neuertheles, in the end they caried him into a certain dungeon vnder the ground, called the treasury, (which had neither light nor ayre at all into it, nor dore, nor half dore, but a great stone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and so they did let him downe the same, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these younge noble ACHAÏAN horsemen had fled vpon the spurte a great way from the enemy, they remembered them selues, & looked round about for Philopamen: & finding him not in sight, they supposed straight he had bene slaine. Thereupon they stayed a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he answered not, they beganne to say among them selues, they were beastes and cowards to flie in that sorte: and how they were dishonored for euer so to haue forsaken their Captaine, to faue them selues, who had not spared his owne life, to deliuer them from danger. Hereupon ryding on their way, and enquiring still for him: they were in the end aduertised how he was taken. And then they went & caried those newes through all the towne and cities of ACHAÏA, which were very sory for him, and tooke it as a signe of great ill fortune toward them. Whereupon they agreed to send Ambassadors forthwith to the MESSENIANS, to demaunde him: and in the meane time every man should prepare to arme them selues, to go thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the ACHAÏANS had thus sent, Diocrates feared nothing so much, as that delay of time might saue Philopamenes life: wherefore to prevent it, as soone as night came, and that the people were at rest, he straight caused the stone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopamen with a cuppe of poison to offer him, who was commaunded also not to goe from him, vnill he had dronke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopamen layed on the grounde upon a litle cloke, hauinge no list to sleepe; he was so grievously troubled in his minde. Who when he sawe light, and the man standing by him, holding a cuppe in his hande with this poison, he sat vp right vpon his cōwch, howbeit with great paine he was so weake:

and taking the cuppe in his hande, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horsemen that came with him, and specially of Lycortas. The hangman made him answer, that the most of them were faued. Then he cast his handes a litle ouer his head, and looking merely on him he sayd: it is well, seeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith speaking no moe wordes, nor makinge other a doe, he droncke vp all the poison, and layed him downe as before. So nature straued not much withall, his body being brought so lowe, and thereupon the poison wrought his effect, and rid him straight out of his paine. The newes of his death ran presently through all ACHAIA, which generally from high to low was lamented. Whereupon all the ACHAIA youth and counsellors of their cities and townes, assembled them selues in the city of MEGALIPOLIS, where they all agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their Generall, vnder whose conduct they invaded the MESSENIANS, with force and violence, puttinge all to the fire and sword: so as the MESSENIANS were so feared with this mercilesse fury, that they yielded them selues, and wholly consented to receiue the ACHAIANS into their city. But Dinocrates would not giue them leasure to execute him by iustice, for he killed him selfe: and so did all the rest make them selues away, who gaue aduise that Philopomen should be put to death. But those that would haue had Philopomen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas caused the to be taken, which afterwards were put to death with all kind of tormets. That done, they burnt Philopomenes body, and did put his ashes into a pot. Then they straight departed from MESSINA, not in disorder, one upon an others necke as euery man list: but in such an order and ray, that in the midst of these funeralls they did make a triumphe of victorie. For the souldiers were all crowned with garlandes of lawrell in token of victorie, notwithstanding, the teares ranne downe their cheekes in token of sorowe, and they led their enemies prisoners, shackled and chained. The funerall pot in the which were Philopomenes ashes, was so couered with garlandes of flowers, nosegayes, and laces, that it could scant be seene or discerned, and was caried by one Polybius a young man, the sonne of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the ACHAIANS: about whom there marched all the noblest and chiefeest of the ACHAIANS, and after them also followed all the souldiers armed, and their horses very well furnished. The rest, they were not so sorowfull in their countenance, as they are commonly which haue great cause of sorow: nor yet so ioyfull, as those that came conquerors from so great a victorie. Those of the cities, townes, and villages in their way as they past, came and presented them selues vnto them, to touche the funerall pot of his ashes, euen as they were wont to take him by the hande, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of MEGALIPOLIS. At the gates whereof, were olde men, women, and children, which thrustinge them selues amongst the souldiers, did renewe the teares, sorowes, and lamentacions of all the miserable and vnfortunate city: who tooke it that they had lost with their citizen, the first and chiefeest place of honor among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other prisoners of MESSINA, were all stoned to death, about his sepulchre. All the other cities of ACHAIA, besides many other honors they did vnto him, did set vp statues, and as like to him, as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of GREECE, when the city of CORINTHE was burnt and destroyed by the ROMAINES, there was a malicious ROMAINE that did what he could to haue the same pulled downe againe, by burdening & accusing Philopomen (as if he had bene alie) that he was alwaies enemy to the ROMAINES, and enuied much their prosperity and victories. But after Polybius had answered him: neither the Consul Mummius, nor his counsellors, nor lieutenants, would suffer them to deface & take away the honors done in memory of so famous & worthy a man, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius, vnto Manius. So, these good men then made a difference betwene duety & profit: & did thinke honesty & profit two distinct things, and so separated one from the other, according to reason and iustice. Moreover they were perswaded, that like as men receiue curtesie and goodnes of any, so are they bound to requite them againe, with kindenes and duety. And as men vie to acknowledge the same: euen so ought men to honor and reuerence vertue. And thus much for the life of Philopomen.

The end of Philopomenes life.

THE LIFE OF Titus Quintius Flaminius.

It is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius forme, and stature, by Philopomenes statue of brasie, to whome we compare him: the which is now set vpp at ROME, nere to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right against the comming in to the show place, vnder which there is an inscription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they say of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleasure men againe. For, if he did punish any man that had angered him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continew with him. He did good also to many, and euer loved them whom he had once pleased, as if they had done him some pleasure: & was ready to do for them still whom he founde thankfull, because he would euer make them beholding to him, and thought that as honorable a thinge, as he could purchase to him selfe. Bicause he greatly sought honor about all things, when any notable seruice was to be done, he would do it him selfe, and no man should take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with those that could helpe him, or do him good. For, the first he esteemed as a meane to exercise his vertue with: the other, he tooke them as his fellows and followers of honor with him. He came to mansstate, when the citie of ROME had greatest warres and trouble. At that time all the youth of ROME, which were of age to cary weapon, were sent to the warres to learne to traile the pyke, and how to become good Captaines. Thus was he entred into marshall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Hanniball of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thousande footemen, vnder Marcellus the consull: who being slaine by an ambuish Hanniball had layed for him betwene the cities of BANOTA, and VENUSIA; then they did choole Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernor of the prouince and city of TARENTVM, which was now taken againe the seconde time. In this gouernment of his, he warne the reputation as much of a good and iust man, as he did of an expert and skillfull Captaine. By reason whereof, when the ROMAINES were requested to send men to inhabite the cities of NARNIA & COSIA, he was appointed the chiefe leader of them, which chiefly gaue him hart and corage to aspire at the first to the Consullshippe, passinge ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prator, by which (as by degrees) other younge men were wont to attaine the Consulshippe. Therefore when the time came that the Consuls should be elected, he did present him selfe amonge other, accompanied with a great number of those he hadde brought with him, to inhabit the two newe towne, who did make earnest sute for him. But the two Tribunes Fulvius, and Manlius, spake against him, and sayed: it was out of all reason, that so younge a man should in such manner preaseto haue the office of the highest dignitie, against the vie and custome of ROME, before he hadde passed through the inferior offices of the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, the Senate preferred it wholly to the voyces of the people: who presently pronounced him Consul openly, with Sextius Ælius, although he was not yet thirtie yeare olde. Afterwards, Ælius and he deuidinge the offices of the state by lotte: it fell apou T. Quintius to make warre with Philip kinge of MACEDON. In the which me thinks fortune greatly fauored the ROMAINES affaires, that made such a man Generall of these warres: for, to haue pointed a Generall that by force and violence would haue fought all thinges at the MACEDONIANS handes, that were a people to be wonne rather by gentleness and perswasions, then by force & compulsion: it was all against them selues. Philip, to maintaine the bront of a battell against the ROMAINES, had power enough of his owne in his realme of MACEDON: but to make warre any long time, to furnish him selfe with money and vittales, to haue a place and cities to retire vnto, and lastly, to haue all other necessaries for his men and army: it stoode him apou to get the force of GREECE. And had not the force of GREECE bene politickly cut from him, the warres against him had not bene ended with one battell. Moreover, GREECE (which neuer before bare the ROMAINES any great goodwill) would not haue delt then so inwardly in frendshippe with them, had not their Generall bene (as he was) a gentle persone, lowly, and tractable, that wanne them more by his wisdom, then by his force, & could both eloquently vter his minde to them, and curiously also heare them speake, that had to doe with him, and chiefly, ministred iustice and equity to euery man a like. For it is not to be thought that GREECE would otherwise so soone haue withdrawn them selues from the rule of those, with whome they were acquainted, and gouerned: and haue put them selues vnder the rule of strangers, but that they saw great iustice and lenity in them. Howbeit that may more plainly appeare, by declaring of his actes. Titus was informed, that the Generalls before him sent to the warre in MACEDON (as Sulpitius, and Publius Iulius) vsed to come thither about the later end of the yeare, and made but cold warres, and certaine light skirmishes, as sometime in one place, and sometime in an other against Philip, and all to take some strait, or to cut of vittells: which he thought was not his way to follow their example. For they tarying at home, consumed the most of their Consulshippe at ROME, in matters of gouernment, and so enioyed the honor of their office. Afterwards in the end of their yeare, they would set out to the warres, of intent to get an other yeare ouer their heades in their office, that spending one yeare in their Consulship at home, they might employ the other in the warres abroad. But Titus not minding to trifle out the halfe of his Consulshippe at ROME, and the other abroad in the warres: did willingly leaue all his honors and dignities he might haue enioyed by his office at ROME, and besought the Senate that they would appoint his brother Lucius Quintius Lieutenant of their army by sea. Furthermore, he tooke with him selfe about three thousande olde souldiers of those that had first ouerthrowen Asdrubal in SPAYNE, & Hannibal afterwards in AFRICK, vnder the conduct of Scipio, which yet were able to serue, and were very willinge to goe with him in this iorney, to be the strength of his army. With this companie he passed the seas without daunger, and landed in EPIRVS, where he found Publius Iulius encamped with his army before kinge Philip, who of long time had lien in campe about the mouth of the riuer of Apfus, to kepe the straight and passage which is the entry into EPIRVS. So that Publius Iulius had lien still there, and done nothing, by reason of the naturall force and hardnes of the place. Then Titus tooke the army of him, and sent him to ROME. Afterwards, him selfe went in persone to view and consider the nature of the contry, which was in this sorte. It is a longe valley f wallied on either side with great high mountaines, as those which shut in the valley of Tempe in THESSEALIE. Howbeit it had no such goodly woods, nor grene forrests, nor fayer meadows,

The description of the contry of Epirus.

A nor other like places of pleasure, as the other side had: but it was a great deepe mariishe or quauemyre, through the midst whereof the riuer called Apfus did runne, being in greatnes and swiftnes of streame, very like to the riuer of Peneus. The riuer did occupie all the ground at the feete of the mountaines, fauing a litle way that was cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand, and a narrow straight pathe by the waters side, very vnhandesome for an army to passe that way, though they could not a man to keepe the passage. There were some in the army that counselled Titus to fetch a great compasse about by the contry of DASSARETIDE, and by the city of LYNCVS, where the contry is very plaine, and the way maruelous easie. Howbeit he stood in great feare he should lacke vittells, if he stayed farre from the sea, and happily if he fell into any barren or leane contry, (Philip refusing the battell, and purposing to sie) he should be constrained in the end to returne againe towards the sea, without doing any thing, as his predecessor had done before. Wherefore he determined to crosse the mountaines to set vpon his enemy, and to proue if he could winne the passage by force. Now Philip kept the top of the mountaines with his army, and when the ROMAINES forced to get vp the hilles, they were received with darts, slings, and shot, that lighted amongst them here & there: in so much as the skirmish was very hot for the time it lasted, and many were slayne and hurt on either side. But this was not the end of the warre. For in the meane time there came certaine neatherdes of the contry vnto Titus (who did vse to keepe beastes on these mountaines) and tolde him they could bring him a way which they knew the enemies kept not by the which they promised to guide his army so, that in three dayes at the furthest, they would bringe them on the top of the mountaine. And because they might be assured that their wordes were true, they sayed they were sent to him by Charopus, the sonne of Machatas. This Charopus was the chieftest man of the EPIROT'S, who loued the ROMAINES very well, yet he fauored them but vnder hand, for feare of Philip. Titus gaue credit vnto them, and so sent one of his Captaines with four thousand footemen, and three hundred horsemen. The heard men that were their guides, went before still, fast bounde: and the ROMAINES followed after. All the day time the army rested in thicke woodes, and marched all night by moone light, which was then by good happe at the full. Titus hauing sent these men away, rested all the rest of his campe: fauing that some daies he entaynted them with some light skirmishes to occupy the enemy withall. But the same day, when his men that fetched a compasse about, shoulde come vnto the top of the mountaine about the campe of his enemies, he brought all his army out of the campe by breake of day, & deuided them into three troupes, with the one of them he him selfe went on that side of the riuer where the way is straightest, making his bands to march directly against the side of the hill. The MACEDONIANS againe, they shot lustily at them from the height of the hill, and in certain places amongst the rockes they came to the sword. At the selfe same time, the two other troupes on either hande of him did their endeavor likewise to get vp the hill, and as it were enuoying one another, they climed vp with great corage against the sharpe and steepe hanginge of the mountaine. When the sunne was vp, they might see a farre as it were, a certain smoke, not very bright at the beginning, much like to the mistes we see comonly rise from the tops of the mountaines. The enemies could see nothing, because it was behinde them, & that the top of the mountaine was possessed with the same. The ROMAINES, though they were not assured of it, did hope being in the midst of the fight, that it was their fellows they looked for. But when they saw it increased stil more, & more, & in such sorte, that it darkened all the ayer: then they did assure them selues it was certainly the token their men did giue them that they were come. Then they beganne to crie out, clymging vp the hilles with such a lusty corage, that they draue their enemies vp the hill still, euen vnto the very rough and hardest places of the mountaine. Their fellows also that were behinde the enemies, did aunswer the with like lowde cries from the top of the mountaine: wherwith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled presently apou it. Nothwithstāding, there were not slaine about two thousand of the, because the hardnes & straightnes of the place did so gard them, that they could not be chased. But the ROMAINES spoiled their campe, tooke all that they found in their tents, tooke also their slaues, & wane the passage into the mountaines, by the which they entered the cōtry of EPIRVS: & did passe through it so quietly, & with so great abstinence, that though they were farre from their ships & the sea, & lacked their ordinary portion of come which they were wont to haue monthely, & that vi-tells were very scant with the at that time, yet they neuer tooke any thing of the cōtry, though by T H E S S A L I E, and flying for feare, had caused the inhabitants of the cities to get them to the mountaines, & then to set fire on their houses, & to leaue those goodes they could not carry away, by reason of the weight & vnhandsome cariage thereof, to the spoyle of his souldiers: & so (as it seemed) he left the whole cōtry to the conquest of the R O M A I N E S. Whereupon Titus looking cōsiderately to his doings, gaue his men great charge to passe through the cōtry without doing any hurt or mischief, as the same which their enemies had now left to them as their owne. So they taried not long to enioy the benefit of their orderly and wise forbearing of the cōtry. For, so loone as they were entred T H E S S A L I E, the cities willingly yielded them selues vnto them: & the G R E E C I A N S inhabiting beyond the cōtry of T H E R M O P Y L E S, did manuelously desire to see Titus, asking no other thing, but to put them selues into his hands. The A-C H A I A N S also on the other side, did renouice the league & alliance they had made with Philip and furthermore did determine in their counsell, to make warre with him on the R O M A I N E S side. And although the A E T O L I A N S were at that time frendes and confederates with the Ro-maines, & that they did shew the selues very louing to take their parte in these warres: neuer-theles when they desired the O V R T I A N S that they would put their city into their hands, and were offered that it should be kept & defended fro Philip: they would not harkē therto, but sent for Titus, & put the selues & their goods wholly into his protection. They say, that when king Pyrrus first saw the R O M A I N E S army range in order of battell from the top of a hill, he said this order of the barbarous people, setting of their men in battell ray, was not done in a barbarous maner. And those also that neuer had seene Titus before, & came for to speake with him: were compelled in a manner to say as much. For wherethey had heard the M A C E D O N I A N S say, that there came a Captaine of the barbarous people that destroyed all before him by force of armes, & subdued whole contries by violence: they sayd to the contrary, that they found him a man, in deede young of yeres, howbeit gentle, & courteous to looke on, & that spake the Greeke tongue excellently wel, & was a louer only of true glory. By reason wherof they returned home maruelous glad, & filled all the cities & townes of G R E E C E with goodwill towards him, and sayd: they had seene Titus the Captaine, that would restore them to their ancient libertie again. Then it much more appeared, when Philip shewed him selfe willing to haue peace, and that Titus also did offer it him, and the frendshippe of the people of R O M E, with these cōditions: that he would leaue the G R E E C I A N S their whole liberties, & renouice his garrisons out of their cities and strong holdes: which Philip refused to do. And thereupon all G R E E C E, and euen those which fauored Philip, layd with one voyce: that the R O M A I N E S were not come to make warres with them, but rather with the M A C E D O N I A N S in fauor of the G R E E C I A N S.

Whereupon all G R E E C E came in, & offered them selues vnto Titus without cōpulsion. And as he passed through the cōtry of B O E O T I A, without any shew at al of warres, the chiefeest me of the city of T H E B E S wēt to meete him: who though they tooke part with the king of M A C E D O N, because of a priuate mā called Brachyleus, yet they would honor Titus, as those which were cō-tented to keepe league & frendship with either side. Titus embraced them, & spake very courteously vnto the, going on his way stil saye & softly, entrentaining the sometime with one matter, & sometime with an other, & kept them talke of purpose, to the end his souldiers being wearied with iorneying, might in the meane time take good breath: & so marching on, by lide & lide, he entred into the city with the. Wherewith the Lords of T H E B E S were not greatly pleased, but yet they durst not refuse him, though he had not at that time any nūber of souldiers about him.
Whē he was within T H E B E S, he praied audiēce, & began to perswade the people (as carefully as if he had not had the city already) that they would rather take parte with the R O M A I N E S, then with the king of M A C E D O N. And to further Titus purpose, king Attalus being by chance at that time in the assembly, did help to exhort the T H E B E S very earnestly, that they would doe as Titus perswaded them. But Attalus was more earnest then became a man of his yeres, for for the desire he had (as was imagined) to shewe Titus his eloquence: who did so straine and moue him selfe withall, that he founded todaynely in the middest of his oration, whereby the

A rewme fell downe so fast vpon him, that it tooke away his senses, so as he fell in a tranne before them all, and few dayes after was conueyed againe by sea into A S I A, where he liued not long after. In the meane time, the B O E O T I A N S came into the R O M A I N E S, & tooke their parte.
And Philip hauing sent Ambassadors to R O M E, Titus also sent thither of his men to sollicite for him, in two respects. The one, if the warres continued against Philip, that then they would prolong his time there. The other, if the Senate did graunt him peace: that they would do him the honor, as to make and conclude it with Philip. For Titus of his owne nature being very ambitious, did feare least they would send a successor to continew those warres, who should take the glory from him, and make an end of them. But his friends made such earnest sute for him, that neither king Philip attained that he prayed: neither was there sent any other generall in Titus place, but he still continued his charge in these warres. Wherefore, so loone as he had receiued his cōmission & authority from the Senate, he went straight towards T H E S S A L I E, with great hope to ouercome Philip. For he had in his army about fix & twenty thousand fighting men, wherof the A E T O L I A N S made fix thousand footemen, and three thousand horsemen. King Philip army on another side was no lesse in number, & they began to march one towards the other, vntill at the length they both drew neere the city of S C O T V S A, where they determined to try the battell. So, neither they nor their men were afraid, to see them selues one so neere an other: but rather to the contrary, the R O M A I N E S on the one side tooke greater hart & courage vnto them, desiring to fight, as thinking with themselves what great honor they should win to ouercome the M A C E D O N I A N S, who were so highly esteemed for their vallianties, by reason of the famous acts that Alexander the great did by them. And the M A C E D O N I A N S on the other side also, taking the R O M A I N E S for other maner of souldiers then the P E R S I A N S, began to haue good hope if they might winne the field, to make king Philip more famous in the world, then euer was Alexander his father. Titus the calling his men together, spake, & exhorted the to stand to it like men, & to shew the selues valliant souldiers in this battell, as those which were so thew the proofe of their valliantesse in the hart of G R E E C E: the goodliest Theater of the world, & against their enemies of most noble fame. Philip then by chance, or forced to it by the spede he made, because they were both ready to ioyne, did get vp vpon a chamell house, (where they had buried many bodies, being a litle hill raised vp about the rest, & neere the trenches of his campe) and there began to encourage his souldiers, as all generals do before they giue battell. Who when he saw them all discouraged, for they tooke it for an ill signe that he was gotten vp on the top of a graue to speake vnto them: he of a conceite at the matter, did of himselfe deferre to giue battell that day. The next morning, because the night was very wet by reason the fowthe windes had blowen, the clouds were turned to a miste, & filled all the valley with a darke grosse thicke ayer, coming from the mountaines thereabouts, which couered the field betwene both camps with a mist all the morning, by reason wherof the skowtes on both sides that were sent to discouer what the enemies did, in very thorte time met together, & one gaue charge vpon an other in a place, they call the dogges heads, which are pointes of rockes placed vpon litle hills one before an other, and very nere one vnto an other; which haue bene called so, because they haue had some likenesse of it. In this skowt there were many changes, as is commonly talsh out when they fight in such ill fauored stony places. For sometime the Ro-maines fled, and the M A C E D O N I A N S chased them: an other time the M A C E D O N I A N S that followed the chafe, were glad to fly themselves, & the R O M A I N E S, who fled before, now had the in chafe. This change & alteration came by sending new supplies full from both camps, to relieue them that were distressed & driven to flee. Now began the miste to breake vp, & the ayer to cleere so that both generals might see about them, what was done in either campe by reason wherof both of the drew on their army to the field & battell. So Philip had the vantage on the right wing of his army, which was placed on the height of an hanging hill, so which they came for a maipe to set vpon the R O M A I N E S, & with such a fury, that the frowest & valliantest that could be, had neuer bene able to abide the heat of their battell, so closely were they ioined together, & their wall of pykes was so trog, but on his left wing it was not so, because the racks of his battell could not ioyne so nere, nor close targets to target, the place being betwixt the hills

& vneuenes of the ground, to leaue it open, & vnfurnished in many places. Titus findinge this aduantage, went fro the left wing of his battell which he saw ouerlaied by the right wing of his enemies, & goinge sodainly toward the left wing of king Philips battell, he set vpon the Macedonians on that side, where he saw they could not close their ranks in the front, nor ioyne them together in the middest of the battell (which is the whole strength & order of the Macedonian fight) because the field was vp hill & downe hill: & to fight hand to hand they were so pestered behind, that one thronged & ouerlaied an other. For the battell of the Macedonians hath this property, that so long as the order is kept close & ioyned together, it seemeth as it were but the body of a beast of a force inuincible. But also after that it is once open, & that they are fundered & not ioyned together, it doth not only loose the force & power of the whole body, but also of euery priuate fouldier that fighteth: partly by reason of the diuersity of the weapons, wherewith they fight, & partly for that their whole strength consisteth most, in the disposing & ioyning together of their ranks & orders which doth stay vpon one another, more the doth euery priuate fouldiers strength. So when this left wing of the Macedonians was broken, & that they ran their way: one parte of the Romaines followed the chafe, & the other ranne to giue a charge vpon the flanks of the right winge which fought yet, & they made great slaughter of them. Whereupon they now which before had the vantage, beganne to stagger and breake, & in the ende ranne away as fast as the other did, throwinge downe their weapons: inso much as there were slaine of them eight thousande in the field, and fife thousande taken prisoners in the chafe. And had not the fault bene in the Aetolians, Philip had not saued him selfe by flyinge as he did. For whilest the Romaines had their enemies in chafe, the Aetolians taried, & rised all kinge Philips campe, so as they had left the Romaines nothinge to spoyle at their returne. Whereupon there grew great quarrell, & hot words betweene them, & one with an other. But afterwards they angered Titus worse, challenginge the honor of this victory to the selues, because they gaue it out through Greece, that they alone had ouerthrowne king Philip in the battell. So that in the songs and ballets the Poets made in praise of this victory, which euery cotry & towne man had in his mouth: they alwaies put the Aetolians before the Romaines, as in this that followeth, which was currently song in euery place.

Oh friend, vvhich passest by: here he vve wreched phares, Vvithouten honor of thy game, vvitouth lamented teares.

VVe thirty thousand vvere, vvhich ended hane our dayes:

In cruell coasts of Thessalie, vvhich caused our decayes.

VVe haue bene ouerthrowen by th Aetolians men of warre:

And by the Latine crewes like vviife, vvhom Titus led from farre.

Euen out of Italie, to Macedonie lande,

Vs to destroy, he captaine like did come vvvith mighty bande.

And Philip for vviife, there vvhiles for all his prouide fierce face:

The Poet was Alcous that made these verses for to singe, who did them in disgrace of kinge Philip, falsely increasinge the number of his men which died in the battell, only to shame and spite him the more: howbeit he spited Titus thereby, more then Philip, because it was song in euery place. For Philip laughed at it, & to encounter him againe with the like mocke, he made a song to counterfette his, as followeth.

This gibbet on this hill, vvhich passers by may marke:

Vvas set to hang Alcous vpon, vvitouthen leane or barge.

But Titus tooke it greuouly, who chiefly desired to be honored amongst the Greeks, by reason whereof from that time forwards he delt in the rest of his matters alone, without making accompt of the Aetolians: wherewith they were maruelous angry, & specially when he receiued an Ambassador from Philip, and gaue care vnto a treaty of peace which he offered: then they were so nettled against him, that they gaue it out through all Greece, that Titus had sold peace vnto Philip, when he might altogether haue ended the waite, and vnto this he destroyed Philips whole power and Empire, who had first brought Greece into bondage. These slanderous reports & false tales which the Aetolians spread thus abroad, did much trouble

A trouble the Romaines frendes and confederates: but Philip selfe pulled this suspition out of their heades, when he came in person to require peace, and did submit him selfe wholly to the discretion of Titus and the Romaines. Titus then graunted him peace, and deliuered to him his realme of Macedon, and commaunded him he should giue ouer all that he holde in Greece, and besides, that he should pay one thousande talents for tribute, taking from him all his army by sea, sauing only tenne shippes: and for assurance of this peace, he tooke one of his sonnes for hostage, whome he sent to Rome. Wherein Titus certainly did very well, and wisely did foresee the time to come. For then Hannibal of Carthage, (the great enemy of the Romaines) was banished out of his contry, and comen to kinge Antiochus, whome he put in the head, and earnestly moued, to follow his good fortune, and the increase of his Empire. Whom Hannibal so followed with these perswasions, that kinge Antiochus at length was come to it. And trusting to his former good successe, and notable acts, whereby in the warres before he had attained the surname of great: he began now to aspire to the monarchy of the whole world, & fought how to finde occasion to make warres with the Romaines. So that if Titus (foreseeing that a far of) had not wisely inclined to peace, but that the wars of Antiochus had fallen out together with the warres of king Philip, and that these two the mightiest Princes of the worlde had ioyned together against the city of Rome: then it had bene in as great trouble and danger, as euer it was before, in the time of their warres against Hannibal. Howbeit Titus hauinge happily thrust in this peace betweene both warres, he cut of the warre that was present, before the other that was comminge: by which meanes he tooke from one of the kinges his last, and from the other his first hope. In the meane time, the tenne commissioners that were sent by the Senate from Rome to Titus, to aide and assist him in the order of the affaires of Greece: did counsell him to set all the rest of Greece at liberty, and onely to kepe in their handes with good garrison, the cities of Chalcide, of Corinthe, and of Demetriade, to make sure that by practise they should not enter into league and alliance with Antiochus. Then the Aetolians (that were the common slaunderers of Titus proceedinges) beganne openly to make these cities to rebell, and did summe Titus to loose the chaines of Greece: for so did kinge Philip call these three cities. Then they asked the Greeks in mockery, whether they were willing now to haue heavier fetters on their legges, then before, being (somewhat brighter and fayrer then those they had bene shackled with: and also whether they were not greatly beholding to Titus for taking of the fetters from the Greeks legs, and tryinge them about their neckes. Titus beinge maruelously troubled and vexed with this, moued the tenne counsellors so earnestly, that he made them graunt his request in the ende, that those three cities also should be deliuered fro garrison: because the Greeks thenceforth might no more complaine, that his grace and liberality was not thoroughly performed, and accomplished in euery respect on them all. Wherefore, when the feast called Isthmia was come, there were gathered together an infinite multitude of people come to see the sporte of the games played there: for Greece hauing bene long time troubled with warres, they seeing them selues now in pure peace, & in very good hope of full liberty, looked after no other thing, but deluded only to see games, and to makemery. Proclamation was then made by founde of E trompet in the assembly, that euery man should keepe silence. That done, the herauld went forward, and thrust into the middest of the multitude, and proclaimed out alowde: that the Senate of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius, Consul of the people of Rome (now that they had ouerthrowne kinge Philip and the Macedonians in battell) did thenceforth discharge from all garrisons, and set at liberty from all taxes, subsidies, and impositions for euer, to liue after their olde auient laws, and in full liberty: the Corinthians, the Locrians, those of Phocide, those of the Ile of Euboea, the Achaians, the Phthioties, the Magnesi-ans, the Thessalians, and the Perrhoebians. At the first time of the proclamation, all the people could not heare the voice of the herauld, and the most parte of those that hearde him, could not tell distinctly what he sayed: for there ranne vp & downe the shewe place where the games were played, a confused brute and tumult of the people that wondered, and asked what the matter ment, so as the herauld was driuen againe to make the proclamation. Whereupon after silence made, the herauld puttinge out his voice farre lowder then before, did proclaime it in such audible wise, that the whole assembly heard him: and then rose there A such a lowde shoute and crie of ioy through the whole people, that the sound of it was heard to the sea. Then all the people that had taken their places, & were set to see the Swordplayes play, rose vp all on their feete, letttinge the games alone, and went together with great ioy to salute, to embrace, and to thank Titus the recouerer, protector, and patron of all their liberties of GREECE. Then was seene (which is much spoken of) the power of mens voyces: for crows fel downe at that present time among the people, which by chaunce flew ouer the show place at that time that they made the same out shoute. This came to passe, by reason the ayer was broken and cut a sunder, with the vehemency and strength of the voyces, so as it had not his naturall power in it, to keepe vp the flying of the birdes: which were driuen of necessity to fall to the ground, as flyinge through a void place where they lacked ayer. Vnlesse we B will rather say, that it was the violence of the crie, which strooke the birdes passinge through the ayer, as they had bene hit with arrowes, and so made them fall downe dead to the earth. It may be also, that there was some hurling winde in the ayer, as we doe see sometime in the sea, when it riseth high, and many times turneth about the waues, by violence of the storme. So it is, that if Titus hadde not preuented the whole multitude of people which came to see him, and that he had not got him away betimes, before the games were ended: he had hardly escaped from being stifled amongst them, the people came so thicke about him from euery place. But after that they were weary of crying, and singing about his pavillion vntill night, in the ende they went their way: and as they went, if they met any of their kinne, frendes or citizens, they did kisse and embrace one another for ioy, and so supped, and made mery together. C In their more reioycinge yet, as we may thinke full well, they had no other talke at the table, but of the warres of GREECE, discoursing amongst them what sundry great warres they had made, what they had endured heretofore, and all to defend and recouer their liberty. And yet for all that, they coulde neuer so ioyfully nor more assuredly obtaine it, then they did euen at that present, receiuing the honorablest reward, & that which deserued greatest fame through the worlde: that by the valliantesse of strangers who fought for the same (without any spik blood of their owne in comparison, or that they lost the life of any one man, whose death they had cause to lament) they were so restored to their ancient freedome and liberty. It is a very rare thing amongst men, to finde a man very valliant, and wise withal: but yet of all sortes of valliant men, it is harder to finde a iust man. For Agessilaus, Lyfander, Nicias, Alcibiades, D and all other the famous Captaines of former times, had very good skill to lead an army, and to winne the battell, as well by sea as by lande: but to turne their victories to any honorable benefit, or true honor amongst men, they could neuer skill of it. And if you doe except the battell against the barbarous people, in the plaine of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, the iorney of PLATEES, the battell of THERMOPILES, the battell Cimon fought about CIPRVS, and vpon the riuier of Eurymedon: all the other warres & battells of GREECE that were made, fell out against them selues, and did euer bringe them into bondage: and all the tokens of triumphe which euer were set vp for the same, was to their shame and losse. So that in the end, GREECE was vtterly destroyed and ouerthrowen, and that chiefly through the wickednes and selfewill of her gouernors and captaines of the cities, one enuying another doinge. Where E strauing nation, the which (as it should seeme) had very small occasion to moue them to do (for that they haue had no great familiarity with auncient GREECE, & through the counsell & good wisdom of the which it should seeme very strange that GREECE coulde receiue any benefit) haue notwithstanding with dangerous battells and infinite troubles, deliuered it from oppression, and seruitude, of violent Lordes and tyrans. This, and such like talke, did at that time occupy the GREECIANS heades: and moreover, the deedes following did aunswer and performe the words of the proclamation. For at one selfe time, Titus sent Lentulus to ASIA, to set the BARGYLIANS at liberty, and Tullius into THRACIA, to remoue the garrisons out of the Iles & cities which Philip had kept there: and Publius Iulius was sent also into ASIA, to king Antiochus, to speake vnto him to let the GREECIANS at liberty which he kept in subiection. F And as for Titus, he went him selfe vnto the city of CHALCIDE, where he tooke sea, and went into the prouince of MAGESTIA, out of the which he tooke all the garrisons of the cities, and redeliuered

A redeliuered the government of the common wealth vnto the citizes of the same. Afterwards when time came, that the feast of Nemea was celebrated in the citie of ARGOS in the honor of Heracles, Titus was chosen iudge, & rector of the games that were plaied there: where, after he had set all things in very good order, pertaining vnto the solemnity of the feast, he caused againe a solemn proclamation to be made openly, for the generall liberty of all GREECE. Furthermore, visiting the cities, he did stablish very good lawes, reformed iustice, and did set the inhabitants and citizes of euery one of them in good peace, amity, and concord one with another: and did call home also all those that were outlawes and banished men, and pacified all olde quarrells and diffentions amongst them. The which did no lesse please and content him, that by perswasions he could bringe the GREECIANS to be reconciled one with the other: then B if he had by force of armes ouercome the MACE DONIANS. Insomuch, as the recovery of the libertie which Titus had restored vnto the GREECIANS, seemed vnto them the least parte of the goodnesse they had receiued at his handes. They say, that Lycurgus the orator seeinge the collectors of taxes, cary Zenocrates the Philosopher one day to prison, for lacke of payment of a certaine imposition; which the straungers inhabiting within the citie of ATHENS were to pay: he rescued him from them by force, and moreover prosecuted law so hard against them, that he made them pay a fyne for the iniury they had done vnto so worthy a person. And they tell, how the same Philosopher afterwards meeting Lycurgus children in the city, sayed vnto them. I doe wel requite your fathers good turne he did me: for I am the cause that he is praised and commended of euery man, for the kindenesse he shewed on my behalfe. So the good C deedes of the ROMAINES, and of Titus Quintus Flaminius vnto the GREECIANS, did not onely reap this benefit vnto them, in recompence that they were praised and honored of all the worlde: but they were cause also of increasinge their dominions and Empire ouer all nations, and that the worlde afterwards had great affiance and trust in them, and that most iustly. So that the people and cities did not onely receiue the Captaines and gouernors the ROMAINES sent them: but they also went to ROMA vnto them, and procured them to come, and did put them selues into their handes. And not only the cities and communalties, but kings & princes also (which were oppressed by other more mighty than them selues) had no other refuge, but to put them selues vnder their protection: by reason whereof in a very thorte time (with the fauor and helpe of the goddesses as I am perswaded) all the worlde came to submit them selues to D their obedience, and vnder the protection of their Empire. Titus also did glory more, that he had restored GREECE againe vnto liberty, then in any other seruice or exploit he had euer done. For when he offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES, the targets of silver with his owne shielde, he made these verses to be grauen vpon them, in effect as followeth.

Throw out loude shoutes of ioy, and mirth, reioyce and make good cheare.
O noble kings of Sparran soyle, which take delight to ryde, Your trampling steedes, with fomy byt, and trappings by their side: Reioyce you now, for Titus be, the valliant Romaine knight, These giftes so great to you hath got, euen by his force and might: Thus hauing taken cleane away, from of the Greeke she neckes, The heauy yoke of seruitude, which held them thrall to checkes, Vnto their former liberty, he hath restored them free, VVhich also together perisht was, as men might plainly see.

To thee Apollo god, this crowne of pure fine golde, Hath geuen thy godhead to adorne, with inells manifolde: Therefore let it thee please Apollo god of grace)

So hath the city of CORINTH enjoyed this good happe, that the GREECIANS haue bene twice proclaimed to be set at liberty: the first time by Titus Quintius Flaminius, and the second time, by Nero in our time, and at the selfe same instant when they solemnly kept the feast called Isthmia. Howbeit the first proclamation of their liberty (as we haue tolde ye before) was done by the voyce of a herald: and the seconde time it was done by Nero him selfe, who proclaimed it in an oration he made vnto the people in open assembly, in the market place of the city of CORINTH. But it was a long time after. Furthermore, Titus beganne then a goodly and iust warre against Nabis, the cursed and wicked tyrant of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit in the ende he deceaued the expectation of GREECE. For when he might haue taken him, he would not doe it, but made peace with him, forsaking poore SPARTA vnworthily oppressed vnder the yoke of bondage: either because he was afrayd that if the warre helde on, there should come a successor vnto him from ROME, that should cary the glory away to ende the same, or else he stoode Icalous and enuious of the honor they did vnto Philopamen. Who hauing rescued him selfe in euery place as excellent a Captaine as euer came in GREECE, and hauinge done notable actes and famous seruice, both of great wisdom, and also of valliantesse, and specially in the ACHAIANS warre: he was as much honored & reuerenced of the ACHAIANS, in the Theaters and common assemblies, euen as Titus was. Whereat Titus was maruelously offended, for he thought it vnreasonable, that an ARCADIAN who had neuer bene general of an army, but in small litle warres against his neighbours, should be as much esteemed and honored, as a Confull of ROME, that was come to make warres for the recouery of the libertie of GREECE. But Titus alleged reasonable excuse for his doings, saying that he saw very well he could not destroy this tyrant Nabis, without the great losse and misery of the other SPARTANS. Furthermore, of all the honors the ACHAIANS euer did him (which were very great) me thinks there was none that came neere any recompence of his honorable and well deserving, but one onely present they offered him, and which he aboute all the rest most esteemed: and this it was. Duringe the seconde warres of AFRICKE, which the ROMAINES had against Hanniball, many ROMAINES were taken prisoners in the sundry battells they lost, and beinge sold here and there, remained slaues in many contries: and amongst other, there were dispersed in GREECE to the number of twelue hundred, which from time to time did moue men with pitie and compassion towards them, that saw them in so miserable change and state of fortune. But then much more was their miserie to be pitied, when these captiues found in the ROMAINES army, some of them their sonnes, other their brethren, and the rest their fellows and frendes, free, and conquerours, and them selues slaues and bondemen. It grieved Titus much to see these poore men in such miserable captiuitie, notwithstanding he would not take them by force from those that had them. Whereupon the ACHAIANS redeemed and bought them for fife hundred pence a man, and hauinge gathered them together into a troupe, they presented all the ROMAINES captiues vnto Titus, euen as he was ready to take ship to returne into ITALIE: which present made him returne home with greater ioy and contentation, hauing receiued for his noble deedes so honorable a recompence, and worthy of himselfe. That was fo louing a man to his citizens and contry. And surely, that onely was the ornament (in my opinion) that did most beautifie his triumph. For these poore redeemed captiues did that, which the slaues are wont to doe on that day when they be set at liberty: to witte, they shaued their heades, and doe weare litle hattes upon them. The ROMAINES that were thus redeemed, did in like maner: and so followed Titus charret, on the day of his triumph and entrie made into ROME in the triumphing char. It was a goodly sight also, to see the spoiles of the enemies, which were caried in the show of this triumph: as, store of helmets after the GREECIAN s'faction, heapes of targets, shields, and pykes after the MACEDONIAN maner, with a wonderfull summe of gold and siluer. For Strabo the historiographer writeth, that there was brought a maruelous great masse of treasure in niggots of golde, of three thousand seven hundred and thirtie ene pounde weight, and of siluer, of forty three thousand, two hundred, three score and tenne pound weight, and of gold ready coyned in peeces called Philipp fourteene

A teene thousand, fife hundred, and foureteene, besides the thousand talents king Philip should pay for a ranfome. The which summe, the ROMAINES afterwarde forgave him, chiefly at Titus sute and intercession, who procured that grace for him, and caused him to be called a friend and confederate of the people of ROME, and his sonne Demetrius to be sent vnto him againe, who remained before as an hostage at ROME. Shortly after, king Antiochus went out of ASIA into GREECE with a great flecte of shippes, and a very puissant army, to stirre vp the cities to forsake their league and allyance with the ROMAINES, and to make a diffention amongst them. To further this his desire and enterprise, the ÆTOLIANS did aide and backed him, which of long time had borne great and secreet malice against the ROMAINES, and desired much to haue had warres with them. So they taught king Antiochus to say, that the warre which he tooke in hande, was to set the GREECIANS at liberty, whereof they had no neede, because they did already enioy their liberty: but for that they had no iust cause to make warre, they taught him to cloke it the honestest way he coule. Wherefore the ROMAINES fearinge greatly the rising of the people, & the rumor of the power of this great king, they sent thither Manius Acilius their general, and Titus, one of his Lieutenants for the GREECIANS sakes, which arriuall did the more assure them that already bare good will to the ROMAINES, after they had once seene Manius and Titus: and the rest that beganne to flie out, and to shrinke from them, those Titus kept in obedience from starting, rememberinge them of the friendship and good will they had borne him, euen like a good skillfull phisitian that coule geue his patient phisicke to preferue him from a contagious disease. In deede there were some (but fewe) of them that left him, which were won and corrupted before by the ÆTOLIANS: and though he had iust cause of offence towards them, yet he saued them after the battell. For king Antiochus beinge ouercome in the contry of THERMOPILES, fled his way, and in great hast tooke the sea to returne into ASIA. And the Confull Manius following his victory, entred into the contry of the ÆTOLIANS, where he tooke certaine townes by force, and left the other for a pray vnto kinge Philip. So Philip kinge of MACEDON on the one side, spoyled and sacked the DOLOPIANS, the MAGNESIANS, the ATHAMANIANS, and the APERANTIANS: and the Confull Manius on the other side, destroyed the city of HERACLEA, and layed siege to the citie of NAFPACTVM, which the ÆTOLIANS kept. But Titus takinge compassion of them, to see the poore people of GREECE thus spoiled and turned out of all went out of PELOPONNESVS (where he was then) vnto Manius Acilius campe, and there reprobued him for suffering kinge Philip to vsurpe the benefite and reward of his honorable victory, still conqueringe many people, kings, and contries, whilst he continued siege before a city, and only to wreake his anger vpon them. Afterwarde, when they that were besieged saw Titus from their walles, they called him by his name, and helde vp their hands vnto him, prayinge him he would take pitie vpon them: but he gaue them neuer a word at that time, and turning his backe vnto them, he fell weeping. Afterwarde he spake with Manius, and appealing his anger, got him to graunt the ÆTOLIANS truce for certaine dayes, in which time they might sende Ambassadors to ROME, to see if they could obtaine grace and pardon of the Senate. But the most trouble and difficulty he had, was to intreate for the CHALCIDIANS, with whom the Confull Manius was more grieuouly offended, then with all the rest: because that kinge Antiochus after the warres was begonne, had married his wife in their citie, when he was past yeares of marriage, and out of all due time. For he was now very olde, and beinge in his extreme age, and in the middle of his warres, he fell in dotage with a young gentlewoman, the daughter of Cleopolemus, the fayrest woman that was at that time in all GREECE. Therefore the CHALCIDIANS were much affected vnto king Antiochus, and did put their city into his handes, to serue him in this warre, for a strong & safe retyring place. Whereupon, when Antiochus had lost the battell, he came thither with all possible speede, and takinge from thence with him his passinge fayre young Queene which he had married, and his golde, his siluer, and frendes, he tooke the seas incontinently, and returned into ASIA. For this cause the Confull Manius hauinge wonne the battell, did marche straight with his army towards the citie of CHALCIS in a great rage and fury. But Titus that followed him, did alwayes lye vpon him to pacifie his anger, and did so much intreate him, together with the other ROMAINES of ASIA, and authoritie in counsell:

Manius Acilius Confull, & T. Quintius Lieutenant sent into Greece.

Antiochus overthrew in Thermopyles, by Manius the Confull.

Quintius intreateth for the Ætolians.

that in the ende, he gotte him to pardon them of CHALCIDE also. Who, because they were preferred from perill by his meanes, they to recompence this fact of his, did consecrate vnto him, all their most stately and sumptuous buildinges and common workes in their citie, as appeareth yet by the superscriptions remaininge to be seene at this day. As in the fflow place of exercises: The people of CHALCIDE did dedicate this show place of exercises, vnto Titus & Hercules. And in the temple called Delphinium: The people of CHALCIDE did consecrate this temple, vnto Titus, and vnto Apollo. And furthermore, vnto this present time, there is a priest chosen by the voyce of the people, purposely to do sacrifice vnto Titus: in which sacrifice, after that the thing sacrificed is offered vp, and wine powred apon it, the people standing by, do sing a song of triumphe made in praise of him. But because it was to long to wryte it all out, we haue only drawn in briefe the latter end of the same: and this it is.

And vvvv to be their faithfull frendes, both novv and ever more.
Sing out you Muses nyne, to Iones eternall fame, Sing out the honor due to Rome, and Titus vvvvorthy name.
Sing out (I say) the praise, of Titus and his faith:
By vvvhom you haue preferred bene, from ruine, dole, and death.*

Now the CHALCIDIANS did not alone only honor & reuerence Titus, but he was generally honored also by the GREECIANS as he deserved, & was maruelously beloued for his cunsel and good nature: which argueth plainly that they did not fainedly honor him, or through compulsion, but euen from the hart. For though there was some iarre betwixt him and Philopemen at the first about seruice, for emulation of honor, and after betwixt him and Diophanes also, both generalls of the ACHAIANS: yet he neuer bare them any malice in his hart, neither did his anger moue him at any time to hurt them any way, but he euer ended the heate of his wordes, in counsell and assemblies, where he vttered his minde frankly to them both. Therefore none thought him euer a cruell man, or eger of reuenge: but many haue thought him rather, and hasty of nature. Otherwise, he was as good a companion in company as possibly could be, and would vie as pleasaunt wife mirth as any man. As when he sayed to the ACHAIANS, on a time, who would needes vnjustly vsurpe the lfe of the ZACYNTHIANS, to disswade them from it: my Lordes of ACHAIA, if ye once goe out of PELOPONNESVS, you put your selues in daunger, as the tortoyles doe, when they thrust their heades out of their shell. And the first time he parled with Philip to treat of peace when Philip said vnto him, you haue brought many men with you, and I am come alone. In deede it is true you are alone, sayd he, because you made all your frendes and kinne to be slaine. An other time, Diocrates Messinian being in ROME, after he had taken in his cuppes in a feast where he was, he disguised him selfe in womans apparell, and daunced in that manner: and the next day followinge he went vnto Titus; to pray him to helpe him through with his sute, which was, to make the citie of the MESSINIANS to rebell, and leaue the tribe of the ACHAIANS. Titus made him answer, that he would thinke vpon it: but I can but wonder at you (sayd he) howe you can daunce in womans apparell, and singe at a feast, hauinge such matters of weight in your head. In the counsell of the ACHAIANS, king Antiochus ambassadours beinge come thither, to moue them to breake their league with the ROMAINES, and to make alliance with the king their master, they made a maruelous large discourse of the great multitude of souldiers that were in their masters armies, and did number them by many diuerse names. Whereunto Titus answered, and tolde how a frend of his hauing bidden him one night to supper, and hauing serued so many dishes of meate to his bord, as he was angry with him for bestowing so great cost apon him, as wondering howe he could so foadainly get so much store of meate, and of so diuerse kindes. My frende sayed to me againe, that all was but porke dressed so many wayes, and with so sundry sawces. And euen so (quod Titus) my Lordes of ACHAIA, esteeme not king Antiochus any the more, to heare of so many men of armes, numbred with their launces, and of such a number of footemen with their pykes: for they are all but SYRIANS, diuersely armed, only with ill fauored litle weapons. Furthermore; after Titus had done these thinges, and that the warre with Antiochus was ended, he was chosen Censor at ROME, with the sonne of that same Marcellus, who

A who had bene five times Confull. This office is of great dignitie, and as a man may say, the crowne of all the honors that a citizen of ROME can haue in their common wealth. They put of the Senate, foure men only: but they were not famous. They did receiue all into the number of citizens of ROME, that would present them selues to be enrolled in their common register: with a pious, that they were borne free by father and mother. They were compelled to doe it, by Terentius Culeo, Tribune of the people, who to despight the nobility, perswaded the people of ROME to commaunde it so. Nowe at that time, two of the noblest and most famous men of ROME were great enemies one against another: Publius Scipio AFRICAN, and Marcus Porcius Cato. Of these two, Titus named Publius Scipio AFRICAN, to be prince of the Senate, as the chiefeest and worthiest persone in the citie: and got the displeasure of the other, which was Cato, by this mishap. Titus had a brother called Lucius Quintius Flaminius, nothing like vnto him in condition at all: for he was so disolutely and licentious, given ouer to his pleasure, that he forgatte all comlineesse and honesty. This Lucius loued well a young boy, and caried him alwayes with him when he went to the warres, or to the charge and government of any prouince. This boy flattering him, one day sayd vnto Lucius Quintius; that he loued him so well, that he did leaue the sight of the Sword players at the sharpe, which were making ready to the fight, although he had neuer seene man killed before: to waite vpon him. Lucius being very glad of the boyes wordes, answered him straight, thou shalt looke nothing for that my boy, for I will by & by please thee as well. So he commaunded a condemned man to be fetched out of prison, and withall called for the hangman, whome he willed to strike off C his head in the midst of his supper, that the boy might see him killed. Valerius Antias the historiographer wryteth, that it was not for the loue of the boy, but of a woman which he loued. But Titus Linus declarereth, that in an oration which Cato him selfe made, it was wrytten, that it was one of the GAULES: who beinge a traitor to his contry men, was come to Flaminius gate with his wife and children, and that Flaminius making him come into his halle, killed him with his owne handes, to please a boy he loued, that was desirous to see a man killed. Howbeit it is very likely that Cato wrote in this sorte, to aggravate the offence, and to make it more cruell. For, many haue wrytten it that it is true, and that he was no traitor, but an offender condemned to dye: and amongst other, Cicero the orator doth recite it in a booke he made of age, where he made it to be tolde vnto Catoes owne persone. Howe soeuer it was, Marcus Cato being chosen Censor, and cleansing the Senate of all vnworthy persones, he put of the same Lucius Quintius Flaminius, although he had bene Confull: which disgrace did seeme to redowne to his brother Titus Quintius Flaminius also. Whereupon both the brethren came weeping with all humility before the people, and made a petition that seemed very reasonable & ciuill: which was that they would commaunde Cato to come before them, to declare the cause openly why he had with such open shame defaced so noble a house as theirs was. Cato then without delay, or shrinking backe, came with his companion into the market place, where he asked Titus out alowde, if he knew nothing of the supper where such a fact was committed. Titus answered, he knew not of it. Then Cato opened all the whole matter as it was, and in the ende of his tale, he bad Lucius Quintius sweare openly, if he would deny that he had sayed E was true. Lucius answered not a worde. Whereupon the people iudged the shame was iustly layed vpon him: and so to honor Cato, they did accompany him from the pulpit for orations, home vnto his owne house. But Titus being much offended at the disgrace of his brother, became enemy to Cato, and fell in with those that of long time had hated him. And so by practise he procured of the Senate, that all bargaines of leases, and all deedes of sales made by Cato during his office, were called in, and made voyde: and caused many sales also to be commenced against him. Wherein, I can not say he did wisely or ciuilly, to become mortall enemy to an honest man, a good citizen, and duetifull in his office, for his yeare, but vnworthy kinsman, who had iustly deserued the shame layed vpon him. Notwithstanding, shortly after when the people were assembled in the Theater to see games played, & the Senators were according to their custome, in the most honorable places: Lucius Flaminius came in also, who in lowly and humble maner went to sit downe in the furthest seates of the Theater, without regard of his former honor: which when the people saw, they tooke pty of him, & could not abide to see him thus dishonored. So they cried out to haue him come and sit among the Senators the Consuls, who made him place, and receiued him accordingly. But to returne againe to Titus. The naturall ambition & couetous greedy minde he had of honor, was very well taken and esteemed, so long as he had any occasion offered him to exercise it in the warres, which we haue spoken of before. For, after he had bene Consul, of his owne seeking he became a Colonell of a thousand footemen, not being called to it by any man. So when he beganne to stoupe for age, and that he had giuen ouer as a man at the last cast, to beare office any longer in the state: they saw plainly he was ambitious beyond measure, to suffer himselfe in olde age to be overcome with such youthfull violence, beinge farre vnmeet for any of his yeares. For me thinks his ambition was the only cause that moued him to procure Hanniballs death, which bred him much disliking and ill opinion with many. For, after Hannibal had fled out of his owne contry, he went first vnto king Antiochus: who, after he lost the battell in Phrygia, was glad the ROMAINES graunted him peace with such conditions as them selues would. Wherefore Hannibal fled againe from him, and after he had long wandered vp and downe, at the length he came to the realme of Bithynia, and remained there about king Prusias, the ROMAINES knowinge it well enough: and bicause Hannibal was then an olde broken man, of no force nor power, and one whome fortune had spurned at her feete, they made no more reckening of him. But Titus beinge sent Ambassador by the Senate, vnto Prusias kinge of Bithynia, and findinge Hannibal there, it grieved him to see him aliue. So that notwithstandinge Prusias maruelously intreated him, to take pittie apon Hannibal a poore olde man, & his friend who came to him for succor: yet he could not perswade Titus to be content he should liue. Hannibal long before had receiued aunswer of his death from an oracle, to this effect.

The valliant corps of Hannibal, when he is dead and colde.*

So Hannibal vnderstoode that of LYBIA, as if he should haue dyed in AFRICK, and bene buried in CARTHAGE. There is a certaine sandy contry in BITHYNIA neere to the seas side, where there is a litle village called LIBYSSA, and where Hannibal remained continually. He mistrusting king Prusias saynte harte, and fearing the ROMAINES malice also, had made leuemy priuie caues and vaultes vnder ground longe before, that he might secretly go out at either of them which way he woulde, and euery one of them came to the maine vault where him selfe did lye, and could not be discerned outwardly. When it was tolde him that Titus had willed Prusias to deliuer him into his handes, he fought then to saue him selfe by those mynes: but he found that all the ventes out, had watch and ward apon them by the kinges commandement. So then he determined to kill him selfe. Now some say, that he wounde a linnen towell hard about his necke, and commaunded one of his men he should set his knee vpon his buttocke, and waying hard vpon him, holdinge the towell fast he should pull his necke backward with all the power and strength he could, and neuer linne pressing on him, till he had strangled him. Other say that he dranke bulles blood, as Midas and Themistocles had done before him. But Titus Linus vryeth, that he had poyson which he kept for such a purpose, and tempered it in a cuppe he helde in his handes, and before he dranke, he spake these wordes. Come on, let vs deliuer the ROMAINES of this great care, sith my life is so grievous to them, that they thinke it to long to tary the naturall death of a poore old man, whom they hate so much: and yet Titus by this shall winne no honorable victorie, nor worthie the memorie of the auncient ROMAINES, who aduertised king Pyrrus their enemy, euen when he made warres with them, and had wonne battels of them, that he should beware of poysoning which was intended towards him. And this was Hanniballs ende, as we finde it written. Thenewes whereof beinge come to ROME vnto the Senate, many of them thought Titus too violent and cruell, to haue made Hannibal kill him selfe in that sorte, when extremitie of age had ouercome him already, and was as a birde left naked, her feathers fallinge from her for age: and so much the more, bicause there was no instant occasion offered him to vrge him to doe it, but a couetous minde of honor, for that he would be chronicled to be the cause and author of Hanniballs death. And then in contrariwise they did much honor and commend the clemency and noble minde of Scipio AFRICAN. Who hauing ouercomen Hannibal in battell, in AFRICK selfe, and being then in deede to be feared, and had bene neuer ouercome before: yet he did not cause him to be driuen out of his contry, neither did aske him of the CARTHAGINIANS, but both then, & before the battell, when he parled with him of peace, he tooke Hannibal courteously by the hand, and after the battell, in the conditions of peace he gaue them, he neuer spake word of hurt to Hanniballs person, neither did he shew any cruelty to him in his misery. And they tell how afterwards they met againe together in the city of EPHESVS, and as they were walkinge, that Hannibal tooke the vpper hand of Scipio: and that Scipio bare it patiently, and left not of walkinge for that, neither shewed any countenance of mistaking. And in entering into discourse of many matters, they descended in the ende to talke of auncient Captaines: and Hannibal gaue iudgement, that Alexander the great was the famousst Capitaine, Pyrrus the second, and him selfe the thirde. Then Scipio smilinge, gently asked him: what wouldst thou say then, if I had not ouercome thee? Truly, quod Hannibal, I would not then put my selfe the third man, but the first, and aboue all the Captaines that euer were. So diuers greatly commendinge the goodly sayings and deedes of Scipio, did maruelously mislike Titus, for that he had (as a man may say) layed his handes vpon the death of an other man. Other to the contrary againe sayd, it was well done of him, sayinge, that Hannibal so longe as he liued, was a fire to the Empire of the ROMAINES, which lacked but one to blow it: and that when he was in his best force and lusty age, it was not his hande nor body that troubled the ROMAINES, so much, but his great wisdom and skill he had in the warres, and the mortall hate he bare in his hart towards the ROMAINES, which neither yeares, neither age would diminish or take away. For mens naturall conditions do remaine still, but fortune doth not alwayes keepe in a state, but chaungeth still, and then quickeneth vp our desires to set willingly vpon those that warre against vs, bicause they hate vs in their hartes. The thinges which fell out afterwards, did greatly proue the reasons brought out for this purpose, in discharge of Titus. For one Aristonicus, sonne of a daughter of a player vpon the citherne, vnder the fame and glory of Eumenes, whose bastard he was, filled all ASIA with warre & rebellion, by reason the people rose in his fauor. Againe Mithridates, after so many losses he had receiued against Sylla and Fimbria, and after so many armie ouerthrowen by battell and warres, and after so many famous Captaines lost and killed: did yet recouer againe, and came to be of great power both by sea and land against Lucullus. Truly Hannibal was no lower brought then Caius Marius had bene. For he had a king to his friend, that gaue him entertainment for him and his family, and made him Admirall of his shippes, and Generall of his horsemen and footemen in the field. Marius also went vp and downe AFRICK a begging for his liuing, in so much as his enemies at ROME mocked him to scorne: & soone after notwithstandinge they fell downe at his feete before him, when they saw they were whipped, murdered, and slaine within ROME by his commandement. Thus we see no man can say certainly he is meane or great, by reason of the vncertainty of thinges to come: consideringe there is but one death, and change of better life. Some say also, that Titus did not this act alone, and of his owne authority: but that he was sent Ambassador with Lucius Scipio to no other end, but to put Hannibal to death, by what meanes fouer they could. Furthermore after this Ambassade, we do not finde any notable thinge written of Titus worthy of memory, neither in peace, nor in warres. For he died quietly of naturall death at home in his contry.

THE COMPARISON OF Titus Quintius Flaminius with Philopemen.

Greece.*

IT is time now we cometo compare them together. Therefore as touching the great benefits that came to the GREECIANS, neither Philopemen, nor all the other former Capitaines are to be compared with Titus. For all the auncient Capitaines almost being GREECIANS, made warres with other GREECIANS: but Titus beinge a ROMAIN, and no GREECIAN, made warres for the liberty of GREECE. When Philopemen was not able to helpe his poore citizens distressed fore, & vexed with warres, he sayled away into CRETA. Titus hauing ouercome Philip kinge of MACEDON in battell, did restore againe liberty all the people and cities of the same, which were kept before in bondage. And if any wil narrowly examine the battells of either partie: they shall finde, that Philopemen beinge General of the ACHAIIANS, made more GREECIANS to be slaine, then Titus did of the MACEDONIANS, fightinge with them for the liberty of the GREECIANS. And for their imperfections, the one of them was ambitious, the other was as obstinate: the one was quicke and sodainly angered, the other was very hard to be pacified. Titus left kinge Philip his realme and crowne after he had ouercome him, and vsed great clemency towards the ÆTOLIANS: where Philopemen for spite, & malice, tooke townes and villages from his owne natie contry, and city, wherein he was borne, that had alwayes payed them tribute. Furthermore, Titus continued a founde friend to them, to whome he had once professed friendship, and done pleasure vnto: and Philopemen, in a gear and anger, was ready to take away that he had giuen, and to ouerthrow the pleasure and good turne he had shewed. For Philopemen when he had done the LACEDÆMONIANS great pleasure, did afterwards rafe the walls of their city, and spoyled and destroyed all their contry: and lastly, ouerthrew their whole gouernment. It seemeth also by reason of his immoderate choller, he was him selfe cause of his owne death, for that he made more hast then good speede, to go out of time to lye vpon those of MASSINA: and not as Titus, who did all his affaires with wisdom, and euer considered what was best to be done. But if we looke into the number of battells, and victories: the warre which Titus made against Philip was ended with two battells. Whereas Philopemen in infinite battells in which he had the better, neuer left it doutfull, but that his skill did euer helpe him the more to victory, then the good fortune he had. Moreouer, Titus wanne honor by meanes of the power of ROME, when it florished most, and was in best prosperitie: Philopemen made him selfe famous by his deedes, when GREECE beganne to stoupe and fall all together. So that the deedes of the one, were common to all the ROMAINES: & the dedes of the other, were priuate to him selfe alone. For Titus was General ouer good and valliant souldiers, that were already trained to his hand: and Philopemen being chosen Generall, did traine his men him selfe, & made them afterwards

A very expert and valliant, that were but meane and Greene souldiers before. And whereas Philopemen had continuall warres with the GREECIANS, it was not for any good fortune he had, but that he made a certaine prooffe of his valliantnesse. For where all other things are answerable to his, there we must iudge that such as ouercome, haue the most corage. Now Philopemen making warres with the most warlike nations of all GREECE, (as the CRETANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS) did ouercome the subtillest of them, by finenesse and policy: and the most valliant, by prowes and hardinesse. But Titus ouercame, by putting that only in practise, which was already found and stablished: as the discipline of the warres, and order of battell, in the which his souldiers had longe before bene trained. Whereas Philopemen brought into his contry, both the one and the other, and altered all the order which before they were accustomed vnto. So that the chiefe point how to winne a battell, was found out a new, and brought in by the one, into a place where it was neuer before: and onely employed by the other, which could very good skill to vse it, and had founde it out already before. Againe, touching the valliant actes done in the person of them selues, many notable actes may be told of Philopemen, but none of Titus: but rather to the contrary. For there was one Archidamus an ÆTOLIAN, who flowinge Titus one day, sayd in his reproche: that at a day of battell, when Philopemen ranne with his sword in his hande, to that side where he saw the MACEDONIANS fightinge, & making hed against the enemy, Titus held vp his hands vnto heauen, and was busie at his prayers to the gods, not stirring one foote, when it was more time to handle the sword, & to fight of all handes. All the goodly deedes Titus euer did, were done alwaies as a Consul, or Lieutenant, or a Magistrate: whereas Philopemen shewed him selfe vnto the ACHAIIANS, a man no lesse valliant, and of execution, being out of office, then when he was a Generall. For when he was a Generall, he did driue Nabis the tyrant of the LACEDÆMONIANS out of MESSINA, and deliuered the MESSENIANS out of bondage: and being a priuate man, he shut the gates of the city of SPARTA, in the face of Diophanes (Generall of the ACHAIIANS) and of Titus Quintius Flaminius, and kept them both from comming in, and thereby saued the city from sacking. Thus being borne to commaunde, he knew not only how to commaunde according to the law, but could commaunde the law it selfe apone necessity, & when the common wealth required it. For at such a time he would not tary, while the Magistrates which should gouerne him, did geue him authority to commaund, but he tooke it of him selfe, and vsed them when the time serued: esteeming him in deede their Generall, that knew better then they what was to be done, then him whom they chose of them selues. And therefore they doe well, that doe commend Titus actes, for his clemency, and curtesie, vsed to the GREECIANS: but much more the noble and valliant actes of Philopemen vnto the ROMAINES. For it is much easier to please and gratifie the weake, then it is to hurt and resist the strong. Therefore, sithence we haue thoroughly examined, and compared the one with the other: it is very harde to iudge altogether the difference that is betwene them. Peraduenture therefore the iudgement would not seeme very ill, if we doe geue the GREECIAN, for discipline of warre, the preheminance and praise of a good Capitaine: and to the ROMAINE, for iustice and clemency, the name and dignity of a most iust and curteous gentleman.

THE LIFE OF Pyrrus.

Pyrrus kin-red, and beginning of the kingdom of Epirus.

Pyrrus, redd.

How Pyrrus being an infant was sa-ned.

It is writtē that since Noes flood, the first king of the THESPROTIANS, and of the MOLOSSIANS, was Phæton, one of those who came with Pelasgus, into the realme of EPIRVS. But some say otherwise, that Demalson, and his wife Pyrra remained there, after they had built and founded the temple of Dodone, in the contrie of the MOLOSSIANS. But howsoever it was, a great while after that, Neoptolemus the sonne of Achilles, bringing thither a great number of people with him, conquered the contry, and after him left a succession of kinges, which were called after his name, the Pyrrides: bicause that from his infancy he was surnamed Pyrrus, as much to say, as redde: and one of his legitimate sonnes whom he had by Lanassa, the daughter of Cleodes, the sonne of Hillus, was also named by him Pyrrus. And this is the cause why Achilles is honored as a god in EPIRVS, being called in their language, Aspetos, that is to say, mighty, or very great. But from the first kinges of that race vntill the time of Tharrys, as there is no memory nor mencion made of them, nor of their power that reigned in the meane time, bicause they all became very barbarous, and vitterly voyde of ciuility. Tharrys was in deede the first that beautified the cities of his contry with the GRECIAN tongue, brought in ciuill lawes and customes, and made his name famous to the posterity that followed. This Tharrys left a sonne called Alceas, of Alceas came Arymbas, of Arymbas and Troiade his wife, came AEAcides, who married Phthia, the daughter of Menon THESSALIAN: A famous man in the time of the warres surnamed Lamiacus, and one that had farre greater authority then any other of the confederates, after Leosthenes. This AEAcides had two daughters by his wife Phthia, to say, Deidamia and Troiade, and one sonne called Pyrrus. In his time the MOLOSSIANS rebelled, draue him out of his kingdom, & put the crowne into the hands of the sonnes of Neoptolemus. Whereupon all the friends of AEAcides that could be taken, were generally murdered, and slaine outright. Androclides, & Angelus in the meane time stole away Pyrrus, being yet but a suckling babe (whome his enemies neuertheless egerly sought for to haue destroyed) and fled away with him as fast as possibly they might, with few seruantes, his nurses and necessary women only to looke to the childe, and giue it sucke: by reason whereof their flight was much hindered, so as they could go no great iorneyes, but that they might easily be ouertaken by them that followed. For which cause they put the childe into the hands of

Androclion, Hippias, and Neander, three lusty young men, whome they trusted with him, and commaunded them to runne for life to a certaine citie of MACEDON, called MEGARES: and they them selues in the meane time, partly by intreaty, & partly by force, made stay of those that followed them till night. So as with much a doe hauinge driuen them backe, they ranne after them that caried the childe Pyrrus, whom they ouertooke at sunne set. And now, wening they had bene safe, and out of all daunger: they found it cleane contrary. For when they came to the riuer vnder the towne wallles of MEGARES, they saw it so rough and swift, that it made them afrayed to beholde it: and when they gaged the forde, they found it vnpossible to wade through, it was so fore risen and troubled with the fall of the raine, besides that the darkenesse of the night made euery thing seeme feareful vnto them. So as they now that caried the child, thought it not good to venter the passage ouer of themselues alone, with the women that tended the childe: but hearing certaine contrymen on the other side, they prayed and besought them in the name of the goddess, that they would helpe them to passe ouer the child, shewing Pyrrus vnto them a farre off. But the contrymen by reason of the roaringe of the riuer vnderstoode them not. Thus they continued a longe space, the one cryinge, the other lyfing, yet could they not vnderstand one an other, till at the last one of the company bethought him selfe to pill of a peece of the barke of an oke, & vpon that he wrote with the tongue of a buckle, the hard fortune and necessity of the childe. Which he tyed to a stone to geue it weight, and so threw it ouer to the other side of the riuer: other say that he did prick the barke through with the point of a dart which he cast ouer. The contrymen on the other side of the riuer, hauinge read what was wrytten, and vnderstanding thereby the present daunger the childe was in: felled downe trees in all the hast they could possibly, bounde them together, and so passed ouer the riuer. And it fortuned that the first man of them that passed ouer, and tooke the childe, was called Achilles: the residue of the contrymen passed ouer also, and tooke the other that came with the childe, and conueyed them ouer as they came first to hand. And thus hauing elscaped their hâds, by easie iorneyes they came at the length vnto Glaucias king of ILLYRIA, whom they found in his house sitting by his wife: and layed downe the childe in the midst of the flower before him. The king hereupon stayed a long time without vttering any one word, waying with him selfe what was best to be done: bicause of the feare he had of Cassander, a mortall enemy of AEAcides. In the meane time, the childe Pyrrus creeping of all foure, tooke hold of the kinges gowne, and scrawled vp by that, and so got vp on his feete against the kings knees. At the first, the king laughed to see the childe: but after it pitied him againe, bicause the child seemed like an humble luter that came to seeke sanctuary in his armes. Other say that Pyrrus came not to Glaucias, but vnto the alter of the familiar gods, alongest the which he got vp on his feete, and embraced it with both his hands. Which Glaucias imagining to be done by gods providence, presently deliuered the childe to his wife, gaue her the charge of him, and willed her to see him brought vp with his owne. Shortly after, his enemies sent to demaunde the childe of him: and moreover, Cassander caused two hundred talents to be offered him, to deliuer the childe Pyrrus into his handes. Howbeit Glaucias would neuer graunt thereunto, but contrarily, when Pyrrus was comen to twelue yeares olde, brought him into his contry of EPIRVS with an army, and stablished him king of the realme againe. Pyrrus had a great maiesty in his countenance, but yet in deede more fearefull then frendly. He had also no teeth in his vpper iawe that stode distinctly one from an other, but one whole bone through out his gomme, marked a litle at the top only, with certaine rifes in the place where the teeth should be deuided. Men helde opinion also, that he did heale them that were sicke of the splene, by sacrificing a white cocke, and touchinge the place of the splene on the left side of them that were sicke, softly with his right foote, they lying on their backs: and there was not so poore nor simple a man that craued this remedy of him, but he gaue it him, and tooke the cocke he sacrificed, for reward of the remedy, which pleased him very well. They say also that the great toe of his right foote had some secrete vertue in it. For when he was dead, and that they had burnt all partes of his body, and consumed it to ashes: his great toe was whole, and had no hurt at all. But of that, we will wryte more hereafter. Now, when he was seuentene yeares of age, thinking him selfe sure enough of his kingdom, it chaunced him to make a iorney into ILLY-

RIA, where he married one of Glauclus daughters, with whom he had bene brought vp. But his backe was no sooner turned, but the Molossians rebelled againe against him, & draue out his friends, & seruants, and destroyed all his goods, and yelded themselves vnto his aduersary Neoptolemus. King Pyrrus hauing thus lost his kingdom, & seeing himself forsaken on all sides, went to Demetrius (Antigonus sonne) that had married his sister Deidamia, who in her young age was assured to Alexander, the sonne of Alexander the great, and of Roxane, and was called his wife. But when all that race was brought to wicked ende, Demetrius then married her, being come to full and able age. And in that great battell which was striken neere to the citie of Hirsvs, where all the kinges fought together, Pyrrus being then but a young man, and with Demetrius, put them all to flight that fought with him, and was worthely reputed for the valiantest prince amongst them all. Furthermore, when Demetrius was ouercome, and had lost the battell: Pyrrus neuer forooke him, but faithfully did keepe for him the cities of Greece, which he put into his hands. And afterwards when peace was concluded betwixt Demetrius and Ptolomie, Pyrrus was sent an ostage for Demetrius into the realme of Egypte: where he made Ptolomie know (both in huntinge, and in other exercises of his persone) that he was very strong, harde, and able to endure any labor. Furthermore perceiuing that Berenice amongst all king Ptolomies wiues, was best beloued and esteemed of her husbande, both for her vertue and wisdom: he beganne to entertaine and honor her aboue all the rest. For he was a man that could tell how to humble him selfe towards the great (by whom he might winne benefit) and knewe also how to creepe into their credit: and in like manner was he a great comfort and despirer of such as were his inferiors. Moreouer, for that he was found maruelous honorable and of fayer condicion, he was preferred before all other young princes, to be the husbande of Antigona, the daughter of Queene Berenice, whom he had by Philip, before he was married vnto Ptolomie. From thenceforth growing through the allyance of that marriage, more and more into estimation and fauor by means of his wife Antigona, who shewed her selfe very vertuous and louing towards him: he found means in the ende, to get both men and money to returne againe into the realme of Epirvs, and to conquer it: so was he then very well receiued of the people, and the better, for the malice they bare to Neoptolemus, bicause he did both hardly and cruelly with them. That notwithstanding, Pyrrus searinge least Neoptolemus would repaire vnto some of the other kings, to seeke ayde against him, thought good to make peace with him, whereupon it was agreed betwene them, that they should both together be kinges of Epirvs. But in proceesse of time, some of their men secretly made strife againe betwene them, and set them at defiance one with an other: and the chiefest cause as it is sayd, that angered Pyrrus most, grew upon this. The kinges of Epirvs had an auncient custome of great antiquity, after they had made solemne sacrifice vnto Iupiter Martiall, (in a certaine place in the prouince of Molosside, called Passaron) to take their othe, and to be sworne to the Epirotes, that they would raigne well and iustly, accordinge to the lawes and ordinances of the contry: and to receiue the subsidies othes interchangeably also, that they would defend and maintaine them in their kingdom, accordinge to the lawes in like manner. This ceremony was done in the presence of both the kinges, and they with their frendes did both geue and receiue presentes eche of other. At this meetinge and solemnity, amongst other, one Gelon a most faithfull seruant and assured frend vnto Neoptolemus, who besides great shewes of frendshipp and honor he did vnto Pyrrus, gaue him two payer of draught oxen, which one Myrrilus a cuppebearer of Pyrrus beinge present, and seeinge, did craue of his master. But Pyrrus denyed to geue them vnto him whereat Myrrilus was very angry. Gelon perceiuing that Myrrilus was angry, prayed him to suppe with him that night. Now some say, he sought to abuse Myrrilus, bicause he was fayer and younge: and beganne to perswade him after supper to take parte with Neoptolemus, and to poyson Pyrrus. Myrrilus made as though he was willinge to geue eare to this perswasion, and to be well pleased withall. But in the meane time, he went and tolde his master of it, by whose commaundement he made Alexicrates, Pyrrus chiefe cuppebearer, to talke with Gelon about this practise, as though he had also geuen his consent to it, and was willinge to be partaker of the enterprise. This did Pyrrus to haue two witnesses, to proue the pretended poysoninge of him. Thus Gelon beinge finely deceived, and

A Neoptolemus also with him, both imagininge they had cunningly sponne the threde of their treason: Neoptolemus was so glad of it, that he could not keepe it to him selfe, but told it to certaine of his frendes. And on a time goinge to be merry with his sister, he could not keepe it in, but must be prating of it to her, supposinge no body had heard him but her selfe, bicause there was no liuing creature neere them, sauing Phaenareta Samons wife, the kinges chiefe heardman of all his beastes, and yet she was layed upon a litle bed by, and turned towards the wall: so that she seemed as though she had slept. But hauing heard all their talke, and no body mistrustling her: the next morninge she went to Antigona king Pyrrus wife, and told her euery word what she had heard Neoptolemus say to his sister. Pyrrus hearing this, made no countenance of any thing at that time. But hauing made sacrifice vnto the goddes, he bad Neoptolemus to supper at his house, where he slue him, being well informed before of the good will the chiefe men of the realme did beare him, who wished him to dispatch Neoptolemus, & not to content him selfe with a peece of Epirvs only, but to follow his naturall inclination, being borne to great things: and for this cause therefore, this supposition fallinge out in the meane while, he prevented Neoptolemus, and slue him first. And furthermore, rememberinge the pleasures he had receiued of Ptolomie and Berenice, he named his first sonne by his wife Antigona, Ptolomie, and hauing built a city in the Presque, an Ile of Epirvs, did name it Berenicida. When he had done that, imagininge great matters in his head, but more in his hope, he first determined with him selfe howe to winne that which lay neereft vnto him: and so tooke occasion by this means, first to fet foote into the Empire of Macedon. The eldest sonne of Cassander, called C Antipater, put his owne mother Thessalonica to death, and draue his brother Alexander out of his owne contry, who sent to Demetrius for helpe, and called in Pyrrus also to his ayde. Demetrius beinge troubled with other matters, could not so quickly go thither. And Pyrrus beinge ariued there, demanded for his charge susteined, the citie of Nympha, with all the sea coastes of Macedon: and besides all that, certaine landes also that were not belonginge to the auncient crowne and reuenues of the kinges of Macedon, but were added vnto it by force of armes, as Ambracia, Acarnania, and Amphilochia. All these, the young king Alexander leauinge vnto him, he tooke possession thereof, and put good garrisons into the same in his owne name: and conqueringe the rest of Macedon in the name of Alexander, put his brother D Antipater to great distresse. In the meane time kinge Lysimachus lacked no good will to helpe Antipater with his force, but beinge busied in other matters, had not the meane to doe it. Howbeit knowinge very well that Pyrrus in acknowledginge the great pleasures he had receiued of Ptolomie, would deny him nothinge: he determined to wryte counterfeate letters to him in Ptolomies name, and thereby instantly to pray and require him to leaue of the warres begonne against Antipater, and to take of him towards the defrayinge of his charges, the summe of three hundred talentes. Pyrrus openinge the letters, knew straight that this was but a fetch and deule of Lysimachus. For king Ptolomies common manner of greeting of him, which he vied at the beginninge of his letters, was not in them obserued: To my sonne Pyrrus, health. But in those counterfeate was, king Ptolomie vnto king Pyrrus, health. Whereupon he presently pronounced Lysimachus for a naughty man: neuerthelesse, afterwards he made peace with Antipater, and they met together at a day appointed, to be sworne vpon the sacrifices vnto the articles of peace. There were three beastes brought to be sacrificed, a goat, a bul, and a ramme: of the which, the ramme fell downe dead of him selfe before he was touched, whereat all the standers by fell a laughinge. But there was a Soothfayer, one Theodotus, that perswaded Pyrrus not to sweare: saying, that this signe and token of the gods did threaten one of the three kinges with sodaine death. For which cause Pyrrus concluded no peace. Now Alexanders warres beinge ended, Demetrius notwithstandinge came to him, knowinge well enough at his cominge that Alexander had no more neede of his aide, and that he did it only but to feare him. They had not bene many dayes together, but thone beganne to mistrust thother, and to spie all the wayes they could to intrappe eche other: but Demetrius embracinge the first occasion offered, prevented Alexander, and slue him, being a young man, and proclaimed him selfe king of Macedon in his roome. Now Demetrius had certaine quarrells before against Pyrrus, bicause he had ouerrunne the contry of Thessalie: and furthermore, greedy couetousnes to haue the more (which is a common vice with princes and noble men) made, that being so neere neighbours, the one stood in feare and mistrust of the other, and yet much more after the death of Deidamia. But now that they both occupied all MACEDON betwene them, and were to make diuision of one selfe kingdome. Now I say began the matter and occasion of quarrell, to grow the greater betwene them. Whereupon Demetrius went with his army to set upon the ANTONIANS, and hauing conquered the contry, left Pantauchus his Lieutenaunt there with a great army: and him selfe in person in the meane time, marched against Pyrrus, and Pyrrus on the other side against him. They both missed of meetinge, and Demetrius goinge on further on the one side, entered into the realme of EPYRVS, and brought a great spoyle away with him: Pyrrus on the other side marched on, till he came to the place where Pantauchus was. To whom he gaue battell, and it was valiantly fought out betwene the souldiers of either party, but especially betwene the two Generalls. For doubtlesse, Pantauchus was the valliantest Capitaine, the stoutest man, and of the greatest experience in armes, of all the Captaines and souldiers Demetrius had. Whereupon, Pantauchus trusting in his strength and corage, aduanced him selfe forwardes, and lustely challenged the combat of Pyrrus. Pyrrus on the other side being inferior to no king in valliantnes, nor in desire to winne honor, as he that would ascribe vnto himselfe the glory of Achilles, more for the imitation of his valliancy, then for that he was descended of his blood: passed through the midst of the battell vnto the first rancke, to buckle with Pantauchus. Thus they beganne to charge one another, first with their darts, and then coming nearer, fought with their swordes, not only artificially, but also with great force and fury: vntill such time as Pyrrus was hurte in one place, and he hurte Pantauchus in two. The one neere vnto his throte and the other in his legge: so as in the ende Pyrrus made him turne his backe, and threw him to the ground, but neuertheless killed him not. For, so soone as he was downe, his men tooke him, and caried him away. But the EPYROTES encouraged by the victory of their kinge, and the admiration of his valliantnesse, stucke to it so lustely, that in the end they brake the battell of the MACEDONIAN footemen: & hauing put them to flight, followed them so lustely, that they slewe a great number of them, and tooke fise thousande prisoners. This ouerthrowe did not so much fill the hartes of the MACEDONIANS with anger, for the losse they had receiued, nor with the hate conceiued against Pyrrus: as it wanne Pyrrus great fame & honor, making his corage and valliantnes to be wondered at of all such as were present at the battell that saw him fight, and how he layed about him. For they thought that they saw in his face the very life and agility of Alexander the great, and the right shadow as it were, shewing the force and fury of Alexander him selfe in that fight. And where other kinges did but only counterfeate Alexander the great in his purple garments, and in numbers of souldiers and gardes about their persones, and in a certaine faction and bowing of their neckes a litle, and in vntering his speech with an high voyce: Pyrrus only was like vnto him, and followed him in his marshall deedes and valliant actes. Furthermore, for his experience and skill in warlike discipline, the bookes he wrote him selfe thereof, do amply proue and make manifest. Furthermore, they report, that kinge Antigonus being asked, whome he thought to be the greatest Capitaine: made answer, Pyrrus, so farre forth as he might liue to be olde, speaking only of the Captaines of his time. But Hanniball generally sayd, Pyrrus was the greatest Capitaine of experience and skill in warres of all other, Scipio the second, and him selfe the third: as he wrytten in the life of Scipio. So it seemeth that Pyrrus gaue his whole life and study to the discipline of warres, as that which in dede was princely and meete for a king, making no reckoning of all other knowledge. And furthermore touching this matter, they report that he being at a feast one day, a question was asked him, whom he thought to be the best player of the flute, Pythion or Cephesias: whereunto he answered, that Poliperchon in his opinion was the best Capitaine, as if he would haue sayd, that was the only thing a prince should seeke for, and which he ought chiefly to learne and know. He was very gentle and familiar with his frendes, easie to forgeue when any had offended him, and maruelous desirous to requite and acknowledge any curtesie or pleasure by him receiued. And that was the cause why he did very vnpruently take the death of Aeropus, not so much for his death (which he knewe was a common thing to euery liuing creature) as for that he was angry with himselfe he had deferred the time so long, that time it selfe had cut him off from all occasion and meanes to requite the curtesies he had receiued of him. True it is that money lent, may be repayed againe vnto the heires of the lender: but yet it greueth an honest nature, when he can not recompence the good will of the lender, of whom he hath receiued the goodturne. An other time Pyrrus being in the city of AMBRACIA, there were certaine of his frends that gaue him counsell to put a naughty man out of the city that did nothing but speake ill of him. But he answered, it is better (quod he) to keepe him here still, speakinge ill of vs but to a fewe: then driving him away, to make him speake ill of vs euery where. Certaine youtnes were brought before him on a time, who making mery together, drinking freely, were bolde with the king to speake their pleasure of him in very vnductuall sorte. So, Pyrrus askinge them whether it was true they layed so or no: it is true, and it please your grace, sayed one of them, we sayed it in dede, and had not our wine failed vs, we had spoken a great deale more. The king laughed at it, and pardoned them. After the death of Antigona, he married many wiues to increafe his power withall, and to gette more frendes. For he married the daughter of Antoleon kinge of PEONIA, and Bircenna the daughter of Bardillus, kinge of ILLYRIA, and Lanassa, the daughter of Agathocles, tyrant of SYRACUSA, that brought him for her dower the Ile of CORPHE, which her father had taken. By Antigona his first wife, he had a sonne called Prolemie: By Lanassa, an other called Alexander: and by Bircenna, an other (the youngest of all) called Helenus: all which though they were marshall men by race and naturall inclination, yet were they brought vp by him in warres, and therein trained as it were euen from their cradell. They wryte, that one of his sonnes beinge but a boy, asked him one day to which of them he would leaue his kingdome: Pyrrus answered the boy, to him that hath the sharpest sworde. That was much like the tragical curse wherewith Oedipus cursed his children.

So cruell, hatefull, and beastly is the nature of ambition and desire of rule. But after this battell, Pyrrus returned home againe to his contry, full of honor and glory, his hart highly exalted, and his minde thoroughly contented. And as at his returne the EPYROTES his subiectes called him an Eagle, he answered them: if I be an Eagle, it is through you that I am so, for your weapons are the wings that haue raised me vp. Shortly after, beinge aduertised that Demetrius was fallen sicke, and in great danger of death, he sodainly went into MACEDON, only to inuade it, and to make pray thereof: howbeit he had in dede almost taken the whole realme, and made him selfe Lord of all without stroke striken. For he came as farre as the city of EDESSA, and found no resistance: but rather to the contrary, many of the contry willingly came to his campe, and submitted them selues. The daunger Demetrius was in to loose his realme, did moue him more: then the diseafe and sickenes of his body. And on the other side, his frendes, seruauntes, and Captaines, hauing gathered a great number of men of warre together in maruelous short time, marched with great speede towards Pyrrus, beinge earnestly bent to do some exploit against him: who beinge come into MACEDON but to make a roade only upon them, would not tary them, but fled, and flying, lost parte of his men, because the MACEDONIANS followed him hard, and set upon him by the way. But now, though they had driuen Pyrrus thus easily out of MACEDON, Demetrius for all that did not make light accompt of him: but pretending greater things, (as to recouer the landes and dominions of his father, with an army of an hundred thousand fighting men, and of fise hundred sayle which he put to the sea) would not stande to make warres against Pyrrus, neither yet leaue the MACEDONIANS (whilst he was absent) so daungerous a neighbour, and so ill to deale withall. But lacking leasure to make warres with Pyrrus, concluded a peace with him, to the ende he might with the more liberty set upon the other kinges. Thus now, the peace concluded betwixt Demetrius & Pyrrus, the other kinges and princes beganne to finde out Demetrius intent, and why he had made so great preparation and beinge afraied thereof, wrote vnto Pyrrus by their Ambassadors, that they wondered how he could let go such oportunitie and occasion, and to tary till Demetrius might with better leasure make warres vpon him. And why he chose rather to tary & fight with him at the altures, temples, and sepulchers of the MOLOSSIANS, when he shoulde be of greater power, and haue no warres elsewhere to trouble him: then now that he might easily drive him out of MACEDON, hauing fo many things in hand, & being troubled as he was in other places. And considering also that very lately he had taken one of his wiues from him, with the city of CORPHE. For Lanassa milkinge, that Pyrrus loued his other wiues better than her, (they being of a barbarous natio) got her vnto CORPHE, & desiring to marry some other king, sent for Demetrius, knowinge that he of all other kings would soonest be wonne thereunto. Whereupon Demetrius went thither, and married her, and left a garrison in his cite of CORPHE. Nowe these other kings that did aduertise Pyrrus in this sorte, then selues did trouble Demetrius in the meane while: who tracted time, & yet went on with his preparation notwithstanding. For on the one side, Ptolomie entred GREECE with a great army by sea, where he caused the cities to reuolt against him. And Lysimachus on the other side also, entering into high MACEDON by the contry of THRACIA, burnt and spoyled all as he went. Pyrrus also arminge him selfe with them, went vnto the city of BERROEA, imagining (as afterwarde it fell out) that Demetrius goinge against Lysimachus, would leaue all the lowe contry of MACEDON naked, without garrison or defence. And the selfe same night that Pyrrus departed, he imagined that king Alexander the great did call him, and that also he went vnto him, & found him sicke in his bed, of whom he had very good wordes and entertainment: in so much as he promised to helpe him thoroughly. And Pyrrus imagined also that he was fo bolde to demand of him againe: how (my Lord) can you helpe me, that lye sicke in your bed? and that Alexander made answer: with my name only. And that moreouer he sodainly therewithall got vp on his horse Nisea, & rode before Pyrrus to guide him the way. This vision he had in his dreame, by which made him bolde, and furthermore encouraged him to goe on with his enterprise. By which occasion, marching forward with all speede, in few dayes he ended his intended iorney to the city of BERROEA, which sodainly he tooke at his first comming to it: the most parte of his army he layed in garrison there, the residue he sent away vnder the conduct of his Captaines, here and there, to conquer the cities thereabouts. Demetrius hauing intelligence hereof, and hearing also an ill rumor that ranne in his campe amongst the MACEDONIANS, durst not leade them any further, for feare least (when he should come nere to Lysimachus beinge a MACEDONIAN king by nation, & a prince esteemed for a famous captaine) they would thinke from him, & take Lysimachus parte: for this cause therefore he turned againe vpon the sodaine against Pyrrus, as against a straunge prince, & ill beloued of the MACEDONIANS. But when he came to incampe nere him, many cominge from BERROEA into his campe, blew abroad the praises of Pyrrus, saying, that he was a noble prince, inuincible in warres, & one that courteously intreated all those he tooke to his party: & amongst those, there were other that were natural MACEDONIANS borne, but set on by Pyrrus, & fained them selues to be MACEDONIANS, who gaue out, that nowe occasion was offered to set them at liberty, from Demetrius pride and stately rule, and to take kinge Pyrrus parte, that was a courteous prince, and one that loued fouldiers and men of warre. These wordes made the most parte of Demetrius army very doubtful, in so much as the MACEDONIANS looked about, to see if they could finde out Pyrrus to yelde them selues vnto him. He had at that present left of his head peece: by meane whereof, perceiuing he was not knownen, he put it on againe, and then they knew him a farre off, by the sight of his goodly fayer plume, and the goates hornes which he caried on the toppe of his creast. Whereupon there came a great number of MACEDONIANS to his parte, as vnto their soueraine Lord and king, and required the watche word of him. Other put garlandes of oken boughes about their heads, because they saw his men crowned after that sorte. And some were fo bolde also, as to go to Demetrius him selfe, and tell him, that in their opinions he should do very well and wisely to geue place to fortune, and referre all vnto Pyrrus. Demetrius hereupon, seeing his campe in such vprore, was so amased, that he knewe not what way to take, but flete away secretly, disguised in a threde bare cloke, & a hood on his head to keepe him from knowledge. Pyrrus forthwith leaped vpon his campe, tooke all that he founde, and was presently proclaimed in the field, king of MACEDON. Lysimachus on thother side, came straight thither after him, and sayed that he had holpen to chase Demetrius out of his realme, and therefore claimed halfe the kingdom with him. Wherefore, Pyrrus not trustinge the MACEDONIANS

As farre as yet, but rather standing in doubt of their faith: granted Lysimachus his desire, and thereupon deuided all the cities and prouinces of the realme of MACEDON betwene them. This partition was profitable for them both at that present, and stood then to good purpose to pacifie the warre, that otherwise might sodainly haue risen betwene them. But shortly after, they found that this partition was no end of their enmity, but rather a beginning of quarrell and dissenbation betwene them. For they whose avarice and insatiable greedy appetite, neither the sea, the mountains, nor the vnhabitable desertes could containe, nor yet the confines that separate ASIA from EVROPE determine: howe should they be content with their owne, without vslurping others, when their frontiers ioyne so neere together, that nothing deuides them? Sure it is not possible. For to say truly, they are willingly together by the eares, by hauing these two cursed things rooted in them: that they continually seeke occasion how to surprise eche other, and either of them enuies his neighbours well doing. Howbeit in apparance they vye these two tearmes, of peace and warres, as they doe money: vlinge it as they thinke good, not accordinge to right and iustice, but for their priuate profit. And truly they are men of farre greater honesty, that make open warre, and auow it: then those that disguise and colour the delay of their wicked purpose, by the holy name of iustice or frendship. Which Pyrrus did truly then verifie. For desiring to keepe Demetrius downe from risinge an other time, and that he should not reuiue againe as escaped from a long dangerous disease: he went to aide the GREECIANS against him, and was at ATHENS, where they suffered him to come into the castell, and doe sacrifice there vnto the goddesse Athena. But comming out of the castle againe the same day, he tolde the ATHENIANS he was greatly beholdinge vnto them for their curtesie, and the great trust they had reposed in him: wherefore to requite them againe, he gaue them counsell, neuer to suffer prince nor king from thenceforth to enter into their city, if they were wife, nor once open their gates vnto them. So, after that he made peace with Demetrius, who within shorthe time beinge gone to make warres in ASIA, Pyrrus yet once againe (perfwaded thereunto by Lysimachus) caused all THESSALIE to rise against him, & went him selfe to set vpon those garrisons which Demetrius had left in the cities of GREECE, liking better to continue the MACEDONIANS in warre, then to leaue them in peace: besides that him selfe also was of such a nature, as could not long continue in peace. Demetrius thus in the end being vtterly ouerthrowen in SYRIA, Lysimachus seeing him selfe free from feare on that side, and being at good leasure, as hauing nothing to trouble him otherwayes: went straight to make warre apon Pyrrus, who then remained neere vnto the city of EDESSA, & meeting by the way with the conuoy of vittells comming towards him, set vpon the conductors, and rifled them wholly. By this meane, first he distressed Pyrrus for want of vittells: then he corrupted the princes of MACEDON with letters & messengers, declaring vnto the, what shame they sustained to haue made a stranger their king (whose auncelsters had euer bene their vassalls & subiectes) and to haue turned all those out of MACEDON, that had bene familiar frendes of king Alexander the great. Many of the MACEDONIANS were wonne by these perswasions, which first so feared Pyrrus, that he departed out of MACEDON with his men of warre, the EPAGORYS, and other his confederates: and so lost MACEDON by the selfe same meane he wanne it. Kinges and princes therefore must not blame priuate men, though they change and alter sometime for their profit: for therein they do but follow the example of princes, who teachie them all disloyalty, treason, and infidelity, iudging him most worthy of gaine, that least obserueth iustice and equity. So Pyrrus being come home againe to his kingdom of EPIRVS, forsakinge MACEDON altogether, fortune made him happy enough, and in deede he had good meanes to liue peaceably at home, without any trouble, if he could haue contented him selfe only with the souerainty ouer his owne naturall subiectes. But thinking, that if he did neither hurt other, nor that other did hurt him, he could not tell how to spend his time, and by peace he should pyne away for sorow, as Homer sayd of Achilles:

He languished and pynde by taking ease and rest:

And in the warres where trauaile was, he liked ever best.

their force, nor yet deuise how to pacifie the same, by reason of the rashnesse, folly, and wickednes of their gouernours, who perswaded them to make Pyrrus their General, and to send for him for to conduct these warres: because he was lesse troubled at that time, then any of the other kings about them, and was esteemed of euery man also to be a noble fouldier, and famous Captaine. The elders, and wise men of the city, vterly misliked that counsell: but some of them were put to silence, through the noyle and fury of the people, who cried for warres. So another seeing them checked, and taken vp by the multitude in this manner, woulde no more repaire to their common assemblies. Among the rest, there was one Meton, an honest worshipsfull citizen, who when the day was come that the people shoulde conclude in counsel, the decree for the calling in of Pyrrus: all the people of TARENTVM being assembled, & set in the Theater, this Meton put an olde withered garlande of flowers vpon his head, and carrying a torch in his hande as though he had bene dronke, and hauing a woman minstrell before him playing on a pype, went dauncing in this goodly aray through the middelt of the whole assembly. And there, (as it happeneth commonly in euery hurly burly of people that will be makers them selues, and where no good order is kept) some of them clapped their handes, other burst out in a laughter, and euery man suffered him to doe what he lust: but they all cried out to the woman minstrell, to play on and spare not, and to Meton him selfe, that he shoulde sing, and come forward. So Meton made thewe as though he prepared him selfe vnto it: and when they had geuen silence to heare him sing, he spake vnto them with a loud voice in this manner. My Lordes of TARENTVM, ye doe well sure, not to forbid them to play and to be merry that are so disposed, whilst they may lawfully do it: and if ye be wise, euery of you also (as many as you be) will take your liberty whilst you may enjoy it. For when king Pyrrus shalbe in this city, you shall liue I warrant ye after an other sorte, and not as ye now do. These wordes of Meton moued many of the TARENTINES, and sodainly there ran a rumour through all the assembly, that he had sayed truly. But they that had offended the ROMAINES, fearing if peace were made, that they shoulde be deliuered into their handes, they checked the people, asking them if they were such foolles, as woulde abide to be mocked and played withall to their teeth: and with those wordes all ranne vpon Meton, and draue him out of the Theater. The decree thus confirmed by voyces of the people, they sent Ambassadors into EPHROSIA to carry presents vnto king Pyrrus, not only from the TARENTINES, but from other GREEKES also that dwelt in ITALIE, saying that they stood in neede of a wise and skilful Captaine, that was reputed famous in martiall discipline. And as to the rest, for numbers of good fouldiers, they had men enough in ITALIE, & were able to bring an army into the field, of the LUCANIANES, the MESSAPIANES, the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, of twenty thousand horse, & three hundred thousand footemen being all assembled together. These wordes of the Ambassadors did not only lift vp Pyrrus harte, but made the EPHROSIA also maruelous desirous to go this iorney. There was in king Pyrrus courte one Cineas the SALIAN, a man of great vnderstanding, and that had bene Demosithenes the orators scholler, who seemed to be the only man of all other in his time in common reputation, to be most eloquent, following the lively image and shadow of Demosithenes passing eloquence. This Cineas, Pyrrus euer entertained about him, and sent him Ambassador to the people and cities thereabouts: where he verified Euripides wordes.

As much as trenchant blades, in mighty handes may doe, So much can skill of eloquence, achieve and conquer too.

And therefore Pyrrus would often say, that Cineas had wonne him more townes with his eloquence, then him selfe had done by the sword for which he did greatly honor and imploy him in all his chiefe affaires. Cineas perceiuing that Pyrrus was maruelously bent to these warres of ITALIE, finding him one day at leisure, discouered with him in this sorte. It is reported, and it please your maiesty, that the ROMAINES are very good men of warre, & that they commaund many valliant and warlike nations: if it please the goddes we doe overcome them, what benefit shall we haue of that victory? Pyrrus answered him againe, thou dost aske me a question that is manifest of it selfe. For when we haue once ouercome the ROMAINES, there can neither GREEKIAN nor barbarous city in all the contry withstande vs, but we shall straight con-

A quer all the rest of ITALIE with ease: whose greames, wealth, and power, no man knoweth better then thy selfe. Cineas pawling a while, replied: and when we haue taken ITALIE, what shall we do then? Pyrrus not finding his meaning yet, said vnto him. SICILIA as thou knowest, is hard adioyning to it, & doth as it were offer it selfe vnto vs, & is a maruelous populous and rich lande, and easie to be taken: for all the cities within the lande are one against an other, hauing no head that gouernes the, since Agathocles died, more the orators only that are their counsellours, who will loone be wonne. In dede it is likely which your grace speaketh, quod Cineas: but when we haue wonne SICILIA, shall then our warres take ende? If the goddes were pleased, sayd Pyrrus, that victory were atchieued: the way were then broad open for vs to attaine great conquestes. For who would not afterwardees goe into AFRICKE, and so to CARTHAGE, which also will be an easie conquest, since Agathocles secretly flying from SYRACUSA, and hauing passed the seas with a fewe shippes, had almost taken it? And that once conquered, it is most certaine there durst not one of all our enemies that now doe daily vex and trouble vs, lift vp their heades or handes against vs. No surely, sayd Cineas: for it is a cleare case, that with so great a power we may easily recouer the realme of MACEDON againe, and commaunde all GREECE besides, without let of any. But when we haue all in our handes: what shall we doe in the ende? Then Pyrrus laughing, tolde him againe: we will then (good Cineas) be quiet, & take our ease, and make feasts euery day, & be as merry one with an other as we can possible. Cineas hauing brought him to that poynt, sayd againe to him: my Lord, what letteth vs now to be quiet, and merry together, sith we enioy that presently without further trauel and trouble, which we will now goe seeke for abroad, with such theading of blood, and so manifest danger? and yet we know not whether euer we shall attaine vnto it, after we haue both suffered, and caused other to suffer infinite sorowes and troubles. These last wordes of Cineas, did rather offend Pyrrus, then make him to alter his minde: for he was not ignorant of the hap- py state he shoulde thereby forgoe, yet could he not leaue of the hope of that he did so much desire. So he sent Cineas before vnto the TARENTINES, with three thousand footemen: and afterwards the TARENTINES hauing sent him great store of flatbottomes, gallies, and of all sortes of passengers, he shipped into them twenty elephantes, three thousand horsemen, and two and twenty thousand footemen, with fise hundred bowe men and slingers. All things thus ready, he wayed ankers, and hoysed sayles, and was no sooner in the maine sea, but the north winde blew very roughly, out of season, and draue him to leeward. Notwithstanding, the ship which he was in him selfe, by great toile of the pilots and mariners turning to windward, and with much a do, and maruelous danger recouered the coast of ITALIE. Howbeit the rest of his flecte were violently disperfed here and there, whereof some of them failinge their course into ITALIE, were cast into the seas of LIBYA, and SICILIA. The other notable to recouer the pointe of APVLLIA, were benighted, and the sea being her wrought, by violence cast them upon the shoare, and against the rockes, and made shipwrackes of them, the Admirall onely referred, which through her strength, and the greates of her burden, resisted the force of the sea that most violently bet against her. But afterwards, the winde turning & coming from the lande, the sea cruelly raking ouer the height of her forecastell: in syne brought her in manifest perill of openinge, and splitting, and in daunger to be driuen from the coast, puttinge her out againe to the mercy of the windes, which chaunged euery hower. Wherefore Pyrrus castinge the perill euery way, thought best to leape into the sea. After him forthwith leapt his gard, his seruantes, and other his familiar frendes, venturing their liues to saue him. But the darkenes of the night, and rage of the waues (which the shore breakinge, forced so to rebound backe vpon them) with the great noyle also, did so hinder their swimming: that it was euen day before they could recouer any lande, and yet was it by meanes that the winde fell. As for Pyrrus, he was so sea beaten, and wearied with the waues, that he was able to do no more: though of himselfe he had so great a harte, & stowe a corage, as was able to overcome any perill. Moreover, the MESSAPIANES (vpon whose coast the storme had cast him) ran out to helpe him, and diligently labored in all they coulde possible to saue him, and receiued also certaine of his shippes that had scaped, in which were a fewe horsemen, about two thousand footemen, and two elephantes. With this small force, Pyrrus marched on his iorney to goe by lande vnto TARENTVM: and Cineus being aduertised of his comming, went with his men to meete him. Now when he was come to TARENTVM, at the first he would doe nothing by force, nor against the goodwill of the inhabitantes: vntill such time as his shippes that had escaped the daungers of the sea, were all arriued, and the greatest parte of his army comen together againe. But when he had all his army he looked for, seeing that the people of TARENTVM could neither saue them selues, nor be saued by any other, without straight order & compulsion, because they made their reckening that Pyrrus should fight for them, & in the meane time they would not stirre out of their houles from bathing them selues, from banketing, and making good chere: first of all he caused all the parkes & places of shew to be shut vp, where they were wont to walke and disporte them selues, in any kind of exercise, and as they walked, to talke of warres as it were in pastime, & to fight with words, but not to come to the blowes. And further he forbad all feastinges, mommeries, and such other like pleasures, as at that time were out of season. He trained them out also to exercise their weapons, and shewed him selfe very seuer in musters, not pardoning any whose names were billed to serue in the warres: in so much as there were many (which vnacquainted with such rough handling & gouernment) forsooke the city altogether, calling it a bondage, not to haue liberty to liue at their pleasure. Furthermore, Pyrrus hauing intelligence that Leuius the Romaine Consul came against him with a great puissant army, and that he was already entred into the lande of LVCANIA, where he destroyed and spoyled all the contry before him: albeit the TARENTINES aide of their confederates was not as yet comen, he thought it a great shame to suffer his enemies approche so nere him, and therefore taking that small number he had, brought them into the field against Leuius. Howbeit he sent a herald before to the Romaines, to vnderstand of them, if before they entred into this warre they could be content the controuersies they had with all the GRECEIANS dwelling in ITALIE, might be decided by iustice, & therein to referre them selues to his arbitrement, who of him selfe would vndertake the pacification of the. Whereunto the Consul Leuius made answer, that the Romaines would neuer allow him for a iudge, neither did they feare him for an enemy. Wherefore Pyrrus going on stil, came to lodge in the plaine which is betwene the cities of PANDOSIA, & of HERACLEA: & hauing newes brought him that the Romaines were encamped very nere vnto him on the other side of the riuer of Siris, he tooke his horse, and rode to the riuers side to view their campe. So hauing thoroughly considered the forme, the situation, and the order of the same, the manner of charging their watche, and all their facions of doing: he wondered much thereat. And speaking to Megacles, one of his familiars about him, he sayd: this order Megacles (quod he) though it be of barbarous people, yet is it not barbarously done, but we shall shortly proue their force. After he had thus taken this view, he beganne to be more carefull then he was before, and purposed to tary till the whole aide of their confederates were comen together, leauing men at the riuers side of Siris, to kepe the passage, if the enemies ventured to passe ouer as they did in dede: For they made hast to preuent the aide that Pyrrus looked for, & passed their footemen ouer upon a bridge, and their horsemen at diuerse fordes of the riuer: in so much as the GRECEIANS fearinge least they should be compassed in behinde, drew backe. Pyrrus aduertised thereof, and being a litle troubled therewithall, commaunded the Captaines of his footemen presently to put their bandes in battell ray, and not to stirre till they knew his pleasure: and he him selfe in the meane time marched on with three thousande horse, in hope to finde the Romaines by the riuer side, as yet out of order, & vtterly vnprouided. But when he saw a farre of a greater number of footemen with their targettes ranged in battell, on this side the riuer, and their horsemen marching towards him in very good order: he caused his men to ioyne close together, and him selfe first beganne the charge, being easie to be knownen from othere, if it had bene no more but his passinge riche glisteringe armor and furniture, and withall, for that his valliant dedes gaue manifest proofe of his well deserued fame and renowne. For, though he valliantly besturrd his hands and body both, repulsing them he encountered withall in fight, yet he forgoate not him selfe, nor neglected the iudgement & foresight, which should neuer be wanting in a Generall of an army: but as though he had not fought at all, quietly and discretely gaue order for euery thinge, ryding to and fro, to defende and encourage his men in those places, where

A where he sawe them in most distresse. But euen in the hottest of the battell, Leonasus MACEDONIAN, spied an ITALIAN a man of armes, that followed Pyrrus vpp and downe where he went, and euer kept in manner of euen hande with him, to let apen him. Wherefore he sayd to Pyrrus: my Lord doe you not see that barbarous man there vpon a baye horse with white feete? Sure he looketh as though he ment to doe some notable feat and mischief with his owne handes: for his eye is neuer of you, but wayteth only apen you, being sharpe set to deale with your selfe & none other, & therefore take hede of him. Pyrrus answered him, it is impossible Leonasus, for a man to auoyde his destinie: but neither he, nor any other ITALIAN whatsoever, shall haue any ioy to deale with me. And as they were talkinge thus of the matter, the ITALIAN taking his speare in the midst, and setting spurres to his horse, charged apen Pyrrus, and ranne his horse through and through with the same. Leonasus at the selfe same instant ferued the ITALIANS horse in the like manner, so as both their horses fell dead to the ground. Howbeit Pyrrus men that were about him, saued him presently, and slew the ITALIAN in the field, although he fought it out right valliantly. The ITALIANS name was Oplacus, borne in the city of FERENTVM, and was Captaine of a bande of men of armes. This mischance made kinge Pyrrus looke the better to him selfe afterwards, and seeinge his horsemen geue backe, sent presently to hasten his footemen forward, whom he straight set in order of battell: and deliuering his armor and cloke to one of his familiars called Megacles, and being hidden as it were in Megacles armor, returned againe to the battell against the Romaines, who valliantly resisted him, so that the victorie depended longe in doubt. For it is sayd, that both the one side and the other did chafe, and was chafed, aboue seuen times in that conflict. The chaungeinge of the kings armor serued very well for the safety of his owne person, howbeit it was like to haue marred all, and to haue made him loose the field. For many of his enemies set vpon Megacles, that ware the kings armor: and the partie that slue him dead, and threw him stark to the ground, was one Dexius by name, who quickly snatched of his head peece, tooke away his cloke, and ranne to Leuius the Consul, crying out aloud, that he had slaine Pyrrus, and withall shewed forth the spoyle he supposed to haue taken from him. Which being carried about through all the bands, & openly shewed from hand to hand, made the Romaines maruelous ioyfull, and the GRECEIANS to the contrary, both afeard and right forowfull: vntill such time as Pyrrus hearing of it, went and passed alongest all his bandes bare headed, and D bare headed, holdinge vp his hande to his souldiers, and geuinge them to vnderstande with his owne voyce, that it was him selfe. The elephants in the ende were they in dede that wanne the battell, and did most distresse the Romaines: for, their horses seeing them a farre off, were fore afrayed, and durst not abide them, but caried their masters backe in despite of them. Pyrrus at the sight thereof, made his THESSALIAN horsemen to geue a charge apen them whilst they were in this disorder, and that so lustily, as they made the Romaines flie, and susteine great slaughter. For Dionysius wryteth, that there dyed few lesse, then fifteene thousand Romaines at that battell. But Hieronymus speakech onely of seuen thousande. And of Pyrrus side, Dionysius wryteth, there were slaine thirteene thousande. But Hieronymus sayth lesse then foure thousande: howbeit they were all of the best men of his army, and those whome most E he trusted. King Pyrrus presently hereupon also tooke the Romaines campe, which they forsooke, and wan many of their cities from their allyance, spoyled, and ouercame much of their contry. In so much as he came within six and thirty mile of ROME, whither came to his aide, as confederates of the TARENTINES, the LVCANIANS, & the SAMNITES, whom he rebuked because they came to late to the battell. Howbeit a man might easily see in his face, that he was not a litle glad and proude to haue ouerthrowen so great an army of the Romaines with his owne men, and the aide of the TARENTINES onely. On thother side, the Romaines hartes were so great, that they would not depose Leuius from his Consulshippe, notwithstandinge the losse he had receiued: and Caius Fabricius sayed openly, that they were not the EPIROTES that had ouercomen the Romaines, but Pyrrus had ouercome Leuius: meaninge therefore, that this ouerthrow chaunced vnto them, more through the subtilty and wise conduction of the Generall, then through the valliant feates and worthines of his army. And hereupon they speedily supplied their legions againe that were diminished, with other newe souldiers in the dead mens place, and leauied a fresh force besides, speaking brauely and fiercely of this warre, like men whose hartes were nothing appawled. Whereat Pyrrus maruelinge much, thought good first to send to the ROMAINS, to proue if they would geue any care to an offer of peace, knowing right well that the winning of the city of ROME was no easie matter to passe, or attaine, with that strength he presently had: and also that it would be greatly to his glory, if he could bring them to peace after this his valliant victory. And hereupon he sent Cineas to ROME, who spake with the chieftest of the city, and offered presentes to them and their wiues, in the behalfe of the king his master. Howbeit, neither man nor woman would receiue any at his handes, but answered all with one voyce: that if the peace might be general to all, they all priuately would be at the kinges commaundement, and would be glad of his friendship. Moreover, when Cineas had talked in open audience before the Senate, of many courteous offers, and had deliuered them profitable capitulations of peace: they accepted none, nor shewed any affection to geue care vnto them, although he offered to deliuer them their prisoners home againe without ranisme, that had bene taken at the battell, and promised also to aide them in the conquest of ITALIE, requiring no other recompence at their handes, sauing their goodwills only to his master, & assurance for the TARENTINES, that they should not be annoyed for any thing past, without demaunde of other matter. Neuerthelesse in the ende, when they had hearde these offers, many of the Senators yeelded, and were willinge to make peace: alleging that they had already lost a great battell, and howe they looked for a greater, when the force of the confederates of ITALIE should ioine together with king Pyrrus power. But Appius Claudius, a famous man, who came no more to the Senate, nor delin matters of state at all by reason of his age, and partly because he was blinde: when he vnderstoode of king Pyrrus offers, and of the common brute that ranne through the city, howe the Senate were in minde to agree to the capitulations of peace propounded by Cineas, he could not abide, but caused his seruantes to cary him in his chayer upon their armes vnto the Senate dore, his sonnes, and sonnes in law taking him in their armes, caried him fo into the Senate house. The Senate made silence to honor the comming in of fo notable & worthy a personage: and he so soone as they had sette him in his seate, beganne to speake in this sorte. Herunto with great impacione (my Lordes of ROME) haue I borne the losse of my sight, but now, I would I were also as deafe as I am blinde, that I might not (as I doe) heare the noise of your dishonorable consultations determined vpon in Senate, which tende to subuerthe the glorious fame and reputation of ROME. What is now become of all your great and mighty bragges you blased abroad, through the whole worlde? that if Alexander the great him selfe had come into ITALIE, in the time that our fathers had bene in the flower of their age, and we in the prime of our youth, they would not haue sayed euery where that he was altogether invincible, as now at this present they doe: but either he should haue left his body slaine herein battell, or at the least wife haue bene driuen to flee, and by his death or flyinge shoulde greatly haue enlarged the renowne and glory of ROME? you plainly show it now, that all these words spoken the, were but vaine & arrogant vaunts of foolish pride. Considering that you tremble for feare of the MOLOSSIANS & CHAONIANS, who were euer a pray to the MACEDONIANS: and that ye are afayed of Pyrrus also, who all his life time serued and followed one of the gard vnto Alexander the great, and now is come to make warres in these partes, nor to aide the GRECIANS inhabiting in ITALIE, but to flie from his enemies there about his owne country, offering you to conquer all the rest of ITALIE with an army, wherewith he was nothing able to kepe a small parte of MACEDON only for him selfe. And therefore you must not periwade your selues, that in making peace with him, you shall thereby be rid of him: but rather shall you draw others to come & set apou you besides. For they will vterly despise you, when they shall heare ye are so easily overcome, and that you haue suffered Pyrrus to escape your handes, before you made him feeble the iust reward of his bolde presumptuous attempt vpon you: carying with him for a further hier, this aduantage ouer you, that he hath geuen a great occasion on both to the SAMNITES, and TARENTINES, hereafter to mocke and deride you. After that Appius had tolde this tale vnto the Senate, euery one through the whole assembly, desired rather warre then peace. They dispatched Cineas away thereupon with this answer, that Cineas first Ambassador to Rome. The noble minde of the Romaines.

Appius Claudius dissuaded the Romaines from making peace with Pyrrus.

Appius Claudius oration to the Senate.

A if Pyrrus sought the ROMAINS frendshippe, he must first departe out of ITALIE, and then sende vnto them to treat of peace: but so longe as he remained there with his army, the ROMAINS would make warres vpon him, with all the force and power they could make, yea although he had ouerthrowen and slaine tenne thousand such Capitaines as Leinius was. They say that Cineas, during the time of his abode at ROME, intreating for this peace, did curiously laborto consider and vnderstande, the manners, order, and life of the ROMAINS, and their common weale, discoursing thereof with the chieftest men of the city: and how afterwards he made ample reporte of the same vnto Pyrrus, and tolde him amongst other things, that the Senate appeared to him, a counsell house of many kinges. And furthermore (for the number of people) that he feared greatly they should fight against such a serpent, as that which was in olde time in the marifes of LERNE, of which, when they had cut of one heade, seuen other came vp in the place: because the Confull Leinius had nowe leauied an other army, twise as great as the first was, and had left at ROME also, many times as many good able men to cary armor. After this, there were sent Ambassadors from ROME vnto Pyrrus, and amongst other, Caius Fabricius touching the state of the prisoners. Cineas tolde the kinge his master, that this Fabricius was one of the greatest menne of accompt in all ROME, a right honest man, a good Capitaine, and a very valliant man of his handes, yet poore in deede he was notwithstanding. Pyrrus taking him secretly a side, made very much of him, and amongst other things, offered him bothe golde and siluer, prayinge him to take it, not for any dishonest respect he ment towards him, but only for a pledge of the goodwill and frendshippe that should be betwene them. Fabricius would none of his gift: so Pyrrus left him for that time. Notwithstanding, the next morninge thinkinge to feare him, because he had neuer seene elephant before, Pyrrus commaunded his men, that when they sawe Fabricius and him talkinge together, they shoulde bringe one of his greatest elephants, and set him harde by them, behinde a hanging: which beinge done at a certaine signe by Pyrrus geuen, sodainly the hanging was pulled backe, and the elephant with his troncke was ouer Fabricius heade, and gaue a terrible and fearful crie. Fabricius softly geuinge backe, nothinge afayed, laughed and sayd to Pyrrus smiling: neither did your golde (oh king) yesterday moue me, nor your elephant to day feare me. Furthermore, whilest they were at supper, fallinge in take of diuerse matters, specially touching the state of GREECE, and the Philosophers there: Cineas by chaunce spake of EPICVRVS, and reheard the opinions of the EPICURIANS touching the goddes and government of the common wealth, how they placed mans chiefe felicity in pleasure, how they fled from all office & publike charge, as from a thing that hindereth the fruition of true felicity: howe they maintained that the goddes were immortall, neither moued with pity nor anger, and led an idle life full of all pleasures and delights, without taking any regarde of mens doings. But as he still continued this discourse, Fabricius cried out alowde, and sayd: the goddes graunt that Pyrrus and the SAMNITES were of such opinions, as long as they had warres against vs. Pyrrus marueling much at the constancy and magnanimity of this man, was more desirous a great deale to haue peace with the ROMAINS, then before. And priuately prayed Fabricius very earnestly, that he would treat for peace, whereby he might afterwards come and remaine with him, E saying: that he would giue him the chiefe place of honor about him, amongst all his frendes. Whereunto Fabricius answered him softly: that were not good (oh king) for your selfe, quod he: for your men that presently doe honor and esteeme you, by experience if they once knew me, would rather choole me for their kinge, then your selfe. Such was Fabricius talke, whose wordes Pyrrus tooke not in ill parte, neither was offended with them at all, as a tyrant woulde haue bene: but did him selfe repore to his frendes and familiars the noble minde he founde in him, and deliuered him apou his faith only, all the ROMAINE prisoners: to the ende that if the Senate would not agree vnto peace, they might yet see their frendes, and keepe the least of Saturne with them, and then to send them backe againe vnto him. Which the Senate established by decree, vpon paine of death to all such as shoulde not performe the same accordingly. F Afterwards Fabricius was chosen Confull, and as he was in his campe, there came a man to him that brought him a letter from kinge Pyrrus Phisitian, wrytten with his owne handes: in which the Phisitian offered to payson his maister, so he would promise him a good reward, for ending the warres without further danger. Fabricius detestinge the wickednesse of the Phisician, and hauing made Q. Aemilius his colleague, and fellowe Confull also, to abhorre the same: wrote a letter vnto Pyrrus, and bad him take heede, for there were that ment to poyson him. The contentes of his letter were thele: Caius Fabricius, and Quintus Aemilius Consuls of Rome, vnto king Pyrrus greeting. You haue (oh king) made vnfortunate choise, both of your frendes and of your enemies, as shall appeare vnto you by reading of this letter, which one of yours hath written vnto vs: for you make warres with iust and honest men, and do your selfe trust altogether the wicked and vnfaithfull. Hereof therefore we haue thought good to aduertise you, not in respect to pleasure you, but for feare least the misfortune of your death might make vs vniustly to be accused: imagining that by trechery of treason, we haue fought to end this warre, as though by valliantnesse we coule not otherwise atchieue it. Pyrrus hauing read this letter, and proued the contentes thereof true, executed the Phisitian as he had deserued: and to requite the aduertisement of the Consulls, he sent Fabricius and the ROMAINES their prisoners, without payinge of ranfome, and sent Cineas againe vnto them, to proue if he could obtaine peace. Howbeit, the ROMAINES, because they would neither receiue pleasure of their enemies, and least of all reward, for that they consented not vnto so wicked a deede: did not only refuse to take their prisoners of free gift, but they sent him againe so many SAMNITES, and TARENTINES. And furthermore, for peace, and his frendshippe, they would geue no care to it, before the warres were ended, and that he had sent away his army againe by sea, into his kingdome of EPYRVS. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing no remedy, but that he must needs fight another battell, after he had somewhat refreshed his army, drewe towards the cite of ASCVLM, where he fought the seconde time with the ROMAINES: and was brought into a maruelous ill grounde for horsemen, by a very swift running riuer, from whence came many brookes and deepe marshes, in somuch as his elephantes could haue no space nor ground to ioine with the battell of the footemen, by reason wherof there was a great number of men hurt and slaine on both sides. And in the ende, the battell being fought out all day longe, the darke night did seuer them: but the next morninge, Pyrrus to winne the aduantage to fight in the plaine field, where he might preuaile with the force of his elephantes, sent first certaine of his bandes to lease vpon the naughty ground they had fought on the day before. And by this policy hauing brought the ROMAINES into the plaine field, he thrust in amongst his elephantes, store of shot, and slingemen, and then made his army marche (being very well set in order) with great furie against his enemies. They missinge thother dayes turnings and places of retyre, were now compelled to fight all on a fronte in the plaine field: and struing to breake into the battell of Pyrrus footemen before the elephantes came, they desperately preaced in upon their enemies pykes with their swordes, not caring for their owne perones what became of them, but only looked to kill and destroy their enemies. In the ende notwithstandinge, after the battell had holden out very long, the ROMAINES lost it, and they first beganne to breake and flie on that side where Pyrrus was, by reason of the great force and furie of his charge, and much more through the violence of the elephantes: against which, the ROMAINES valliantnes nor courage coule ought preuaile, but that they were driuen to geue them place (much like the rage of surging waues, or terrible trembling of the earth) rather then tary to be troden vnder feere, and ouerthrowen by them, whome they were not able to hurte againe, but be by them most greuously martyred, and their troubles thereby yet nothinge eased. The chafe was not long, because they fled but into their campe: and Hieronymus the historiographer writeth, that there died six thousande men of the ROMAINES, and of Pyrrus parte about three thousande fye hundred and fye, as the kinges owne Chronicles doe witnesse. Neuerthelesse, Dionysius makes no mention of two battells geuen neere vnto the city of ASCVLM, nor that the ROMAINES were certainly ouerthrowen: howbeit he confirmeth that there was one battell only that continued vntill sunne set, and that they scarcely seuered aloft when night was come on, Pyrrus being hurte on the arme with a spear, and his cariage robbed and spoiled by the SAMNITES besides. And further, that there died in this battell, aboute fiftene thousande men, as well of Pyrrus side, as of the ROMAINES parte: and that at the last, both the one and the other did retyre. And some say, that it was at that time Pyrrus answered one, who reioyced with him

Pyrrus victory of the ROMAINES.

The writers agree not about Pyrrus battell.

A him for the victory they had wonne: if we winne another of the price, quod he, we are vtterly vndone. For in dede the had he lost the most parte of his army he brought with him out of his realme, and all his frendes and Captaines in manner euery one, or at the least there lacked litle of it: and besides that, he had no meanes to supplie them with other from thence, and perceived also that the confederates he had in ITALIE, beganne to waxe colde. Where the ROMAINES to the contrary, did easily renue their army with freshe souldiers, which they caused to come from Rome as neede required, (much like vnto a liuely spring, the head whereof they had at home in their contry) and they fainted not at all for any losses they receiued, but rather were they so much the more hotly bent, slowly determining to abide out the warres, what euer beyde. And thus whilest Pyrrus was troubled in this sorte, newe hopes, and newe enterprises were offered vnto him, that made him doubtful what to do. For euē at a clap came Ambassadors to him out of SICILIA, offering to put into his handes, the cities of SYRACUSA, of AGRIGENTVM, and of the LEONTINES, and beseeching him to aide them to driue the CARTHAGINIANS out of the Ile, thereby to deliuer them from all the tyrannes. And on the other side also, newes was brought him from GREECE, howe Protonie surnamed the lightning, was slaine, and all his army ouerthrowen in battell against the GAVLES, and that now he shoulde come in good hower for the MACEDONIANS, who lacked but a king. Then he cursed his hard fortune that presented him all at once, such sundry occasions to doe great things: and as if both enterprises had bene already in his hande, he made his account that of necessitie he must loose one of them. So, long debating the matter with him selfe, which of the two wayes he shoulde conclude vpon: in the ende he resolved, that by the warres of SICILIA, there was good meane to attaine to the greater matters, considering that AFRICKE was not farre from thence. Wherefore, disposing him selfe that way, he sent Cineas thither immediately to make his way, and to speake to the townes and cities of the contry as he was wont to doe: and in the meane time left a strong garrison in the city of TARENTVM, to keepe it at his deuotion, where-with the TARENTINES were very angry. For they made request vnto him, either to remaine in their contry to maintaine warres with them against the ROMAINES, (which was their meaning why they sent for him) or else if he would needes go, at the least wile to leaue their city in as good state as he founde it. But he answered them againe very roughly, that they shoulde speake no more to him in it, and that they should not choose but tary his occasion. And with this aunswere tooke shippe, and sailed towards SICILIA: where so soone as he was arriued, he founde all that he hoped for, for the citie did willingly put them selues into his handes. And where necessity of battell was offered him to employ his army, nothing at the beginning could stande before him. For, with thirty thousande footemen, two thousande fye hundred horsemen, and two hundred sayle which he brought with him, he draue the CARTHAGINIANS before him, and conquered all the contry vnder their obedience. Nowe at that time, the city of ERIX was the strongest place they had: and there were a great number of good souldiers within it to defende it. Pyrrus determined to proue the assault of it, and when his army was ready to geue the charge, he armed him selfe at all peeces from toppe to toe, and approaching the walls, vowed vnto Hercules to geue him a solemne sacrifice, with a feast of common E plays, so that he would graunt him grace to shew him selfe vnto the GREECIANS inhabiting in SICILIA, worthy of the noble auncesters from whence he came, and of the great good fortune he had in his handes. This vowe ended, he straight made the trompettes sound to the assault, & caused the barbarous people that were on the walles, to retyre with force of his shot. Then when the scaling ladders were set vp, him selfe was the first that mounted on the walle, where he found diuerse of the barbarous people that resisted him. But some he threw ouer the walles on either side of him, and with his sword slew many dead about him, him selfe not once hurt: for the barbarous people had not the harte to looke him in the face, his countenance was so terrible. And this doth proue that Homer spake wisely, and like a man of experience, when he sayd: that valliantnesse onely amongst all other morall vertues is that, which hath sometimes, certaine furious motions and diuine prouocations, which make a man besides him selfe. So the city being taken, he honorably performed his vowed sacrifice to Hercules, & kept a feast of all kindes and sortes of games and weapons. There dwelt a barbarous people at that time about MESSINA, called the MAMERTINES, who did much hurt to the GREECIANS thereabouts, making many of them pay tax and tribute: for they were a great number of them, and all men of warre and good souldiers, and had their name also of Mars, because they were marshall men, and geuen to armes. Pyrrus led his army against them, and ouerthrew them in battell: and put their collectors to death, that did leauy and exact the tax, and rased many of their fortresses. And when the CARTHAGINIANS required peace and his friendship, offering him shippes and money, pretending greater matters: he made them a shorte answer, that there was but one way to make peace and loue betwene them, to forsake SICILIA altogether, and to be contented to make Mare Libycum the border betwixt GREECE and them. For his good fortune, and the force he had in his handes, did set him aloft, and further allured him to follow the hope that brought him into SICILIA, aspiring first of all vnto the conquest of LIBYA. Now, to passe him ouer thither, he had shippes enough, but he lacked owers & mariners: wherefore when he would presse them, then he began to deale roughly with the cities of SICILIA, and in anger compelled, and seuerely punished them, that would not obey his commandement. This he did not at his first comming, but contrarily had wonne all their good wills, speaking more courteously to them then any other did, and shewing that he trusted them altogether, and troubled them in nothing. But sodainly being altered from a populer prince, vnto a violent tyrant, he was not only thought cruell and rigorous, but that worst of all is, unfaithfull and ingratefull: neuertheless, though they receiued great hurt by him, yet they suffered it, and graunted him any needfull thing he did demand. But when they saw he began to mistrust Theron and Softratus, the two chiefe Captaines of SYRACUSA, and they who had caused him to come into SICILIA, who also at his first arrival deliuered the city of SYRACUSA into his hands, & had bene his chiefe aiders in helping him to compass that he had done in SICILIA: when I say they saw he would no more cary them with him, nor leaue them behinde him for the mistrust he had of them, and that Softratus fled from him, and absented him selfe, fearing least Pyrrus would doe him some mischief: and that Pyrrus moreover, had put Theron to death, mistrusting that he would also haue done him some harme. Then all things fell out against Pyrrus, not one after another, nor by litle and litle, but all together at once instant, and all the cities generally hated him to the death, and did againe some of them confederate with the CARTHAGINIANS, and others with the MAMERTINES, to set vpon him. But when all SICILIA was thus bent against him, he receiued letters from the SAMNITES & TARENTINES, by which they aduertised him, how they had much a doe to defende them selues within their cities and strong holdes, and that they were wholly driuen out of the field: wherefore they earnestly besought him speedily to come to their aide. This newes came happily to him, to cloke his flying, that he might say it was not for dispaire of good successe in SICILIA that he went his way: but true it was in dede, that when he saw he could no longer keepe it, then a shippe could stand still among the waues, he sought some honest shadow to colour his departing. And that surely was the cause why he returned againe into ITALIE. Neuertheless, at his departure out of SICILIE, they say that looking backe upon the Ile, he said to those that were about him: O what a goodly field for a battell, my frendes, doe we leaue to the ROMAINES and CARTHAGINIANS, to fight thone with thother? And verily so it fell out shorly after, as he had spoken. But the barbarous people conspiring together against Pyrrus, the CARTHAGINIANS on the one side watching his passage, gaue him battell on the sea, in the very straight it selfe of MESSINA, where he lost many of his shippes, and fled with the rest, & took the coast of ITALIE. And there the MAMERTINES on the other side, being gone thither before, to the number of eightene thousand fighting men: durst not present him battell in open felde, but taried for him in certaine fraites of the mountaines, & in very hard places, and so set vpon his rereward, and disordered all his army. They slew two of his elephants, and cut of a great number of his rereward, so as he was compelled him selfe in person to come from his vanguard, to helpe them against the barbarous people, which were lusty valliant men, and olde trained souldiers. And there Pyrrus caught a blow on his head with a sworde, and was in great danger: inso much as he was forced to retire out of the prease and fight, which did so much the more encourage his enemies. Among which there was one more aduenturous then

A the rest, a goodly man of personage, fayer armed in white armor, who aduancing him selfe farre before his company, cried out to the king with a bolde and fierce voyce, and challenged him to fight with him if he were alieue. Pyrrus beinge mad as it were with this brauery, turned againe with his garde, in spight of his men, hurt as he was. And besides that he was all on a fire with choller, and his face all bloody and terrible to behold, he went through his men, and came at the length to this barbarous villen that had challenged him: & gaue him such a blow on his head with all his force and power, that what by the strenght of his arme, and through the goodnes of the temper and mettle of the sword, the blow claue his head right in the midst, downe to the shoulders: so that his heade beinge thus deuided, the one parte fell on the one shoulder, & the other parte on the other. This matter sodainly stayed the barbarous people, and kept them from goinge any further, they were so afrayed and amased both to see to great a blowe with ones hande, and it made them thinke in dede that Pyrrus was more then a man. After that, they let him go, and troubled him no more. Pyrrus holding on his iorney, arrived at the length in the city of TARENTVM, with twenty thousand footemen, & three thousand horse. And with these (ioyning thereto the choycest pyked men of the TARENTINES) he went incontinently into the field to seeke out the ROMAINES, who had their campe within the territories of the SAMNITES, which were then in very hard state. For their hartes were killed, because that in many battells and encounters with the ROMAINES, they were euer ouerthrown. They were very angry besides with Pyrrus, for that he had forsaken them, to goe his voyage vnto SICILIA, by reason whereof there came no great number of souldiers into his campe. But notwithstanding, he deuided all his strength into two partes, whereof he sent the one parte into LVCANIA, to occupy one of the ROMAINES Confulls that was there, to the end he should not come to aide his companion: and with the other parte he went him selfe against Manius Curius, who lay in a very straunge place of aduantage nere to the cite of BARENTVM, attendinge the aide that should come to him out of LVCANIA, besides also that the soothsayers (by the signes & tokens of the birdes and sacrifices) did counsell him not to stirre from thence. Pyrrus to the contrary, desiring to fight with Manius before his aide came vnto him, which he looked for out of LVCANIA, tooke with him the best souldiers he had in all his army, and the warlikest elephants, and marched away in the night, supposing to steale vpon Manius on the sodaine, and geue an assault vnto his campe. Now Pyrrus hauing a long way to go, and through a woddy contry, his lightes and torches failed him, by reason whereof many of his souldiers lost their way, and they lost a great deale of time also, before they could againe be gathered together: so as in this space the night was spent, and the day once broken, the enemies perceiued plainly how he came downe the hills. This at the first sight made the muse awhile, and put them in a litle feare: neuertheless Manius hauing had the signes of the sacrifices fauorable, and seeing that occasion did presse him to it, went out into the field, and set upon the vowe of his enemies, and made them turne their backs. The which feared all the rest in such wise, that there were slaine a great number of them in the field, and certaine elephants also taken. This victory made Manius Curius leaue his strength, and come into the plaine field, where he set his men in battell ray, and ouerthrew his enemies by plaine force on the one side: but on the other he was repulled by violence of the elephants, and compelled to drawe backe into his owne campe, wherein he had left a great number of men to garde it. So when he saw them vpon the rampers of his campe all armed, ready to fight, he called them out, and they comming fresh out of places of aduantage to charge vpon the elephants, compelled them in a very shorthe time to turne their backs, & fle through their owne men, whom they put to great trouble, and disorder: so as in the ende, the whole victory fell upon the ROMAINES side, and consequently by means of that victory, followed the greatnes and power of their Empire. For the ROMAINES beinge growen more coragious by this battell, and hauing increased their force, and wonne the reputation of men vnconquerable: immediately after conquered all ITALIE besides, and soone after that, all SICILIA. To this ende as you see, came king Pyrrus vaine hope he had to conquer ITALIE and SICILIA, after he had spent fixe years continually in warres, during which time his good fortune decayed, & his army consumed. Notwithstanding, his noble corage remained alwayes inuincible, what losses soeuer he had fustined: and moreover whilest he liued, he was euer esteemed the chiefeft of all the kings & princes in his time, as well for his experience & sufficiency in warres, as also for the valiancy and hardines of his person. But what he wanne by famous deedes, he lost by vaine hopes, desiring so earnestly that which he had not, as he forgate to keepe that which he had. Wherefore Antigonus compared him vnto a dice player that casteth well, but can not vie his lucke. Now hauing brought backe againe with him into Epirvs, eight thousand footemen, and five hundred horsemen, and being without money to pay them, he deuised with him selfe to seeke out some new warre to entertaine those souldiers, and keepe them together. Wherefore vpon a newe aide of certaine of the Gavles beinge comen vnto him, he entered into the realme of Maccdon (which Antigonus, Demetrius sonne held at that time) with intent only to make a forrey, and to get some spoyle in the contry. But when he saw that he had taken diuerse holdes, and moreover, that two thousand men of warre of the contry came and yielded them selues vnto him: he beganne to hope of better successe, then at the first he looked for. Forvpon that hope he marched against king Antigonus selfe, whom he met in a very straight valley, and at his first comming, gaue such a lusty charge vpon his reerward, that he put all Antigonus army in great disorder. For Antigonus had placed the Gavles in the reerward of his army to close it in, which were a conuenient number, and did valiantly defend the first charge, and the skirmish was so hotte, that the most of them were slaine. After them, the leaders of the elephants perceiving they were environned on euery side, yielded them selues and their beastes. Pyrus seeing his power to be now increased with such a supply, trusting more to his good fortune, then any good reason might moue him: thrust further into the battell of the Maccdonians, who were all affrayed, and troubled for the ouerthrowe of their reerward, so that they would not once bafe their pykes, nor fight against him. He for his parte holdinge vpon his hande, and callinge the Captaines of the bandes by their names, straight wayes made all the footemen of Antigonus turne wholly to his side: who flying, saued him selfe with a few horsemen, and kept certaine of the cities in his realme apon the sea coast. But Pyrus in all his prosperitie, iudging nothing more togedownde to his honor and glory, then the ouerthrow of the Gavles, layed aside their goodliest and richest spoyles, and offered vpon the same in the temple of Minerua Itonida, with this inscription.

*VWhen Pyrrus had subduide, the puissant Gavles in fields, He caused of their spoiles to make, these targets, armes, and shields:
The which he hanged vp, in temple all on high, Before Minerua goddesse here, in signe of victory.
VWhen he had overcome, the whole and huge host:
The which Antigonus did bring, into his contries coast.
Ne maruell should it seeme, though victory he vponne, Since valliantnes brings victory, and enermore hath done:
And valliantnes alwayes, hath constantly kept place, From age to age, and time to time, in AEacus his race.*

Immediately after this battell, all the cities of the realme of Maccdon yielded vnto him: but when he had the cite of Eges in his power, he vied the inhabitants thereof very hardly, & specially because he left a great garrison of the Gavles there which he had in pay. This nation is extreme couetous, as then they shewed them selues: for they feared not to breake vpon the tombes wherein the kings of Maccdon lay buried there, tooke away all the gold and siluer they could finde, and afterwards with great insolency cast out their bones into the open winde. Pyrus was tolde of it, but he lightly passed it ouer, and made no reckening of it: either because he deferred it till an other time; by reason of the warres he had then in hande: or else for that he durst not meddle with punishing of these barbarous people at that time. But whatsoever the matter was, the Maccdonians were very angry with Pyrus, & blamed him greedily for it. Furthermore, hauing not yet made all things sure in Maccdon, nor being fully posselt of the same: new toyes and hope came into his head, and mocking Antigonus, sayd, F he was a mad man to goe apperelled in purple like a king, when a poore cloke might become him like a priuate man. Now, Cleonymus king of Sparta being come to procure him to bring

The conuention of the Gavles.

A his army into the contry of Lacedemon, Pyrus was very willing to it. This Cleonymus was of the blood royall of Sparta, but because he was a cruel man, and would do all things by authority, they loued him not at Sparta, nor trusted him at all: and therefore did they put him out, & made Areus king, a very quiet man. And this was the oldest quarrell Cleonymus had against the comon wealth of Sparta: but besides that, he had an other priuate quarrel, which grew vpon this cause. In his olde yeares, Cleonymus had married a fayer younge Lady called Chelidonide, which was also of the blood royall, and the daughter of Leotychides. This Lady being fallen extremely in loue with Acrotatus, king Areus sonne, a goodly young gentleman, and in his lusty youth, the greatly vexed and dishonored her husbande Cleonymus, who was over head and eares in loue and ielousie with her: for there was not one in all Sparta, but plainly knewe that his wife made none account of him. And thus his home forowes, being ioyned with his outward common greues, euen for spight, desiring a reuenge, in choller he went to procure Pyrus to come vnto Sparta, to restore him againe to his kingdom. Hereupon he brought him into Lacedemonia forthwith, with five and twenty thousand footemen, two thousand horse, and foure and twenty elephants: by which preparation, though by nothing else, the worlde might plainly see, that Pyrus came with a minde not to restore Cleonymus againe vnto Sparta, but of intent to conquer for him selfe (if he could) all the contry of Peloponnesvs. For in wordes he denied it to the Lacedemonians them selues, who sent Ambassadors vnto him when he was in the city of Megalopolis, where he tolde them that he was come into Peloponnesvs, to sette the townes and cities at libertie which Antigonus kept in bondage: & that his true intent and meaning was to send his young sonnes into Sparta (so they would be contented) to the end they might be trained after the Laconian manner, and from their youth haue this aduantage aboue all other kinges, to haue bene well brought vp. But faining these things, and abusing those that came to meete him on his way, they tooke no heede of him, till he came within the coast of Laconia, into the which he was no sooner entred, but he beganne to spoyle and wast the whole contry. And when the Ambassadors of Sparta reprovved and founde fault with him, for that he made warres vpon them in such sorte, before he had openly proclaimed iche made them answer: no more haue you your selues vied to proclaim that, which you purposed to do to others. Then one of the Ambassadors called Mandricidas, replied againe vnto him in the Laconian tongue. If thou be a god, thou wilt doe vs no hurt, because we haue not offended thee: and if thou be a man, thou shalt meete with an other that shalbe better then thy selfe. Then he marched directly to Sparta, where Cleonymus gaue him counsell euen at the first, to assault it. But he would not so do, fearing (as they sayd) that if he did it by night, his souldiers would sacke the city: and sayd it should be time enough to assault it the next day at broad day light, because there were but few men within the towne, and beside they were very ill provided. And furthermore, king Areus him selfe was not there: but gone into Creta to aide the Gortynians, who had warres in their owne contry. And doubtlesse, that only was the sauing of Sparta from taking, that they made no reckening to assault it hotly: because they thought it was not able to make resistance. For Pyrus camped before the towne, thoroughly perswaded with him selfe, that he should finde none to fight with him: and Cleonymus friends and seruantes also did prepare his lodging there, as if Pyrus should haue come to supper to him, and lodged with him. When night was come, the Lacedemonians counfelled together, & secretly determined to send away their wiuces, and litle children into Creta. But the women them selues were against it, and there was one amonge them called Archidamia, who went into the Senate house with a sword in her hand, to speake vnto them in the name of all the rest, and sayd: that they did their wiuces great wronge, if they thought them so fainte harted, as to lue after Sparta were destroyed. Afterwards it was agreed in counsell, that they should cast a trench before the enemies campe, and that at both the endes of the same they should bury cartes in the ground vnto the middest of the wheeles, to the end that being fast set in the ground, they should stay the elephants, and keepe them from passing further. And when they beganne to go in hand withall, there came wiuces and maides vnto them, some of them their clothes girte vp round about them, and others all in their smockes, to worke at this trench with the old men, aduising the young men that should fight the next morning, to rest them selues in the meane while. So the women tooke the third parte of the trenche to raske, which was six cubites broad, foure cubits deepe, and eight hundred foote long as Philarchus sayth: or litle lesse as Hieronymus writeth. Then when the breake of day appeared, & the enemies remoued to come to the assault: the women them selues fetched the weapons which they put into the young mens hands, and deliuered them the raske of the trenche ready made, which they before had vnder taken, praying them valliantly to keepe and defend it, telling them withall, howe great a pleasure it is to ouercome the enemies, fighting in view and sight of their native contry, and what great felicity and honor it is to dye in the armes of his mother and wife, after he hath fought valliantly like an honest man, and worthy of the magnanimity of SPARTA. But Chelidonida being gone to the side, had tyed a halter with a riding knot about her necke, ready to strangle & hang her selfe, rather thē to fall into the hands of Cleonymus, if by chaunce the city should come to be taken.

Now Pyrrus marched in person with his battell of footemen, against the fronte of the SPARTANS, who being a great number also, did tary his comming on the other side of the trenche: the which, besides that it was very ill to passe ouer, did let the souldiers also to fight steadily in order of battell, because the earth being newly cast vp, did yeld vnder their feete. Wherefore, Ptolomie king Pyrrus sonne, passing all alongest the trench side with two thousand GAVLES, & all the choyce men of the CHAONIANS, assayed if he could get ouer to the other side at one of the endes of the trenche where the cartes were: which being set very deepe into the ground, and one ioyned vnto another, they did not only hinder the assaillants, but the defendants also. Howbeit in the end, the GAVLES began to plucke of the wheeles of these cartes, and to draw them into the riuer. But Acrotatus, king Areus sonne, a young man, seeing the daunger, and ran through the city with a troupe of three hundred lusty youtthes besides, & went to inclose Ptolomie behinde before he espied him, for that he passed a secret hollow way till he came euen to geue the charge vpon them: whereby they were enforced to turne their faces towards him, one running in an others necke, and so in great disorder were thrust into the trenches, and vnder the cartes: in so much as at the last, with much a doe, and great bloodshed, Acrotatus and his company draue them backe, and repulsed them. Now the women and old men, that were on thother side of the trench, saw plainly before their face, howe valliantly Acrotatus had repulsed the GAVLES. Wherefore, after Acrotatus had done this exploit, he returned againe through the city vnto the place from whence he came, all on a goare blood, & coragious & liuely, for the victory he came newly from. The women of SPARTA thought Acrotatus farr more noble and fayer to beholde, then euer he was: so that they all thought Chelidonida happy to haue such a friend and louer. And there were certaine olde men that followed him, crying after him, goe thy way Acrotatus, and enioy thy loue Chelidonida: beget noble children of her vnto SPARTA. The fight was cruell on that side where Pyrrus was, and many of the SPARTANS fought very valliantly. Howbeit amongst other, there was one named Phyllus, who after he had fought long, and slaine many of his enemies with his owne handes, that forced to passe ouer the trenche: perceiving that his hart fainted for the great number of woundes he had upon him, called one of them that were in the rancke next behinde him, and geuing him his place, fell downe deade in the armes of his frendes, because his enemies should not haue his body. In the ende, the battell hauinge continued all the day longe, the night did separate them: and Pyrrus being layed in his bed, had this vision in his sleepe. He thought he strake the city of LACEDÆMON with lightning, and that he vtterly consumed it: whereat he was so passing glad, that euen with the very ioy he awaked. And thereupon forthwith commaunded his Captaines to make their men ready to the assault: and told his dreame vnto his familiars, supposing that out of doubt it did betoken he should in that approache take the cite. All that heard it, beleued it was so, sauing one Lysimachus: who to the contrary, sayed that this vision liked him not, because the places smitten with lightning are holy, and it is not lawfull to enter into them: by reason whereof he was also affraid, that the goddes did signifie vnto him, that he should not enter into the cite of SPARTA. Pyrrus answered him: that sated he, is a matter disputable to & fro in an open assembly of people, for there is no manner of certainty in it. But furthermore, euery man must take his weapon in his hand, & set this fence before his eyes

Alluding vnto Homers verses, which he wrote for the defence of his contry. And saying thus, he rose, and at the breake of day led his army vnto the assault. On thother side also, the LACEDÆMONIANS with a maruelous corage & magnanimity, farr greater then their force bestured them selues wonderfully to make resistance, hauing their wies by them that gaue them their weapons wherewith they fought, and were ready at hand to geue meate & drinke to them that needed, and did also withdrawe those that were hurt to cure them. The MACEDONIANS likewise for their parte, endeouored them selues with all their might to fill vpp the trench with wodde and other things, which they cast vpon the dead bodies and armors, lying in the bottome of the ditche: & the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, labored all that they could possible to let them. But in this great broyle, one perceived Pyrrus a horse backe to haue leapt the trench, past ouer the strength of the cartes, and make force to enter into the city. Wherefore those that were appointed to defende that parte of the trench, cried out straight: and the women fell a shrieking, and running, as if all had bene lost. And as Pyrrus passed further, striking downe with his owne handes all that stood before him, a CRETAN shot at him, & strake his horse through both sides: who leaping out of the preale for paine of his wounde, dying, caried Pyrrus away, and threw him vpon the hanging of a steepe bill, where he was in great daunger to fall from the toppe. This put all his seruantes and frendes about him in a maruelous feare, and therewithall the LACEDÆMONIANS seeing them in this feare and trouble ran immediately vnto that place, and with force of shotte draue them all out of the trench. After this retyre, Pyrrus caused all assault to cease, hoping the LACEDÆMONIANS in the end would yeelde, consideringe there were many of them slaine in the two dayes past, and all the rest in manner hurt. Howbeit, the good fortune of the cite (whether it were to proue the valliantnes of the inhabitants them selues, or at the least to shew what power they were of euen in their greatest nede and distresse, when the LACEDÆMONIANS had small hope left) brought one Amintas Phocian from CORINTH, one of king Antigonus Captaines with a great band of men, and put them into the city to aide them: and straight after him, as soone as he had entred, king Areus arrived also on thother side from CRETA, and two thousand souldiers with him. So the women went home to their houses, makinge their reckening that they should not neede any more to trouble them selues with warres. They gaue the olde men liberty also to goe and rest them selues, who being past all age to fight, for necessities sake yet were driuen to arme them selues, and take weapon in hand: and in order of battell placed the newe come souldiers in their roomes. Pyrrus vnderstanding that newe supplies were come, grew to greater stomake then before, and enforced all that he could, to winne the towne by assault. But in the end, when to his cost he founde that he wanne nothing but blowes, he gaue ouer the siege, and went to spoyle all the contry about, determining to lye there in garrison all the winter. He could not for all this auoide his destenie. For there rose a sedition in the city of ARGOS betweene two of the chiefeft citizens, Aristeus and Aristippus: and because Aristeus thought that kinge Antigonus did fauor his enemy Aristippus, he made halt to sende first vnto Pyrrus, whose nature and disposition was such, that he did continually heape hope vpon hope, euer taking the present prosperitie, for an occasion to hope after greater to come. And if it fell out he was a loser, then he sought to recouer him selfe, and to restore his losse, by some other newe attempts. So that neither for being conqueror, nor ouercomen, he would euer be quiet, but alwayes troubled some, and him selfe also: by reason whereof, he sodainly departed towards ARGOS. But king Areus hauing layed ambushes for him in diuerse places, and occupied also the straightest and hardest passages, by the which he was to passe: gaue a charge vpon the GAVLES and MOLOSSIANS, which were in the tayle of his army. Now, the selfe same day Pyrrus was warned by a Soothsayer, who sacrificing had founde the liuer of the sacrificed beast infected: that it betokened the losse of some most neere vnto him. But when he heard the noyse of the charge geuen, he thought not of the forwarning of his Soothsayer, but commaunded his sonne to take his household seruantes with him, and to go thither: as he him selfe in the meane time with as great hast as he could, made the rest of his army marche, to get them quickly out of this daungerous way. The fraye was very hotte about Ptolomie Pyrrus sonne, for they were all the chiefe men of the Lacedæmonians with whome he had to doe, led by a valliant Capitaine called Eucleus. But as he fought valliantly against those that stood before him, there was a souldier of Creta called Orisus, borne in the citie of APTERA, a man very ready of his hande, and light of foote, who running alongest by him, strake him such a blowe on his side, that he fell downe dead in the place. This prince Ptolomie being slaine, his company began straight to flie: and the Lacedæmonians followed the chase so hotly, that they tooke no heede of them selues, vntill they sawe they were in the plaine field farre from their footemen. Wherefore, Pyrrus vnto whom the death of his sonne was newly reported, being a fire with sorow and passion, turned sodainly vpon them with the men of armes of the Molossians, and being the first that came vnto them, made a maruelous slaughter among them. For, notwithstanding that euery where before that time he was terrible and inuincible, hauing his sword in his hande: yet then he did shewe more proofe of his vallianttes, strength, and courage, then he had euer done before. And when he had sette spurres to his horse against Eucleus to close with him, Eucleus turned on the toe side, and gaue Pyrrus such a blowe with his sword, that he missed hitle the cutting of his bridle hande: for he cut in deede all the raines of the bridle a funder. But Pyrrus straight ranne him through the body with his speare, and lighting off from his horse, he put all the troupe of the Lacedæmonians to the sword that were about the body of Eucleus, being all chofen men. Thus the ambition of the Capitaines was cause of that losse vnto their contry for nothing, considering that the warres against the were ended. But Pyrrus hauing now as it were made sacrifice of these poore bodies of the Lacedæmonians, for the soule of his dead sonne, and fought thus wonderfully also to honor his funeralls, conuerting a great parte of his sorow for his death, into anger and wrath against the enemies: he afterwards held on his way directly towards Argos. And vnderstanding that king Antigonus had already sealed the hills that were ouer the valley, he lodged nere vnto the city of NAVPLIA: and the next morning following sent a heraulde vnto Antigonus, and gaue him defiance, calling him wicked man, and chalenged him to come downe into the valley to fight with him, to trye which of them two should be king. Antigonus made him answer, that he made warres as much with time, as with weapon: & furthermore, that if Pyrrus were weary of his life, he had wayes open enough to put him selfe to death. The citizens of Argos also sent Ambassadors vnto them both, to pray them to departe, sith they knew that there was nothing for them to see in the city of Argos, and that they would let it be a newter, & friend vnto them both. King Antigonus agreed vnto it, and gaue them his sonne for hostage. Pyrrus also made the fayer promise to do so too, but bicause he gaue no caution nor sufficient pledge to performe it, they mistrusted him the more. Then there fel out many great & wonderful tokens, as wel vnto Pyrrus, as vnto the Argives. For Pyrrus hauing sacrificed oxen, their heades being stricken off from their bodies, they thrust out their tongues, and licked vp their owne blood. And within the city of Argos, a sister of the temple of Apollo Lycias, called Apollonia, ranne through the streetes, crying out that she sawe the city full of murder, and blood running all about, and an Eagle that came vnto the fraye, howbeit he vanished away sodainly, and no body knewe what became of her. Pyrrus then comminge hard to the walles of Argos in the night, & finding one of the gates called Diampere, opened by Ariseus, he put in his Gavies, who possessed the market place, before the citizens knew any thing of it. But bicause the gate was too low to passe the elephantes through with their towers vpon their backes, they were driuen to take them off, & afterwards when they were within, to put them on in the darke, & in tumulte: by reason whereof they lost much time, so that the citizens in the ende perceived it, and ran incontinently vnto the castell of Alpides, and into other strong places of the city. And therewithall, they sent with present speede vnto Antigonus, to pray him to come and helpe them, and so he did: and after he was come hard to the walles, he remained without with the skowtes; & in the meane time sent his sonne with his chiefe Captaines into the towne, who brought a great number of good souldiers and men of warre with them. At the same time also arrived Arcus, king of Sparta, with a thousand of the Cretans, and most lusty Spartans all which ioyning together, came to geue a charge vpon the Gavies that were in the market place,

A place, who put them in a maruelous feare & hazard. Pyrrus entring on that side also of the city called Cylarabis, with terrible noyse & cries: when he vnderstoode that the Gavies answered him not lustely and coragiously, he doubted straight that it was the voyce of men distressed, and that had their handes full. Wherefore, he came on with speede to relieue them, thrusting the horsemen forwards that marched before him, with great danger and paine, by reason of holes, and sinckes, and water conduites, whereof the city was full. By this meane there was a wonderfull confusion amongst them, as may be thought fightinge by night, where no man saw what he had to doe, nor could heare what was commaunded, by reason of the great noyse they made, straying here and there vp and downe the streetes, thence scattered from the other neither could the Capitaines set their men in order, as wel for the darkenes of the night, as also for the confused tumult that was all the city ouer, & for that the streetes also were very narrow. And therefore they remained on both sides without doing any thing, looking for day light: at the dawning whereof, Pyrrus perceiued the castell of Alpides, full of his armed enemies: And furthermore, sodainly as he was come into the market place, amongst many other good lycommon workes sette out to beautifie the same, he spied the images of a bull and a woulfe in copper, the which fought one with an other. This sight made him afrayed, bicause at that present he remembered a prophecy that had bene tolde him, that his end and death should be, when he sawe a woulfe and a bull fight together. The Argives reporte, that these images were set vp in the market place, for the remembrance of a certaine chaunce that had happened in their contrie. For when Danaus came thither first, by the way called Pyramia (as one would say, land sowne with corne) in the contry of Thyreaticke, he saw as he went, a woulfe fight with a bull: whereupon he stayed to see what the end of their fight would come to, supposing the case in him selfe, that the woulfe was of his side, bicause that being a stranger as he was, he came to set vpon the naturall inhabitantes of the contry. The woulfe in the ende obtained the victory: wherefore Danaus making his prayer vnto Apollo Lycias, followed on his enterprise, & had so good successe, that he draue Gelman out of Argos, who at that time was king of the Argives. And thus you heare the cause why they say these images of the woulfe and bull were set vp in the market place of Argos. Pyrrus being halfe discouraged with the sight of them, and also bicause nothing fell out well according to his expectation, thought best to retire: but fearing the straitenesse of the gates of the city, he sent vnto his sonne Helanus, whome he had left without the city with the greatest parte of his force and army, commaunding him to ouerthrow a peece of the wall that his men might the more readily get out; and that he might receiue them, if their enemies by chaunce did hinder their continuing out. But the messenger whome he sent, was so hasty and fearefull, with the tumult that troubled him in going out, that he did not well vnderstand what Pyrrus layd vnto him, but reported his message quite contrary. Whereupon the young prince Helanus taking the best trowlers he had with him, and the rest of his elephantes, entred into the city to helpe his father, who was now goinge backe: and so long as he had roome to fight at ease, retiringe still, he vntill he repulled those that set vpon him, turning his face oft vnto them. But when he was driuen vnto the streete that went from the market place to the gate of the city, he was kepte now with his owne men that entered at the same gate to helpe him. But they could not heare when Pyrrus cried out, and bad them go backe, the noyse was so great: and though the first had heard him, and would haue gone backe, yet they that were behinde, and did full trust forward into the prease, did not permit them. Besides this moreouer, the biggest of all the elephantes by misfortune fell downe ouerthwart the gate, where he grindinge his teeth did hinder those also, that would haue comen out and geuen backe. Furthermore, an other of the elephantes that were entred before into the city, called Nicon (as much to say, as conquering) seeking his gouernor that was stricken downe to the ground from his backe with terrible blowes: ran vpon the that came backe vpon him, ouerthrowing frendes and foes one in an others necke, till at the length hauing founde the body of his master slaine, he lift him vp from the ground with his troncke, and carying him vpon his two tusshes, returned backe with great fury, treading all vnder feete he found in his way. Thus euery man being thronged and crowded vp together in this sorte, there was not one that could helpe him selfe: for it seemed to be a masse and heape of multitude, and one whole body shut together, which sometime thrust forward, and sometime backe, as the sway went. They fought not so much against their enemies, who set upon them behinde: but they did them felues more hurt, then their enemies did. For if any drew out his sword, or bafed his pyke, he could neither scabard thone againe, nor lift vp thother, but thrust it full vpon his owne fellows that came in to helpe them, and so killed them felues one thrusting vpon an other. Wherefore Pyrrus seeing his people thus troubled and harried to & fro, tooke his crowne from his heade which he ware upon his helmet, that made him knowne of his men a farre off, and gaue it vnto one of his familiars that was next vnto him: and trusting then to the goodnes of his horse, flew vpon his enemies that followed him. It fortuned that one hurt him with a pyke, but the wound was neither dangerous nor great: wherfore Pyrrus set vpon him that had hurt him, who was an Argian borne, a man of meane condition, and a poore olde womans sonne, whose mother at that present time was gotten vp to the toppe of the tyles of a house, as all other women of the city were, to see the fight. And she perceiving that it was her sonne whome Pyrrus came upon, was so afrighted to see him in that danger, that she tooke a tyle, and with both her hands cast it upon Pyrrus. The tyle falling off from his head by reason of his head peece, lighted full in the nape of his necke, & brake his necke bone a sunder: wherewith he was sodainly so benumbed, that he lost his fight with the blow, the raines of his bridle fell out of his hande, and him selfe fell from his horse to the ground, by Lycymmius tombe, before any man knew what he was, at the least the common people. Vntill at the last there came one Zopyrus, that was in pay with Antigonus, and two or three other soldiers also that ran straight to the place, and knowing him, dragged his body into a gate, euen as he was coming againe to him selfe out of this traunse. This Zopyrus drewe out a Slayon sword he wore by his side, to strike of his head. But Pyrrus cast such a grimme countenance on him betwene his eyes, that made him so afrayed, & his hand so to shake therewith: that being thus amazed, he did not strike him right in the place where he should haue cut of his head, but killed him vnder his mouth about his chinne, so that he was a great while ere he could strike of his head. The matter was straight blowne abroad amongst diuerse: whereupon Alyoneus running thither, asked for the head that he might know it againe. But when he had it, he raine presently vnto his father withall, and found him talking with his familiar friends, and cast Pyrrus head before him. Antigonus looking vpon it, when he knew it, layed upon his sonne with his staffe, and called him cruell murderer, and vnnaturall barbarous beast: and so hyding his eyes with his cloke, wept for pity, (remembering the fortune of his grandfather Antigonus and of his father Demetrius) and then caused Pyrrus head & body to be honorably burnt & buried. Afterwards Alyoneus meeting Helenus (king Pyrrus sonne) in very poore state, mused vp with a poore shorte cloke: vsed him very curteously with gentle wordes, and brought him to his father. Antigonus seeing his sonne bringing of him, sayd vnto him: this parte now (my sonne) is better then the first, and pleaseth me a great deale more. But yet thou hast not done all thou shouldst for thou shouldst haue taken from him his beggerly cloke he weareth, which doth more shame vs than that are the gainers, then him that is the loser. After he had spoken these wordes, Antigonus embraced Helenus, and hauing apparelled him in good sorte, sent him home with honorable conuoy into his realme of Epirus. Furthermore, seasing all Pyrrus campe and army, he curteously receiued all his frendes and seruantes.

THE LIFE OF Caius Marius.

It is not known what was the third name of Caius Marius, no more then of Quintius Sertorius, who had all SPAYNE in his handes at one time: nor of Lucius Mummius, he that destroyed the cite of CORINTHE. For this name of Achaicus, that was geuen vnto Mummius, of Africanus vnto Scipio: and of Nimidicus vnto Metellus: were all surnames geuen them, by reason of the conquestes they wan. By this reason Posidonius thinketh to ouercome them that say, that the third name the ROMAINEs haue, is their proper name: as Cornelius, Marcellus, Cato. For if it fell out so, sayd he, then it must needs follow that they which haue two names, should haue no proper name. But on the other side also, he doth not consider that by the like reason he should say, that women haue no names: for there is not a woman in ROME that is called by her first name, which Posidonius iudgeth to be the proper name of the ROMAINEs. And that of the other two, the one is the common name of all the house or family, as of the POMPEIANs, of the MANLIANs, and of the CORNELIANs; like as the HERACLIDES and the PELOPIDES are amongst the GREEKIANs: and the other is a surname taken of the deedes, or of the nature, forme, or shape of the body, or of some other like accident, as are these surnames, Macrinus, Torquatus, & Sylla. Euen as amongst the GREEKIANs likewise, Mnemon, which signifieth hauing good memory: Grypos, hauing a crooked nose: Callinicos, conquering. But as for that, the diuersitie of custome would deliuer objection sufficient to the contrary, to him that lifted. And furthermore, as touching the fauor of Marius face, we haue seene an image of his in marbell at RAVENNA, a city of the GAULS, which doth liuely represent that rough seuernity of nature and maner which they say was in him. For being borne a rough man by nature, and geuen to the warres, and hauing followed the same altogether from his youth, more then the ciuill life: when he came to authority, he could not bridle his anger and chollerike nature. And they say furthermore, that he neuer learned the GREEKE tongue, nor vsed it in any matters of weight: as though it had bene a mockery to him, to learne the tongue, the masters whereof liued in bondage vnder others. After his second triumph, in the dedication of a certaine temple, he made GREEKE playes to the ROMAINEs pastime: and came into the Theater, howbeit he did but sit downe only, and went his way straight. Wherefore me thinkes, that as Plato was wont to say of vnto Nemertes the Philosoph

losopher, who was of a curish nature, had his head euer occupied, and to seuer: Xenocrates, A my friend: I pray thee doe sacrifice to the Græces. So if any man could haue perswaded Marius to haue sacrificed to the Muses, and to the Grecian Graces: (that is to say, that he had knowen the Greeke tongue) to so many famous and glorious deedes as he did, both in peace and warres, he had not ioynd so vnfortunate and miserable an end as he made, through his choller and extreame ambition, at such yeares, and through an vnfatiable courtoisnes, which like boysterous windes made him to make shipwracke of all, in a most cruell, bloody, and vnmurall age. The which is easily knowen in reading the discourse of his doings. First of all he was of a meane house, borne of poore parents by father & mother, that got their liuings by sweate of their browes. His father as him selfe, was called Caivus: Fulcinia was his mother. And this was the cause why he beganne so late to haunt the city, and to learne the ciuility and manners of Rome, hauing bene brought vp alwayes before in a litle poore village called Ciribolaton, within the territory of the city of Arpos: where he led a hard contry life, in respect of those that liued pleasauntly and finely in the cities, but otherwise well reformed, and neare vnto the manners of the ancient Romaines. The first iorney he made vnto the warres, was against the Celtiberians in Spainy, vnder Scipio Africanus, when he went to besiege the city of Nymantia: where his Captaines in shorte time found that he was a better soldier, then any other of his companions. For he did maruelous easily receiue the reformation of manners, and the discipline of warres, which Scipio aduanced amongst his souldiers that were ill trained before, and geuen ouer to all pleasure. And they say, that in the sight of his Generall he fought hand to hand with one of his enemies, and slew him: vpon which occasion, C. Scipio to make him loue him, did offer him many curtesies and pleasures. But specially one day about the rest, hauing made him suppe with him at his table, some one after supper falling in talke of Captaines that were in Rome at that time: one that stood by Scipio, asked him (either because in deede he stood in doubt, or else for that he would curry fauor with Scipio) what other Captaine the Romaines should haue after his death, like vnto him. Scipio hauing Marius by him, gently clapped him upon his shoulder, and sayd: peraduenture this shall be. Thus happily were they both borne, the one to shew from his youth that one day he should come to be a great man, and the other also for wisely coniecturing the end, by seeing of the beginning. Well it fortun'd so, that these words of Scipio (by reporte) about all things else put Marius in a good hope, as if they had bene spoken by the oracle of some god, and made him bold to deale in matters of state and common wealth: where, by means of the fauor & countenance Cecilius Metellus gaue him (whose house his father and he had alwayes followed and honored) he obtained the office of Tribuneshippe. In this office he preferred a law touching the manner howe to geue the voyces in election of the Magistrates, which did seeme to arise from the nobility the authority they had in iudgement. And therefore the Confull Cotta stepped vp against it, and perswaded the Senate to resist that lawe, and not suffer it to be authorized, and therewithall presently to call Marius before them to yeld a reason of his doing. So was it agreed vpon in the Senate. Now Marius comming into the Senate, was not abashed at any thing, as some other young man would haue bene, that had but newly begonne to enter into the world as he did, and hauing no other notable calling or quality in him, launing his merit only to commend him: but taking boldenes of him selfe (as the noble actes he afterwards did, gaue shew of his valor) he openly threatned the Confull Cotta to sende him to prison, if he did not presently withdrawe the conclusion he had caused to be resolved upon. The Confull then turning him selfe vnto Cecilius Metellus, asked him how he liked it? Metellus standing vp, spake in the behalfe of the Confull: and then Marius calling a sergeant out, commanded him to take Metellus selfe, and to cary him to prison. Metellus appealed to the other Tribunes, but neuer a one would take his matter in hand: so that the Senate when all was done, were compelled to call backe the conclusion that before was taken. Then Marius returning with great honor into the market place among the assembly of the people, caused this law to passe and be authorized: and euery man held opinion of him that he would proue a stowe man, and such a one, as would not stoupe for any feare, nor shrinke for bashfullnes, but would beare the Senate in fauor of the people. Notwithstanding, he shortly after chaunged opinions; and altered

A altered the first, by an other act he made. For when an other went about to haue a law made, to distribute corne vnto euery citizen without payment of any penny, he was vehemently against it, and ouerthrew it: so that thereby he came to be a like honored and esteemed of either party, as he that would neither pleasure the one, nor the other, to the preiudice of the common wealth. After he had bene Tribune, he sued for the chieftest office of Ædilis. Of the Ædiles there are two sortes: the first is called Ædilitas Curulis, so named because of certaine chayers that he crooked feete, vpon which they sit when they geue audience. The other is of lesse dignity, and that is called Ædilitas popularis: and when they haue chosen the first and greater Ædilis at Rome, they presently proceede the same day also in the market place vnto election of the lesser. Marius seeing plainly that he was put by the chieftest of the Ædiles, turned againe straight yer to demand the second: but this was misliken in him, and they tooke him for too bold, too shameles, and too presumptuous a man. So that in one selfe day he had two denyalles and repulses, which neuer man but him selfe before had. And neuertheless, all this could not cut his combe, but (shortly after he sued also for the Prætorshippe, and he lacked but litle of the deniall of that: yet in the ende, being last of all chosen, he was accused to haue bribed the people, and bought their voyces for money. And surely amongst many other, this presumption was very great: that they saw a man of Cassius Sabac on within the barres where the election is made, running to and fro amongst them that gaue their voyces, because this Sabac on was Marius very great friend. The matter came before the iudges, and Sabac on was examined vpon it. Whereunto he answered, that for the great extreame heate he felt, he was very dry, and asked for colde water to drinke, and that this man had brought him some in a pottle where he was, howbeit that he went his way as soone as euer he had dronke. This Sabac on was afterwards put out of the Senate by the next Censors, and many iudge that he was worthy of this infamy, for that he was periured in iudgement, or because he was so subiect and geuen to his pleasure. Caivus Herennius was also called for a witnesse against Marius: but he did allege for his excuse, that the law and custome did dispense with the Patrone, to be a witnesse against his follower & client, and he was quit by the iudges. For the Romaines alwayes call those Patrons, who take the protection of meaner then them selues into their handes: saying, that Marius predeceffors, and Marius him selfe, had euer bene followers of the house of the Herennians. The iudges receiued his answer, and allowed thereof. But Marius spake against it, alleging, that since he had receiued this honor to beare office in the common wealth, he was now grown from this base condicon, to be any more a follower of any man: the which was not true in all. For euery office of a Magistrate doth not exempt him that hath the office, nor yet his posterity, to be vnder the patronage of an other, nor doth discharge him from the duty of honoring them: but of necessity he must be a Magistrate, which the law doth permit to sit in the crooked chayer called Curulis, that is to say, caryed vpon a charet through the city. But notwithstanding that at the first hearing of this cause, Marius had but ill successe, and that the iudges were against him all they could: yet in the ende for all that, at the last hearing of his matter, Marius, contrary to all mens opinions, was discharged, because the iudges opinions with and against him fell to be of like number. He vsed him selfe very orderly in his office of Prætorshippe, and after his yeare was out, when it came to deuide the prouinces by lot, Spainy fell vnto him, which is beyond the riuier of Batis: where it is reported that he skowered all the contrie thereabouts of theues and robbers, which notwithstanding was yet very cruell and sauage, for the rude, barbarous, and vnciuill manner and fashion of life of the inhabitants there. For the Spaniards were of opinion euen at that time, that it was a goodly thinge to liue upon theste and robbery. At his returne to Rome, out of Spainy, desiring to deale in matters of the common wealth, he saw that he had neither eloquence nor riches, which were the two meanes, by the which those that were at that time in credit and authority, did cary the people euen as they would. Notwithstanding, they made great accompt of his constancy and noble minde they found in him, of his great paynes and trauell he tooke continually, and of the simplicitie of his life: which were causes to bring him to honor and preferment, in so much as he married very highly. For he married Julia, that was of the noble house of the Cæsars, and aunte vnto Julius Cæsar: who afterwards came to be the

chiefest man of all the ROMAINS, and who by reason of that allynce betwene them, seemed in some things to followe Marius, as we haue wrytten in his life. Marius was a man of great temperance and patience, as may be iudged by an acte he did, puttinge him selfe into the handes of surgeons. For his shanckes and legges were full of great swollen veynes, and being angrie because it was no pleasaunt thinge to beholde: he determined to put him selfe into the handes of surgeons to be cured. And first, laying out one of his legges to the surgeon to worke vpon, he would not be bound as others are in the like case: but patiently abode all the extreme paines a man must of necessity feele being cut, without stirring, groning, or sighing, still keeping his countenance, and sayed neuer a word. But when the surgeon had done with his first legge, and would haue gone to the other, he would not geue it him: nay sayd he, I see the cure is not worth the paine I must abide. Afterwardes, Cicilius Metellus the Consul, being appointed to go into AFRICKE to make warre with king Iugurthe, tooke Marius with him for one of his Lieutenantes. Marius being there, seeing notable good seruice to be done, and good occasion to shew his manhoode, was not of minde in this voyage to increase Metellus honor and reputation, as other Lieutenantes did: and thought that it was not Metellus that called him forth for his Lieutenante, but fortune her selfe that presented him a fit occasion to raise him to greatnes, and (as it were) did lead him by the hand into a goodly field, to put him to the prooffe of that he coulde doe. And for this cause therefore, he endeouored him selfe to shew all the possible proofes of valliantnesse and honor he could. For, the warres being great continually there, he neuer for feare refused any attempt or seruice, how dangerous or painful soeuer it were, neither disdained to take any seruice in hand, were it neuer so litle: but exceeding all other his fellows and companions in wisdom and foresight, in that which was to be done, and struing with the meanest souldiers in liuing hardly and painefully, wanne the goodwill and fauor of euery man. For to say truly, it is a great comfort & refreshing to souldiers that labor, to haue companis that labor willingly with them. For they thinke, that their company laboring with them, doth in manner take away the compulsion and necessity. Furthermore, it pleaseth the ROMAIN souldier maruelously to see the Generall eate openly of the same bread he eateth, or that he lyeth on a hard bed as he doth, or that him selfe is the last man to set his hande to any worke when a trench is to be cast, or their campe to be fortified. For they doe not so much esteeme the Capitaines, that honor and reward them: as they doe those that in dangerous attempts labor, and venture their liues with them. And further, they do farre better loue them that take paines with them, then those that suffer them to liue idly by them. Marius performing all this, and winning thereby the loue and goodwills of his souldiers: he straight filled all LIBYA and the city of ROME with his glory, so that he was in euery manns mouth. For they that were in the campe in AFRICKE, wrote vnto them that were at ROME, that they should neuer see the ende of these warres against this barbarous king, if they gaue not the charge vnto Marius, and chose him Consul. These things misliked Metellus very much, but specially the misfortune that came apon Turpilus, did maruelously trouble him: which fell out in this sorte. Turpilus was Metellus frende, yea he and all his parentes had followed Metellus in this warre, being master of the workes in his campe. Metellus made him gouernor ouer the city of VACCA, a goodly great city: and he vsing the inhabitantes of the same very gently and curteously, mistrusted nothing, till he was fallen into the handes of his enemies through their treason. For they had brought king Iugurthe into their city vnknowing to him, howbeit they did him no hurt, but onely begged him of the king, and let him goe his way faine. And this was the cause why they accused Turpilus of treason. Marius being one of his iudges in the counsell, was not contented to be bitter to him him selfe, but moued many of the counsell besides to be against him. So that Metellus by the voyces of the people, was driuen against his will to condemne him, to suffer as a traitor: and shortly after it was founde, and proued, that Turpilus was wrongfully condemned, and put to death. To say truly, there was not one of the counsell but were very sory with Metellus, who maruelously impatiently tooke the death of the poore innocent. But Marius contrarily reioyced, and tooke it vpon him that he pursued his death, and was not ashamed to make open vauntes, that he had hanged a fye about Metellus necke, to reuenge his frendes blood, whom he guiltlesse had caused to be put to death.

A death. After that time they became mortall enemies. And they say, that one day Metellus to mocke him withall, sayd vnto him: O good man, thou wilt leaue vs then, and returne to ROME to sue for the Consulshippe, and canst thou not be contented to tary to be Consul with my sonne? Now his sonne at that time was but a boy. But whatsoever the matter ment, Marius left him not so, but labored for leaue all he could possible. And Metellus after he had vsed many delays and excuses, at the length gaue him leaue, twelue dayes only before the date of election of the Consuls. Wherefore Marius made hast, and in two dayes and a night came from the campe to Vtica apon the sea side, which is a maruelous way from it: and there before he tooke shippe, did sacrifice vnto the goddes, and the Soothsayer tolde him that the goddes by the signes of his sacrifices, did promise him vncredible prosperity, and so great, as he him selfe durst not hope after. These wordes made Marius hart greater. Whereupon he hoied sayle, and hauing a passing good gale of winde in the poope of the shippe, passed the seas in foure dayes, and being landed, rode poste to ROME. When he was arriued, he went to shewe him selfe vnto the people: who were maruelous desirous to see him. And being brought by one of the Tribunes of the people vnto the pulpit for orations, after many accusations which he objected against Metellus, in the end he besought the people to choose him Consul, promising that within few dayes he would either kill, or take king Iugurthe prisoner. Whereupon he was chosen Consul without any contradiction. And so soone as he was proclaimed, he beganne also, to be enrolled against the order of auncient custome: where other Capitaines before him did receiue no such manner of men, and did no more suffer vnworthy men to be souldiers, then they did allow of vnworthy officers in the common wealth: in doing the which euery one of them that were enrolled, left their goodes behinde them, as a pledge of their good seruice abroad in the warres. Yet this was not the matter that made Marius to be most hated, but they were his stowte proude wordes, full of contempt of others, that did chiefly offende the noble men in the city. For he proclaimed it euery where abroad as it were, that his Consulshippe was a spoyle he had gotten of the effeminate riche noble men through his valliantnes, and that the wounds which he had vpon his body for seruice of the common wealth, and not the monuments of the dead, nor the images and statues of others, were those that recommended him to the people, nor weare his strength. And oftentimes naming Albinus, and otherwhile D. Bessis, both noble men, and of great houses, who hauing bene Generalls of the ROMAIN army, had very ill fortune in the contry of LIBYA: he called them cowardes, and simple souldiers, asking them that were about him, if they did not thinke that their auncettors would rather haue wished to haue left their children that came of them like vnto him selfe, then such as they had bene: considering that they them selues had wonne honor and glory, nor for that they were descended of noble blood, but through their deserued vertue and valliant deedes. Now Marius spake not these wordes in a foolish brauery, and for vaine glory onely, to purchase the ill will of the nobility for nothing: but the common people being very glad to see him shame and despite the Senate, and measuring alwayes the greatnes of his corage with his lawty force wordes, they egged him forward still not to spare the nobility, and to reprove the great men, so that he euer held with the commonalty. And furthermore, when he was passed ouer againe into AFRICKE, it spited Metellus to the hart, because that he hauing ended all the warre, that there remained almost no more to take or winne, Marius should come in that sorte to take away the glory and triumphe out of his handes, hauing fought to rise and increase by withankefullnes towards him. He would not come to him therefore, but went an other way, and left the army with Rutilius one of his Lieutenantes, to deliuer the same vnto him. Howbeit the reuenge of this ingratitude, lighted in the ende vpon Marius owne necke. For Sylla tooke out of Marius hands, the honor of ending this warre: euen as Marius had taken it from Metellus. But how, & after what sorte, I will repeat it in few wordes, because we haue written the particularities more at large in the life of Sylla. Bocchus king of high NVMIDIA, was father in law vnto king Iugurthe, vnto whom he gaue no great aide, whilest he made warres with the ROMAINS, because he hated his vnfaithfullnes, & feared lest he would make him selfe greater then he was: but in the end, after Iugurthe had fled, and wandered vp and downe in euery place, he was constrained of very necessity to cast his last hope and anker upon him, as his small refuge, and so repaire vnto him. King Bocchus receiued him rather for shame, because he durst not punish him, then for any loue or goodwill he bare him: and hauing him in his hands, seemed openly to intreate Marius for him, and secretly to wryte the contrary vnto him. But in the meane time, he practised treason vnder hande, and sent priuely for Lucius Sylla, who then was Questor (to say, high treasurer) vnder Marius, and of whome he had receiued certaine pleasures in those warres. Sylla trusting to this barbarous king, went at his sending for to him. But when he was come, king Bocchus repented him of his promise, and altered his minde, standing many dayes in doubt with him selfe howe to resolue, whether he should deliuer king Iugurthe, or keepe Sylla him selfe: yet at the last he went on with his purpose and intended treason, and deliuered king Iugurthe the aliuie into Sylla's hands. And this was the first original cause of the pestilent and mortall enmitie that grew afterwards betwixt Marius and Sylla, and was like to haue vtterly ouerthrowen the cite of Rome, and to haue rased the foundation of the empyre vnto the ground. For many enuying the glorie of Marius, gaue it out euery where, that this acte of the taking of king Iugurthe, appertained only vnto Sylla: and Sylla him selfe caused a ring to be made, which he ware comonly, and had grauen vpon the stone of the same, how Bocchus deliuered Iugurthe into his hands. And afterwards he made it allwayes his scale to dispise Marius with all, who was an ambitious and proude man, and coulede abide no companion to be paraker of the glorie of his doings: and Sylla did it specially at the procurement of enemies & illwillers, who gaue the glory of the beginning & chiefe exploits of this warre, vnto Metellus, and the last and finall conclusion vnto Sylla, to the ende that the people should not haue Marius in so great estimation and good opinion, as they had before. But all this enuy, detraction, and hatred against Marius, was loone after extinguished and troden vnder foote, by reason of the great danger that fell upon all ITALIE out of the West: and they neuer spake of it afterwards, knowing that the common wealth stood in neede of a good Captaine, and that they beganne to looke about, and consider who should be that great wise Pylos, that might saue and preserue it, from so exceeding dangerous storme of warres. For there was not a noble man of all the ancient houses of Rome, that durst undertake to offer him selfe to demaunde the Consullship: but Marius being absent, was chosen Consull the second time. For Iugurthe was no sooner taken, but newes came to Rome of the coming downe of the Tevtons, and of the Cimbres, the which would not beleeued at the first, by reason of the infinite number of the fighting men which was sayd to be in their company, and for the vncrediblie force and power of armies which was iustified to come also: but afterwards they knew plainly, that the rumor that ranne abroade was lesse, then the troth fell out in deede. For they were three hundred thousand fighting men all armed, who brought with them also an other multitude as great (or more) of women and children: which wandered vp and downe seeking contries and townes to dwell and liue in, as they heard say the GAVLES had done in olde time, who leauing their owne contry, came, and had possessed the best parte of ITALIE, which they had taken away from the Thvscans. Now to say truly, no man knewe of what nation they were, nor from whence they came: as well for that they had no frendshippe with any other people, as also because they came out of a farre contry, as a clowde of people that they were spread all ouer GAVLE & ITALIE. It was doutd much that they came out of GERMANY, dwelling about the north sea: and this they coniectured by viewe of the greatnes of their bodies, and also for that they had darke blew eyes and redde, besides that the GERMANES in their tongue doe call theues and robbers, Cimbri. Other say that Celtica, for the great length and largenes of the contry, stretching it selfe from the coast of the great Ocean sea and from the north partes, drawing towards the marishes Mæotides, and the East runneth into Scythia, or Tartaria Pontica: and that for neighbourhood these two nations ioyned together, and went out of their contry, nor that they made this great voyage all at one time, but at many sundry times, marching yearely in the spring further and further into the contry. And thus by continuance of time, they passed by force of armes through all the firme lande of Evropæ and that for this cause, although they had many particular names according to the diuersitie of their nations, yet all this masse and multitude of people gathered together, were called

standing, the army of the CELTOSCYTHES, as who would say, the CELTOTARTARES. Other hold opinion that the nation of the CIMMERIANS, who were knownen in old time for ancient GREECIANS, the one parte of them were not very great in respect of the whole, the which being fled (or driuen out of their contry for some ciuill disension) were compelled by the TARTARES to passe beyond the marishes Mæotides, into the contries of ASIA, vnder the conduction of a Captaine called Ligdamis. But the residue of them which were a farre greater number, and more warlike men, they dwelt in the furest partes of the earth, adioyning vnto the great Ocean sea, in a darke shadowed contry, couered with wonderfull forestes, of such length, and so great and thicke, and the trees so high, that the sunne can haue no power vpon the ground, and they ioyned hard vpon the great forest of Hercynia. And furthermore, they are vnder such a climate, where the pole is of such a height by the inclination of the circles equidistant, which they call Parallels, that it is not farre from the poynte that auiswereth directly to the plummet vpon the head of the inhabitants: and where the dayes are equinoctiall, they doe deuide all their time in two partes, the which geueth Homer occasion to sayne, that when Plisses would call vpon the dead, he went into the contry of the CIMMERIANS, as into the contry of hell. And this is the cause why they say thes barbarous people left their owne contries to come into ITALIE, which from the beginning were called CIMMERIANS, and afterwards they say (and not without great likely hooode) that they were sumamed CIMBRES: howbeit that is spoken rather by a likely coniecture, then by any assured troth of history. And as for the multitude of men, the most parte of historiographers doe wryte, that they were rather moe, then lesse then we haue spoken of: and that they were so hardy and valliant, that nothing coulede stande before them, they did so great things by the strength of their handes where they fought with any, so violently, and so suddenly, that they seemed to be like a lightninge fire all about where they came. By meanes whereof, they met with no man that durst resist them, but scraped together and caried away, all that they found, hande ouer head: and there were many ROMAINE Captaines appointed gouernors to keepe that which the *ROMAINE*s held in GAVLE beyonde the mountaines, who with great armies were shamefully ouerthrowe by them. The cowardlynes of those, whom they had ouercome, was the chiefe cause that moued them to direct their iorney to Rome. For when they had vanquished the first they fought withall, and gotten great richesse also: they were so fieshed by this, that they determined to stay no where before they had first destroyed Rome, & sacked all ITALIE. The *ROMAINE*s hearing of this out of all partes, sent for Marius to geue him the conduction and leading of these warres, and chose him Consull the seconde time: notwithstanding that it was directly against the lawe, that did expressely forbid any man to be chosen being absent, and vntill also a certaine time appointed had past betwene the vacation and election, before they could chooife him officer twice in one office. Some alleaged this law, of intent to hinder the election. But the people repulit them, obiecting to the contrary: that this was not the first time the law had geuen place to the benefit of the common wealth, and that the occasion offered to abrogate the law at that present was no lesse, then former occasions by the which they chose Scipio Consull, against the course and time appointed by the law, nor for any feare they stood in to lose their owne contry, but for the desire they had to destroy the contry of the CARTHAGINIANS, by reason whereof the people proceeded to election. And Marius bringing home his armie againe out of LIBYA into ITALIE, tooke possession of his Consullship the first day of January (on which day the *ROMAINE*s beginne their yeare) and therewithall made his triumphe into the city of Rome, showing that to the *ROMAINE*s, which they thought neuer to haue seene: and that was, kinge Iugurthe prisoner, who was so subtil a man, and coulede so well frame him selfe vnto his fortune, and with his craft and subtiltie was off so great courage besides, that none of his enemies euer hoped to haue had him aliuie. But it is sayd, that after he was led in this triumphe, he fell mad straight apon it. And the pompe of triumphe being ended, he was caried into prisone, where the sergeauntes for hast to haue the spoyle of him, tare his apparell by force from of his backe: and because they would take away his rich golde eare ringes that hong at his eares, they pulled away with them the type of his eare, and then cast him naked to the bottome of a deepe dungeon, his wittes being altogether troubled. Yet when they did throw him downe, laughing he sayd : O Hercules, how colde are your stoues. He liued there yet six dayes, fighting with hunger, and desiring alwayes to prolong his miserable life vnto the last hour : the which was a iust deserved punishment for his wicked life. In this triumphe were caried (as they say) three thousand & seuen hundred pound weight in gold, and of siluer nygors, siue thousand seuen hundred and lxxv. pounde weight, and more in golde and ready coyne, eight and twenty thousand and seuen hundred crowne. After this triumphe, Marius caused the Senate to assemble within the Capitoll, where he entered into the companie with his triumphinge robe, either bicause he forgot it, or else of too grosse and viciuall arrogancy : but perceiving that all the assemble mistooked of it, he rose suddenly, and tooke his long Confulls gowne, and then returned quickly againe into his place. Furthermore Marius departing to goe to the warres, thought to traine his army by the way, and to harden his souldiers vnto labor, causing them to runne euery way, making great longe iorneyes, compelling ech souldier to cary his owne furniture, and to prepare him necessary vittells to finde him selfe withall : so that euer after they made a prouerbe of it, and called such were painefull and willing to do that which they were commaunded without grudging. Marius moyle. Other notwithstanding, do shew an other cause and beginning of this prouerbe. For they say, that Scipio lying at the siege of the city of Nymantia, would not only take view of the armor and horses of seruice that were in his armie, but also of the moyles and other beastes of burden, bicause he would see how they were kept & furnished. So Marius brought his horse and moyle to the muster which he kept him selfe, fatre, fayer, and very well drest, and his moyles here so like and smooth, and therewithall so lusty and trimme, as none of the rest were like vnto them. Scipio tooke great pleasure to see these beastes so well kept, and in so good plyte : in so much as he spake of it afterwards many a time and oft. And vpon his words, this manner of talke was taken vpon euer after, and became a common prouerbe : when they meane to mocke any man that is painefull, and geuen to fore labor, makinge as though they would praise him, they call him Marius moyle. Furthermore, it was a happy turne for Marius (in mine opinion) that these barbarous people (like in force to the beatinge backe of the raging seas) turned their first fury towards Spain : and that he in the meane space had time and leasure to traine and exercise his souldiers, to make them bolde, and withall, him selfe to be thoroughly known amongst them. For when by litle and litle they had learned not to offend, nor disobey : then they found his rough commaunding, and sharpe severity in punishing such as slacke their duty, both profitable and very necessarie, besides that it was also iust and reasonable. Again, his great fury, his sharpe words, and his fierce lookes, after they had a while bene vsed to them, by litle and litle they seemed nothinge so fearfull to them, as to their enemies. But the thing that pleased the souldiers more then all the rest, was his iustice and vpright dealing : whereof they reports such an example : Marius had a nephewe of his in his campe called Caius Lusius, who had charge of men in the army. This Lusius was taken for a maruelous honest man, sauing that he had this fowle vice in him, that he would be sodainly in loue with fayer young boyes : and as at that time he fell in loue with a trimme younge striplinge, called Trebonius, that serued vnder him, and hauing many times lowdly enticed him, and neuer could obtaine his purpose, at the last fell for him one night by his seruauant. The young man might not disobay his Captaine being sent for, but presently went vnto him. When he was come into his tent, and that his Captaine did striue with all his force to doe him villany : he drew out his sworde, and killed him in the place. And this was done when Marius was out of his campe : who so soone as he returned, caused the marshall to bring the young man before him. Many stepped forth straight to accuse him, but no man to defend him. Wherefore he boldly began to tell his tale him selfe, & to name many witnesses, who had both scene & known how his dead Captaine had oftentimes offered him dishonor, and how that he had continually resisted his abominable motion, and would neuer yeld him selfe vnto him, for any gift or present he could offer him. Wherefore Marius commending him greatly, and being very glad of it, caused presently one of those crownes to be brought vnto him, which are vsed to be geuen to them that in a day of battel haue done some valliant deede, and he him selfe did crowne Trebonius withall, as one that had done a noble acte, and at such a time, as good and honest examples

Marius commended for his iustice.

A examples were requisite. This iudgement of Marius beinge caried to Rome, stode him to great good purpose towards the obtaining of his third Confullshippe : besides also that they looked for the cominge backe of these barbarous people about the springe with whome the Romaines souldiers would not fight vnder any other Captaine, then Marius. Howbeit they came not so soone againe as they looked for them, but Marius passed ouer also the year of his third Confullshippe. So time cominge about againe for the election of newe Confulls, and his companion also beinge dead : he was driuen to goe him selfe vnto Rome, leaving the charge of his campe in his absence, vnto Manius Acilius. At that time there were many noble men that sued for the Confullshippe : but Lucius Saturninus one of the Tribunes, who had the commonalty vnder his girdell as he would him selfe, more then any of thother Tribunes, and beinge wonne vnder hand by Marius, made many orations, in the which he perswaded the people to chosse Marius Confull the fourth time. Marius to the contrary, seemed to refuse it, saying that he would none of it, though the people chose him. Whereupon Saturninus called him traitor, crying out, that his refusall in such a danger and time of necessity, was an apparant parte to betray the common wealth. It was found straight that this was a grosse packe betwixt Saturninus and Marius, by such as could see day at a litle hole. Neuertheless, the people considering that their present troubles required Marius skil & good fortune in the warres, they made him Confull the fourth time, and ioyned Catulus Lucilius Confull with him, a man that was greatly honored of the nobility, and not mistliked alio of the common people. Marius hauing newes of the approching of the barbarous people, passed ouer the Alpes with great speede, & fortifying his campe by the riuier of Rhone, he brought great prouision of all kindes of vittells thither with him, least beinge straightged by lacke therof, he should be forced to come to battell at any other time, but euen as he would him selfe, and as it should seeme good vnto him. And where before that time the transporting of vittells vnto his campe by sea was very long, and dangerous, and a maruelous great charge besides : he made it very shorte and easie by this meane. The mouth of the riuier of Rhone had gathered together so much muddle, and such store of sande, which the waues of the sea had cast on heapes together, that the same was become very high and depe : so as the bankes made the entry into it very narrow, hard, and dangerous for great shippes of burden that came from the sea. Marius considering this matter, let his men a worke while they had nothing to do, & made them digge a large trench and deepe channell, into the which he turned a great parte of the riuier, and caried it to a convenient place of the coast, where the water fell into the sea by an open gulfe, whereby he made it able to cary the greatest shippes that were : and besides that, it was in a very still quiet place, not beinge troubled with windes nor waues. The channell carieth yet his name, and is called Marius Channell or trenche. These barbarous people deuided them selues into two armies to passe into Italy, so that it fell out to the one parte which were the Cimbres, to goe through high Germany, and to force that passage which Catulus kept : and vnto the other parte, which were the Teytons and Ambrons, to passe through the contry of the *Geno*uans by the sea side against Marius. Now the Cimbres hauing the greater compasse to fetch about, stayed longer, and remained behinde : but the Teytons and the Ambrons going their way first, had in fewe dayes dispatched their iorney they had to go, to bring them to the campe where the Romaines lay, vnto whom they presented themselves by infinite numbers, with terrible faces to beholde, and their cries & voyces fatre contrary vnto other mens. They tooke in a maruelous deale of grounde in length to campe vpon, and so came forth to desfe Marius, and prouoke him to battell in open field. Marius made no reckoning of all their bragginge desfaies, but kept his men together within his campe, taking on terribly with them that would rashly take vpon them to moue ought to the contrary, and which through impaience of cholour would nedes go forth to fight, calling them traytors to their contry. For said he, we are not come to fight for our priuate glory, neither to winne two triumphes nor victories for our selues : but we must seeke by all meanes to diuert and put by this great shower of warres from vs, and this lightning and tempest, that it ouercome not all Italy. These words he spake vnto the priuate Captaines which were vnder him, as vnto men of hauior and quality. But as for the common souldiers, he made them stande vpon the trenches of his campe, one after an other to behold the enemies, & to acquaint them selues with sight of their faces, & their countenance, and marching, & not to be afrayed of their voyces to heare them speake, which were wonderfull, both straunge & beastly: and also that they might know the facion of their weapons, and how they handled them. And by this order & ordinary viewing of them, in time he made the things that femed fearefull vnto his men at the first sight, to be afterwards very familiar: so that they made no more wondering at them. For he iudged, the thing which in deede is true, that a rare and new matter neuer seene before, for lacke of iudgement and vnderstanding, maketh things vnknown to vs, more horrible & fearefull the they are: and to the contrary, that custome taketh away a great deale of feare, & terror of those things, which by nature are in deede fearefull. The which was seene then by experience. For they being daily acquainted to looke vpon these barbarous people, it did not only diminish some parte of the former feare of the ROMANE souldiers: but furthermore they whetting their choller with the fierce vtrollerable threatnes and bragges of these barbarous brutish people, did set their hartes a fire to fight with them, because they did not only wast and destroy all the contry about them, but besides that, came to geue assault euen vnto their campe with such a boldnes, that the ROMANE souldiers could no longer suffer them, and they letted not to speake wordes that came to Marius eares him selfe. What cowardlines hath Marius euer known in vs, that he keeps vs thus from fighting, & vnder locke & key as it were, in the gard of porters, as if we were women? Let vs therefore shew our selues like men, & go aske him if he looke for any other souldiers besides our selues to defend ITALIE: and if he haue determined to employ vs as pioners onely, when he would cast a trench to ridde away the mudde, or to turne a riuer contrary. For therein hath he onely hitherunto employed vs in great labor, and they are the notable workes he hath done in his two Confullshippes, whereof he maketh his boast vnto them at ROME. Is he afrayed they should take him, as they did Carbo & Cepio, whom the enemies haue ouerthrowen? He must not be afrayed of that: for he is a Capitaine of another manner of valor and reputation then they were, and his army much better then theirs was. But howe soeuer it be, yet were it much better in prouing to loose something, then to be idle, & to suffer our friends and cosfederats to be destroyed & lacked before our eyes. Marius was maruelous glad to heare his men coplaine thus, & did comfort them, & told the that he did nothing mistrust their courage & valiantnes: howbeit that through the couself of certaine prophecies & oracles of the gods, he did expect time & place fit for victory. For he euer carried a SYRIAN womā in a litter about with him called Martha, with great reuerence, whom they said had the spirit of prophetic in her: & that he did euer sacrifice vnto the gods by her order, & at such time as she willed him to do it. This SYRIAN woman went first to speake with the Senate about these matters, and did foretell & prognosticate what should follow. But the Senate would not heare her, & made her to be drue away. Whereupon she went vnto the womē, & made the see proofe of some things she vaunted of, & specially Marius wife, at whose feet she was set one day in an assembly of the comon playes, to see sword players fight for life & death: for she told her certainly which of the should ouercome. Whereupon this Lady sent her vnto her husband Marius, who made great reckoning of her, & carried her euē in him wher soeuer he went. She was alwaies at Marius sacrifices, apparelled in a gown of purple in graine, clasped to her with claspes, & held a speare in her hand wōld all about with nosegayes, & garlands of flowers tyed on with laces. This manner of iest made many doubt whether Marius shewed this woman openly, beleuing in dede that she had the gift of prophecy: or els that knowing the contrary, he made as though he did beleue it, to helpe her sayning. But that which Alexander the MYNDIAN wrote touching Vultures, is a thing greatly to be wōdred at. For he said there were two of the followed Marius in his warres, & that they euer shewed the selues & missed not, when he should win any great battel, & that they did know them by latin collers they ware about their necks, which the souldiers had tyed about the, & afterwards let them go where they would: by reason wherof, they did know the souldiers againe, & it femed also that they did salute the, & were very glad when they saw the, & perswaded the selues, that it was a signe & token of good lucke to follow. Many signes and tokens were seene before the battell: howbeit all the rest were ordinary signes, sauing that which was reported to be seene at TVDERTVM, & AMERIA, two cities of ITALIE.

For

A For they say there were seene speares and targets in the night, butting like fire in the element, which first were caried vp & downe here and there, and then met together euen as men moue & flutte that fight one with an other: vntill at the length, the one geuing backe, and the other followinge after, they all vanished away, and consumed towarde the West. About the selfe same time also, there came from the citie of PESSINNTA, Batabaces, the chiefe priest of the great mother of the goddesses, who brought newes, that the goddess had spoken to him within her sanctuary, and told him that the victory of this warre should fall out on the ROMANES side. The Senate beleued it, and ordained that they should build a temple vnto that goddess, to geue her thanks for the victorie which she did promise them. Batabaces also would haue presented him selfe vnto the people in open assemblee, to tell them as much. But there was one Aulus Pompeius a Tribune that would not suffer him to do it, calling him tumbler, or juggler, & violently thrust him behinde the pulpit for orations: but the mischaunce that fell vpon Pompeius afterwards, made the more to beleue Batabaces words. For Pompeius the Tribune no sooner came home vnto his house, but a great vehement agewooke him, wherof he dyed the seuenth day after, as all the world could winites. Now the TEVTONS perceiving that Marius stirred not at all out of his campe, they proued to assault him: howbeit they were so well receiued with shotte and slinges, that after they had lost certaine of their men, they gaue it ouer, and determined to goe further, perswading them selues that they might easily passe the Alpes without daunger. Wherefore trussing vp all their baggage, they passed by Marius campe: at which time it appeared more certainly then before, that they were a maruelous great multitude of people, by the length of time which they tooke to passe their way. For it is sayd they were passing by his campe, fixe dayes continually together. And as they came raking by the ROMANES campe, they asked them in mockery, if they would wyte or send home any thing to their wiues, for they would be with them ere it were long. When they were all passed and gone, and that they continued on their iorney full, Marius also raised his campe, and went and followed them fayer and softly foote by foote, and euer kept hard at their taile as neere as he could, alwayes fortifying his campe very well, and euer choosing strong places of scituation, & aduantage to lodge in, that they might be safe in the night time. Thus they marched on in this sorte, vntill they came vnto the city of ALEX, from whence they had not farre to goe, but they entered straight into the mountaines of the Alpes. Wherefore Marius prepared now to fight with them: & chose out a place that was very strong of scituation to lodge his campe in, howbeit there lacked water. And they say he did it of purpose, to the ende to quicken his mens courage the more thereby. Many repined at it, and tolde him that they should stande in great daunger to abide maruelous thirst if they lodged there. Whereunto he made answer, shewing them the riuer that ranne hard by the enemies campe, saying withall, that they must goe thither and buy drinke with their blood. The souldiers replied againe: and why then doe ye not lead vs thither, whilst our blood is yet moyste? he gently answered them againe: because the first thing we doe, we must fortifie our campe. The souldiers, though they were angry with him, yet they obeyed him: but the slaues hauing neither drinke for them selues, nor for their cattell, gathered together a great troupe of them, and went towards the riuer: some of them carying axes, other hatchets, other swords and speares, with their pottes to cary water, determining to fight with the barbarous people, if otherwise they could not come by it. A fewe of the barbarous people at the first fought with them, because the most parte of their company were at dinner, after they had bathed, and others were still in the bath washing them selues, finding in that place many springes of hotte natural bathes. Thus the ROMANES founde many of the barbarous people makinge mery, and taking their pleasure about these bathes, for the great delite they tooke to consider the pleasantnes of the place: but when they heard the noyse of them that fought, they begante to runne one after an other vnto the place from whence the noyse came. Wherefore it was a hard thing for Marius any longer to keepe the ROMANE souldiers in from going to their helpe, for that they feared their slaues should haue bene slaine of the barbarous people: and moreover, because the valliantest souldiers of their enemies called the AMBRONS (who before had ouercome Manlius and Cepio, two ROMANE Captaines with their armies, and that made of them selues thirty thousand fighting men) ranne to armes, being very heavy of their bodies, as hauing filled their bellies well, but otherwise valliant and coragious fellows, and more liuely then they were wont to be, by reason of the wine they had dronke. They ran not furiously to fight out of order, neither did they crye out confusedly, but marching all together in good array, making a noyse with their harness all after one forte, they oft rehearsed their owne name AMBRONS, AMBRONS, AMBRONS which was, either to call one another of them, or else to feare the ROMAINES with their name only. The ITALIANS also on thother side, being the first that came downe to fight with them, were the LIGURIANS, dwelling vpon the coast of Genuoa, who hearing this noyse and crye of theirs, plainly vnderstanding them: answered them againe with the like noyse and crye, LIGURIANS, LIGURIANS, LIGURIANS, saying that it was the true surname of all their nation. And so before they ioyned together, this crye was redoubled many a time on either side: and the Captaines of both partes made their fouldiers crye out all together, contending for enuy one against another, who should crye it out lowdest. This contention of crying, inflamed the fouldiers corages the more. Now the AMBRONS hauing the riuier to passe, were by this meanes put out of order, and before they could put them selues in battell ray againe, after they had passed the riuier, the LIGURIANS ranne with great fury to set upon the forme: and after them, (to aide the LIGURIANS that had begun the charge) the ROMAINES them selues fell also upon the AMBRONS, comming downe from the places of aduantage vpon these barbarous people, and compelled them by this meanes to turne their backs, and fle. So the greatest slaughter they made, fortun'd vpon the bancke of the riuier, wherinto they thrust one another in such sorte, that all the riuier ran blood, being filled with dead bodies. And they that could get ouer the riuier againe, and were on thother side, durst not gather together any more to stand to defence: so as the ROMAINES slew them, and draue them into their campe, euen vnto their cariage. Then their women came out against them with swordes and axes in their handes, grinding their teeth: and crying out for sorrow and anger, they charged as well vpon their owne people that fled, as vpon them that chased them: the one as traitors, and the other as enemies. Furthermore, they thrust them selues amongst them that fought, & strove by force to plucke the ROMAINES targets out of their handes, and tooke holde of their naked swordes bare handed, abiding with an inuincible corage to be hacked and mangled with their swordes. And thus was the first battell geuen (as they say) by the riuers side, rather by chance vnlooked for, then by any set purpose, or through the generals counsell. Now the ROMAINES, after they had overcome the most parte of the AMBRONS, retraying backe by reason the night had ouertaken them, did not (as they were wont after they had geuen such an ouerthrow) singes of victory and triumphe, nor make good chere in their tentes one with another, and least of all sleepe: (which is the best & sweetest refreshing for men that haue fought happily) but contrarily, they watched all that night with great feare and trouble, because their campe was not trench'd and fortified, and because they knewe also that there remained almost innumerable thousandes of barbarous people, that had not yet fought: besides also, that the AMBRONS that had fled and scaped from the ouerthrow, did howle out all night with lowd cries, which were nothing like mens lamentacions and sighes, but rather like wilde beastes bellowing and roaring. So that the bellowing of such a great multitude of beastly people, mingled together with threates and waylinges, made the mountaines threabouts and the running riuier to rebounde againe of the founde and ecco of their cries maruelously: by reason whereof, all the valley that lay betweene both, thundered to heare the horrible and fearefull trembling. This made the ROMAINES fouldiers afeard, and Marius him selfe in some doubt: because they looked to haue bene fought withall the same night, being altogether troubled and out of order. Notwithstanding, the barbarous people did not assault them that night, nor the next day following, but only prepared them selues vnto battell. And in the meane time Marius knowing that there was aboute the place where they were camped, certaine caues and litle valleyes couered with wodde: he secretly sent Claudius Marcellus thither with three thousand footemen well armed, and commaunded him to keepe close in ambushe, vntill he saw that the barbarous people were fighting with him, and that then he should come and set upon their rearward. The residue of his armie, they supped when time came, and after supper reposed them selues.

A selues. The next morning at the breake of day, Marius brought his men into the fildes out of his forte: where he put them in order of battell, sending his horsemen before to draw the enemies out to skirmishe. The TEUTONS seeing them come, had not the pacience to tarry till the ROMAINES were come downe into the plaine fildes to fight without aduantage, but arming them selues in hast, and in a rage, ranne vp the hill to the ROMAINES, where they stood in battell ray. Marius taking good regard to that they did, sent here and there vnto the priuate Captaines, charging them they should not stirre, and onely to temporise and forbear, vntill the enemies came within a stones cast of them: and that they should then throw their darts at them, and afterwards drave their swordes, and repulse the barbarous people with their shieldes. For he did foresee before, that when they should clime vp against the hill (vpon the hanging whereof the ROMAINES had set their battell) that their blowes would not be of great force, nor their order and ranckes could stand close together to any effect or purpose: because they could not haue sure footing, nor march assuredly, but would easily be throwe backward if they were neuer so litle repulsed, by reason of the hanging of the hill. Marius gaue this order vnto his folke and therewithall was him selfe the first man that put it in execution: for he was as trymme a warrior, and as valliant a fouldier, as any man in all his army: besides, not one amongst them all would venter furdre, and be more bolde then him selfe. So when the ROMAINES had resisted them, and stayed them sodainly, going with fury to haue wonne the hill, perceiving them selues to be repulsed, they gaue backe by litle and litle, vntill they came into the field: and then beganne the foremost of them to gather together, and to put them selues in C battell ray vpon the plaine, when sodainly they heard the noyse and charging of them that were in the tayle of their army. For Claudius Marcellus failed not to take the occasion when it was offered him, because that the noyse of the first charge comming vp against the hills thereabouts, vnder the which he lay in ambushe, gaue him aduertisement thereof: whereupon he caused his men presently to shew, and running with great cries, came to geue a charge vpon those which were in the tayle of the barbarous people, putting the hindmost to the swordes. They made their fellows whose backs were next vnto them, to turne their faces, & so from man to man, till at the length, in shorte time all their battell beganne to wauer in disorder: and they made no great resistance, when they saw they were so charged before and behind, but beganne straight to flie for life. The ROMAINES following them hard at the heeles, killed and D tooke prisoners about a hundred thousande of them, and tookeouer their cartes, their tentes and all their cariage. Which the whole army by consent agreed to present vnto Marius, excepting nothing, sauing that which was imbeaced and conueyed away vnder hande. Now, though this was a maruelous honorable & right noble present yet they thought it not a recompence sufficient for that he had deserued, for the valure he had shewed of a famous Captaine in leading of his army, & for the good order he kept in this warre: so happy thought they them selues to haue escaped so great a daunger. Notwithstanding, some wryters do not agree, that the spoyle of the barbarous people was geuen vnto Marius: nor that there were also so great a number of men slaine as we haue spoken of. But they say, that after this battell the MARCELLIANS did inclose their vines, with hedges made of dead mens bones: and that E the bodies being rotten and consumed vpon the fildes through the great raine that fell vpon them the winter following, the ground waxed so fatte, and did sike the greafe so deepe in the same, that the sommer following they did beare an vncredible quantity of all sortes of frutes. And by this meanes were Archilocus wordes proued true, that the errable land doth waxe fat with such rottenesse or purtification. And it is sayd also, that so ordinary after great battells, there falleth great store of raine. Either it is by meane of some god that powring downe pure raine water doth purifie, wash, and clesne the groundes, defiled and polluted with mans blood, or else it happeneth by naturall cause. For that the ouerthrow of so many dead bodies, and of the blood spilt, engendreth a moyst, grosse, and heauy vapoure, which doth thicken the ayer (that by nature is chaungeable, and easie to alter) from a very small or litle beginning, vnto an F exceeding great chaunge. After this battell, Marius caused the harness and spoyles of the barbarous people to be layed aside, that were left whole and fayer to fight, to beautifie & enrich the pompe of his triumphe. Then he caused the rest to be gathered together on a great

heape, and layed upon a stake of wodde, to make a noble sacrifice vnto the gods, all his army being armed about him, crowned with garlandes of triumphe, and him selfe apparellled in a long gowne of purple, according to the custome of the ROMAINES in such a case, and holding a torch burning in both his hands, which he first lifted vp vnto heauen. And as he was turning downe the torch to put fire to the stake of wodde, they saw some of his friends a good way of a horse backe, comming post vnto him: then suddenly there was a great silence made of all the assembly, euery man desirous to heare what good newes they had brought. When they were come and lighted of their horses, they ranne straight to embrace Marius, and brought him newes that he was chosen Consull the fift time: and presented him the letters sent him from ROME confirming the same. And thus, this new ioy falling out besides the victory, the private souldiers did thewe the great ioy and pleasure they tooke in both, with great shewes and beating vpon their harnesse: and the Capitaines also, they crowned Marius againe with new garlandes of laurell which they put about his head, and that done, he put fire vnder the stake of wodde, and ended his sacrifice. But that which neuer suffereth men quietly to enioy the good happe of any victory clearly, but in this mortall life doth euer mingle the ill with the good, be it either fortune or spight of fatall destinie, or else the necessitie of the naturall causes of earthly thinges: did shortly after this great ioy bring newes vnto Marius, of his companion Catulus Lucatius the other Consull, who was like a cloude in a fayer bright day, and brought the city of ROME againe into a new feare and trouble. For Catulus that went against the CIMBRES, thought it was not for him to keepe the straightes of the mountaines, in hope to let the barbarous people for passing: because that in so doing, he had bene compelled to deuide his army into many partes, and had weakened him selfe very much if he had taken that course. Wherefore comming a litle on this side the Alpes towards ITALIE, he planted him selfe vpon the riuier of Atheis, and built a bridge upon it, to passe and repasse ouer his men when he would, and sette vp at either end of the bridge two strong fortes well fortified, that he might more comodiously helpe the places on the other side of the riuier, if the barbarous people by chance would offer to force the, after they had gotten out of the straights of the mountaines. Now, these barbarous people had such a glory in them selues, and disdained their enemies so much, that more to shew their force and boldnes, then of any necessity that compelled them, or for any benefit they got by it: they suisted it to know upon them being starke naked, and did clime vp to the toppes of the mountaines, throw great heapes of life and snow. And when they were at the very toppes of all, they layed their long broad targets vnder their bodies, and lay all along upon them, sliding downe the steepe high rockes, that had certaine hanginges out of an infinite height. In the ende, they came to campe nere vnto the ROMAINES by the riuier side, and considered howe they might passe it ouer: and beganne to fill it vp, tearing downe (like gyants) great hills of earth which they founde thereabouts, brought thither great trees which they pulled vp whole by the rootes, threw in great peeces of rockes which they brake, and whole towers of earth after them, to stoppe and breake the course of the riuier. But besides all this, they threw great timber into the riuier, which being caried downe the streame, came with such a force, & hit against the postes of the bridge so violently, that they shaked the ROMAINES bridge maruelously. Whereupon many of the souldiers of the great campe were fraied, and forsaking it, beganne to retire. But then did Catulus, like a perfit good Capitaine shewe, that he made lesse account of his owne priuate honor and estimation, then he did of the generall honor of all his souldiers. For, seeing that he could not perswade his men by any reason to tary, and that in this feare they dislodged in disorder against his will: he him selfe commaunded the standerd bearer of the Eagle to marche on, and ranne to the foremost that went their way, and marched him selfe before them all, to the intent that the shame of this retire should altogether light vpon him, & not upon his contrie, and that it might appeare the ROMAINES did follow their Capitaine, and not sic away. The barbarous people therefore assailing the force at the end of the bridge of the riuier of Atheis, rooke it, & all the men that were in it. And because the ROMAINES defended it like valliant men, and had lustely ventured their liues to the death for defence of their contrie: the barbarous people let them go vpon coposition, which they sware to keepe faithfully, by their bull of copper. This bull afterwards was taken

A when they lost the battell, and caried (as they say) into Catulus Lucatius house, as the chieftest thing of the victory. Furthermore, the barbarous people finding the contry open without any defence, scattered here and there, and destroyed all where they came. Whereupon the ROMAINES sent for Marius to ROME to goe against them: and after he was arriued, euery man thought he shoulde haue entred in triumphe, because also the Senate did graunt it him very willingly. But he would not doe it, either because he would not deprive his souldiers and the Capitaines that had fought vnder him, of any parte of the honor that was due vnto them, they being absent: or because that he would warrant the people fro the present daunger they were in, by laying aside the glory of his former victories, into the hands of the good fortune of ROME, in certaine hope to take it againe afterwards, by a more honorable and perfit confirmation of the second. Wherefore, after he had made an oration to the people, and Senate according to the time, he went his way immediately towards Catulus Lucatius, whose comming did comforte him much: and sent also for his army that was yet in GAULE beyond the mountaines. And after his army was come, he passed the riuier of Po, to kepe the barbarous people from hurting ITALIE on this side the Po. Now, the CIMBRES still deferred to geue battell because they looked for the TEVTONS, and sayd: that they marueled much what they ment to tary so long: either because they knewe not in deede of their ouerthrowe, or else for that they would not seeme to knowe it, because they handeled them cruelly that brought the newes of their deaths. At the length, they sent vnto Marius to aske him landes and townes sufficient, to keepe them and their brethren. Marius asked their Ambassadors what brethren they ment. C They answered, that they were the TEVTONS. Whereat the standers by beganne to laugh: and Marius finely mocked them, saying. Care not for those brethren sayd he, for we haue gotten them ground enough, which they will kepe for euer. These Ambassadors found his mock straight, and beganne to reuile and threaten him, that the CIMBRES shoulde presently make him repent it, and the TEVTONS so soone as they arriued. Why, sayd Marius vnto them againe, they are come already: and there were no honesty in you, if you could geue your way & not salute them, since they are your brethren. And as he spake these wordes, he commaunded his men to bring him the kinges of the TEVTONS bounde and chained, that had bene taken within the mountaines of the Alpes by the SEQUANI. The CIMBRES vnderstanding this by reporte of their Ambassadors, presently marched towards Marius, who stirred not at all, but only fortified and kept his campe. They say that it was for this battell that Marius first inuented the newe deuise he brought in for the darte which the ROMAINES were wont alwayes to throwe against the enemies at the first charge. For before, the staffe of the darte was fastned vnto the iron, and the iron vnto the staffe, with two litle iron pinnes that passed through the wodde: and then Marius left one of the iron pinnes as it was before, & taking away the other, put a litle thinne pinne of wodde, easie to be broken, in place of the same, making it craftely, to the end that when the darte was thrown, & stucke in the enemies target, it should not stand right forward, but bow downward towards the iron, that the wodden pinne being broken, the staffe of the darte should hang downewards, holding yet by the iron pinne running quite through at the poynte. So Boerix king of the CIMBRES, comming nere to Marius campe with a small number of horsemen, sent him defyaunce, & willed him to appoint a day & place for battell, that they might trye it out, who should be owners of the contry. Whereunto Marius made answer, that it was not the manner of the ROMAINES to counsell with their enemies, of the time and place when they should geue battell: but neuertheless, he would not flie to pleasure the CIMBRES so much. And thus they agreed betwene them, that it should be the thirde day following, in the plaine of Verfelles, which was very commodious for the horsemen of the ROMAINES: and also for the barbarous people to put out at will their great number of fighting men. So both armies failed not to meete according to appointment, but appeared ranged in battell, the one before the other. Catulus Lucatius the other Consull, had in his campe twenty thousand, and three hundred souldiers: and Marius had in his campe two and thirty thousand fighting men, which he placed in the two wings of the battell, shutting in Catulus with his men in the middest. As Sylla writeth it, who was present at the same: saying, that Marius did it of malice, for the hope he had to ouerthrowe his enemies with the two winges of the battell, to the end that the whole victory should light upon his two wings; and that Catulus & his men in the midst should have no parte thereof. For he could not so much as fronte the enemy, because that commonly when the fronte of a battell is of such a bredche, the two wings are euer stretched out before, and is made like the cressant of a moone, where the midst is thickest and fardest in. And it is written also in other stories, that Catulus him selfe accusing the malice of Marius, because he did so: spake it to excuse his owne dishonour. As for the CIMBRRES, the troups of their footemen coming out of their fortres leasurely, did put them selues into a Squadron, as broade as long, for in euery side they occupied almost thirty furlong: but their horsemen which were fiftene thousande, marched before in sumptuous furniture. For they had helmets on their heades facioned like wilde beastes neckes, and straunge beuers or buffes to the same, & ware on their helmets great high plumes of feathers, as they had bene wings: which to fight made them appeare taller and bigger men then they were. Furthermore, they had good curases on their backs, and caried great white targets before them: and for weapons offensue, euery man had two dartes in his hand to bestow a farr off, & when they came to hand strokes, they had great heauy swords which they fought with all neere hand. But at that time they did not marche directly in rancke against the army of the ROMAINES, but turned a litle on the right hand, meaning to inclose the ROMAINES betwene them and their footemen that were on the left hand. The ROMAINE Capitaines founde their policy straight, but they could not keepe their souldiers backe: for there was one that cried, the enemies fled, and immediatly all the rest beganne to runne after. In the meane time, the footemen of the barbarous people that were like to a sea before them, came forwards still: & then Marius hauing washed his handes, and lifting them vp to heauen, promised, and vowed a solemne sacrifice vnto the goddess of a hundred oxen. Catulus also made a vow, lifting vp his handes to heauen in like maner, that he would build a temple vnto fortune for that day: and it is reported, that Marius hauing sacrificed, when they shewed him the intralls of the beastes sacrificed: he cried out a lowde, the victory is mine. But when they came to geue the charge, Marius had a great misfortune happened him, powred upon him by goddes iustice, who turned his craft against him selfe, as Sylla wryteth: for there rose very credibly a great a dust, that both armies lost the sight one of another. And hereupon Marius being the first that ranne to beginne the charge, and hauing placed his men about him, mist to meete with his enemies and being passed beyonde their battell, wandred a great while vp and downe the field, whilst the barbarous people fought against Catulus. So that the greatest fury of the battell was against Catulus and his army: in the which, Sylla wryteth he was him selfe, and sayeth, that the heate and the sunne which was full in the CIMBRRES faces, did the ROMAINES maruelous pleasure at that time. For the barbarous people being very hard brought vp to away with cold (because they were borne and bred in a cold contry, shadowed altogether with woddes and trees as we haue sayd) were to the contrary very tender against the heate, and did melt with sweating against the sunne, and gaped straight for breathe, putting their targets before their faces: for it was also in the hart of sommer, about the feuen and twentie day of the moneth of Iulie, that this battell was geuen, and this dust also made the ROMAINES the bolder, and kept them that they could not see the innumerable multitude of their enemies farre from them. And euery man runninge to set upon them that came against them, they were ioyned together in fight, before that the sight of their enemies could make them afayed. And furthermore, they were so good souldiers, and so able to take paines, that how extreame soeuer the heate was, no man was sene sweate nor blow, though they ranne at the first to set upon them: & this hath Catulus Lucatius him selfe left in wryting vnto the praise of his souldiers. So were the most parte of the barbarous people, and specially of the best souldiers, slaine in the field. And because they should not open nor breake their rankes, the foremost rankes were all tyed & bound together with girdells, leather thongs, & long chaynes of iron: and they that fled, were chased & followed into their campe by the ROMAINES, where they met with horrible and fearefull things to beholde. For, their wiues being upon the toppes of their cartes, apparelled all in blacke, slew all those that fled, without regarde of perones: some their fathers, other their husbands or their brethren, and strangling the litle young babes with their owne handes, they cast them vnder

A vnder the carte wheeles, and betwene the horse legges, and afterwards slue them selues. And they say, that there was a woman hanged at the ende of a carte ladder, hauing hanged vp two of her children by the neckes at her heeles. And that the men also, for lacke of a tree to hang them selues on, tyed slipping halters about their neckes, vnto the hornes & feete of the oxen, and that they did pricke them afterwarde with goades to make them sing and leape so long, that dragging them all about, and treading them vnder teete, at the length they killed them. Now, though nũbers were slaine by this meanes, yet were there three score thousand of them taken prisoners, and the number of them that were slaine, came to twise as many moe. In this manner Marius souldiers spoyled the campe of the CIMBRRES: but the spoyles of dead men that were slaine in the fildes, with their ensignes and trompets, were all brought (as it is sayd) vnto Catulus campe, which was a plaine testimonie to shewe that Catulus and his souldiers had wonne the field. Strife rising thus betwene the souldiers of both camps about it, that the matter might be tryed firstly betwene them: they made the Ambassadors of PARMA their arbitratours, who were by chance at that time in the army. Catulus Lucatius souldiers led the Ambassadors to the place where the ouerthrowe was geuen, shewing them the enemies bodies pearced through with their pykes, which were easie to be knowne, because Catulus had made them graue his name upon their pykes. For all this, Marius went away with the honor of this great victory, as well for the first battell he wanne alone, when he ouerthrowe the TEVTONS and the AMBRONAS for his great calling, hauing bene Consul fift times. And furthermore, the common people at ROME, called him the third founder of the city of ROME, thinking them selues now deliuered from as great a daũger, as before time they had bene from the ancient GAVLES. And euery man feasting at home with his wife and children, offered the best dishes of meate they had to supper, vnto the goddess, and vnto Marius: and would needes haue him alone to triumphe for both victories. But he would not in any case, but triumphed into the city with Catulus Lucatius, meaning to shew himselfe courteous and moderate in so great prosperiety: and peradventure also fearing Catulus souldiers, who were in readinesse and prepared (if Marius would haue depriued their Captaine of that honor) to let him also of his triumphe. And thus you see howe he passed his fift Consulshippe. After that, he made more earnest sute for the sixt Consulshippe, then euer any other did for his first: seeking the peoples goodwilles by all the fayer meanes he could to please them, humbling him selfe vnto them, not only more then became his estate and calling, but directly also against his owne nature, counterfeiting a courteous populer mannet, being cleane contrarie to his disposition. His ambition made him timorous to deale in matters of the state concerning the city. For that corage and boldnesse which he had in battell against the enemy, he lost it quite when he was in an assembly of people in the city: and was easily put out of his byase, with the first blame or praise he heard geuen him. And though they reporte, that at a time when he made a thousande CAMERINES free of the city of ROME, because they had done valliant seruice in the warres, that there were some that did accuse him, saying, that it was a thing done against all law: he answered them, that for the noyse of the armor, he could not heare the law. Notwithstanding, it seemeth that in dede he was greatly afraid of the fury of the people in an assembly of the city. For in time of warres, he euer stode upon his reputacion and authority, knowing that they had neede of him: but in peace and ciuill gouernment, because he would rather be the chiefeft man then the honestest man, he would creepe into the peoples bosomes to get their fauor and goodwill. And thus through his euill behavior, he brought all the nobility generally to be his enemies. But he feared nor mistrusted none so much, as he did Metellus, for the great vnthankfull parte he remembered he had played him: and the rather also, because he knew him to be iust & true dealing man, and one that was euer against these people pleasers and flatterers. Marius therefore practised all the wayes he could, to get Metellus to be banished ROME. Wherefore, to compass his intent, he fell in frendship with Glancia, and one Saturninus, two of the most boldest, most desperate, and most hardbraind young men, that were in all ROME: who had all the rablement of rogues and beggers, and such tumultuous people at their commandement, by whose meanes he made new populer lawes, and caused the souldiers to be called home out of the warres, & mingled them with the people of the city in common assemblies, to trouble and veze Metellus. Moreouer Rutilius, an honest and true writer, (howbeit an enemy vnto Marius) A wryteth, that he obtained his first Consulshippe by corruption of money, which he caused be distributed amongst the tribes of the people: & that he bought it for ready money to put by Metellus, and to haue Valerius Flaccus not for his fellowe and companion in the Consul shippe, but rather for a minister of his will. There was neuer ROME to whom the people granted the Consulshippe six times, except it were vnto Valerius Corvinus only. But for him, they say that there was fue and forty yeares betwene his first Consulship and the last. Where Marius was the first year of his Consulshippe, continued five yeares together by good fortune one after another. But in his last Consulship, he wanne him selfe great hate and malice, bicause he did many fowle faultes to please Saturninus withall: as amongst others, when he bare with Saturninus, who murdered Nonius his competitor in the Tribuneship. Afterwards when Saturninus was chosen Tribune of the people, he preferred a law for distribution of the landes among the common people, and vnto that law he had specially added one article: that all the Lords of the Senate should come openly to sweare, that they should kepe and obserue from point to point that which the people by their voyces should decree, and should not deny it in any iorte. But Marius in open Senate, made as though he would withstand this arti cle, saying, that neither he nor any other wise man of iudgement would take this othe: for said he, if the law be euill, then they should doe the Senate open wrong to compell them by force to graunt it, and not of their owne goodwills. But he spake not that, meaning to do as he said for it was but a bayte he had layed for Metellus only, which he could hardly escape. For ima gining that to tell a fine lye, was a peece of vertue, and of a good wit: he was thoroughly resol ued with him selfe, not to passe for any thing he had spoken in the Senate. And to the contrary also, knowinge well enough that Metellus was a graue wise man, who esteemed that to be iust and true (as Pindarus sayd) is the beginning and foundation of great vertue: he thought he would outreach him, makinge him affirme before the Senate that he would not sweare, know ing also that the people would hate him deadly, if he would refuse afterwarde to sweare.

And so in dede it happened. For Metellus hauing assured them then that he would not sweare, the Senate brake vp vpon him. And shortly after, Saturninus the Tribune calling the Senators vnto the pulpit for orations, to compell them to sweare before the people: Marius went thi ther to offer him selfe to sweare. Whereupon the people makinge silence, listned attentively to heare what he would say. But Marius not regarding his large promise & bragges made be fore the Senate, sayed then, his necke was not so long, that he would preiudice the common wealth in a matter of so great importance: but that he would sweare, and obey the lawes, if were a law. This shifting subtilty he added to it, to cloke and couer his shame: and when he had sayd so, he tooke his othe. The people seeing him sweare, were maruelous glad, and prai sed him with clapping of their hands: but the nobility hanging downe their heads were affrai med of him, and were maruelous angry in their hartes with him, that he had so cowardly and shamefully gone from his word. Therupon all the Senate tooke their othes, one after another against their wills, bicause they were afrayed of the people. Sauing Metellus, whome, neither parentes nor frendes perswasion and intreaty could moue to sweare, for any punishment that Saturninus had imposed vpon them, which refused to take the othe, but continued one man still according to his nature, and would neuer yelde vnto it, offering to abide any payne, rather then to be brought to consent to a dishonest matter vnbecoming his estate. And there upon went out of the assembly, and talking with them that did accompany him, told them, that to doe euill, it was too easie a thing: and to doe good without daunger, it was also a com mon matter: but to doe well with daunger, that was the parte of an honest and virtuous man.
Saturninus then commaunded the Consuls by edict of the people, that they should banish Metellus by founde of trompet, with special commaundement, that no man should let him haue fire nor water, nor lodge him priuately nor openly. The common people, they were read y to haue fallen vpon him, and to haue killed him: but the noble men being offended for the injury they had offered him, gathered together about him to saue him, if any would offer him violence. Metellus him selfe was so good a man, that he would not any ciuill diffention should rise for his sake: and therefore he absented him selfe from ROME, wherein he did like a wise man.

man. For sayd he, either things will amend, and the people then repenting them selues of the wrong they haue done me, will call me home againe: or else things standing as they do now, it shalbe best for me to be furthest of. But for his trauaill in his exile, howe much he was be loued and honored, and how sweetely he passed his time studying philosophie in the citie of RHODES, shalbe declared more at large in his life. Now on the other side, Marius to recom pence the pleasure Saturninus had done him, being driven to let him haue his will in all things: did not foresee what an intollerable plague he brought vnto the common wealth, geuing the brydle to a desperate man, who euery way, by force, by sword and murder, plainly sought to vnturne the power, with the vtter destruction and subuersion of the whole common weale. And so bearing reuerence of the one side vnto the nobility, and desiring on the other side to gratifie the common people: he played a shameful parte, and shewed him selfe a dou ble dealing man. For one night the nobilitie and chiefe citizens comming to his house, to perswade him to brydle Saturninus insolencie and boldnes: at the selfe same time also Saturni nus going thither to speake with him, he caused him to be let in at a backe dore, the noble men not being priuie to his comming. And so Marius telling the nobility, and then Saturninus, that he was troubled with a losenes of his body, vnder this pretence whipped up and downe, now to the one, then to the other, and did nothing else but fer them further out one against an o ther, the they were before. Neuertheles, the Senate being maruelous angry with his naughty double dealing, and the order of knights taking parte with the Senate, Marius in the ende was compelled to arme the people in the market place, to suppress them that were vp, and C drawe them into the Capitoll: where for lacke of water, they were compelled to yelde them selues at the length, bicause he had cut of the pypes and conduits by the which the water ran vnto the Capitoll. By reason whereof, they being vnable to continue any longer, called Saturni nus vnto them, and yellected them selues to him, vnder the assurance of the faith of the common people. But although Marius did what he could possible to his vttermost power to saue them, he could not preuaile, nor doe them pleasure: for they were no sooner come downe into the market place, but they were all put to death. Whereupon he hauing now purchased him selfe the ill will of the people and nobility both, when time came about that new Censors should be chosen, euery man looked that he would haue bene one of the futers: howbeit he sued not for it, for feare of repulse, but suffered others to be chosen of farre lesse dignity and calling then D him selfe. Wherein notwithstanding he gloried, saying that he would not fue to be Censor, bicause he would not haue the ill will of many, for examining too straghtly their liues & man ners. Again, a decree being preferred to repeale Metellus banishment, Marius did what he could possible by word and deede to hinder it: howbeit, seeing in the end he could not haue his will, he let it alone. The people hauing thus willingly reuoked Metellus banishment, Ma rius hart would not serue him to see Metellus returne againe, for the malice he bare him: where fore, he tooke the seas to goe into CAPPADOCIA and GALATIA, vnder colour to pay certaine sacrifices to the mother of the goddess, which he had vowed vnto her. But this was not the very cause that made him to vndertake this iorney, for he had an other secret meaning in it.
For his nature not being framed to liue in peace, and to gouerne ciuill matters, and hauing at E tained to his greatnes by armes, and supposing that his glorie & authority consumed and de creased altogether liuing idly in peace: he fought to deuise new occasion of warres, hoping if he could stirre vp the kinges of ASIA, and specially Mithridates (who without his procure ment was feared much, that one day he would make warres against the ROMANES) that he should then vndoubtedly without let of any man be chosen Generall to make warres with him, and withall also; that by that meanes he should haue occasion to fill the citie of ROME with newe triumphes, and his house with the spoyles of the great kingdome of PONTA, and with the riches of the king. Now Mithridates disposing him selfe to entertaine Marius, with all the honor and curtesies he could possibly shew him: Marius in the ende notwithstanding would not once geue him a good looke, nor a courteous word againe, but churlishly sayd vnto *Mithri fore that the ROMAINES would speake their mindes freely: howbeit he neuer saw nor perceived it before, vntill that time. After Marius was returned vnto Rome, he built a house neere vnto the market place, because he would not (as he said himselfe) that such as came vnto him should trouble them selues in going farre to bring him home to his house: or else for that he thought this would be an occasion that diuerse would come to salute him, as they did other Senators. Howbeit that was not the cause in deede, but the onely cause was, for that he had no naturall graceron ciuility to entertaine men courtously that came vnto him, and that he lacked beuor besides to rule in a common wealth: and therefore in time of peace they made no more reckoning of him, then they did of an old rusty harnesse or implement that was good for nothing, but for the warres only. And for all other that professed armes as him selfe did, no man grieved him so much to be called forward to office and state before him selfe, as Sylla did. For he was ready to burst for spite, to see that the noble men did all what they could to preferre Sylla, for the malice and ill will they bare him: and that *Sylla*es first risinge and preferment grew, by the quarrells and contentions he had with him. And specially when Boethius king of NVMIDIA was proclaimed by the Senate, a frende and confederate of the ROMAINES people, he offred vp statues of victories, carying tokens of triumphe, into the temple of the Capitoll: and placed neere vnto them also, an image of gold of king Iugurthe, which he deliuered by his owne handes vnto Sylla. And this made Marius starke madde for spite and ielousie, and could not abide that an other should take vpon him the glory of his doings: inso much as he determined to plucke those images downe, and to cary them away by force. Sylla on the other side stomaked Marius, and would not suffer him to take them out of the place where they were: so that this ciuill sedition had taken present effect, had not the warres of their confederates fallen out betwene, and restrained them for a time. For the best fouldiers and most warlike people of all ITALIE, and of greatest power, they all together rose against the ROMAINES, and had well neere ouerthrowen their whole Empire. For they were not onely of great force and power, and well armed: but their Captaines also, for valliantes and skill, did in manner equal the worthines of the ROMAINES. For this warre fell out wonderfully, by reason of the calamity and misfortune that happened in it: but it wanne Sylla as much fame and reputation, as it did Marius shame and dishonor. For he shewed him selfe very colde and slow in all his enterprises, still delayinge time, either because age had mortified his aduie heate, and killed that quick ready disposition of body that was wont to be in him, being then about three score and five yeare olde: or else as he sayd him selfe, because he was waxen gowty, and had ache in his vaines & sinewes, that he could not well stirre his body, and that for shame, because he would not tary behinde in this warre, he did more then his yeares could away withall. Notwithstanding, as he was, yet he wanne a great battell, wherein were slaine six thousande of their enemies: and so long as the warres endured, he neuer gaue them aduantage of him, but patiently suffred them sometime to intrench him, and to mocke him, and geue him vile wordes, chalenging him out to fight, & yet all this would not prouoke him. It is sayd also, that Pompeius Silo, who was the chiefe Captaine of reputation & authority the enemies had, said vnto Marius on a time: if thou be Marius, so great a Captaine as they say thou art, leaue thy campe, & come out to battell. Nay, said Marius to him againe: if thou be a great Captaine, plucke me out by the eares, & copell me to come to battell. An other time when the enemies gaue them occasion to geue a great charge vpon them with aduantage: the ROMAINES were fainte hearted, and durst not let vpon them. Wherefore, after both the one and the other were reueryed, Marius caused his men to assemble, and spake vnto them in this sorte. I can not tell which of the two I should reckon most cowardes: you your selues, or your enemies: for they durst not once see your backes, nor you them in the faces. In the end notwithstanding, he was compelled to resigne his charge, being able to serue no longer for the weakenesse and debilitye of his body. Now, all the rebels of ITALIE being put downe, many at Rome (by the orators meantes) did sue to haue the charge of the warres against Mithridates: and among them, a Tribune of the people called Sulpitius, a very bold and rash man, beyond all mens hope and opinion preferred Marius, and perswaded them to geue him the charge of these warres, with title and authority of vice Consull. The people thereupon were deuided in two parties: for the one side

Silloes stowe challenge and Marius answer.

A stood for Marius, and thother would haue Sylla take the charge, saying, that Marius was to thinke nowe vpon the hottie bathes at Baies, to looke to cure his olde bodie, brought lowe with rewme and age, as him selfe sayd. For Marius had a goodly stately house in those partes neere vnto the mount of Milene, which was fatte more fine and curiously furnished, then became a Captaine that had bene in so many foughten battells and daungers: They say that Cornelia afterwards bought that fine house for the summe of seuen thousande five hundred crownes, and shortly after also, Lucullus bought it againe for two hundred and fifty thousand crownes: to so great excelle was vanitie and curiositie growen in very shorte time at Rome. Notwithstanding all this, Marius too ambitiously struing like a passioned young man against the weakenesse and debilitye of his age, neuer misfed day but he would be in the field of Mars to exercise him selfe among the young men, shewing his body disposed and ready to handle all kinde of weapons, and to ryde hories: albeit that in his latter time, he had no great health of body, because he was very heauy and sad. There were that liked that passing well in him, and went of purpose into the field to see the paines he tooke, struing to excell the rest. Howbeit those of the better sorte were very lory to see his avarice and ambition, considering specially, that being of a poore man become very rich, and of a right meane persone a great estate; that he could not now containe his prosperity within reasonable boundes, nor content him selfe to be esteemed and honored, quietly enioyinge all he had wonne, and which at that present he did possesse: but as if he had bene very poore and needy, after he had receiued such great honor and triumphes, would yet cary out his age so slowly, euen into CAPPADOCIA, and vnto the realme of PONT, to goe fight there against Archelaus, and Neopolemus, Ligu tenants of king Mithridates. In deede he alleaged some reasons to excuse him selfe, but they were altogether vaine: for he sayd that he desired in person to bring vp his sonne in exercise of armes, and to teach him the discipline of warres. That discouered the secret hidden plague, which of long time hath lurked in Rome, Marius specially hauing now met with a fit instrument, and minister to destroy the common wealth, which was, the insolent and rash Sulpitius: who altogether followed Saturninus doings, lauing that he was found too cowardly & fainte hearted in all his enterprises, and for that did Marius iustly reprove him. But Sulpitius, because he would not dally nor delay time, had euer fixe hundred younge gentlemen of the order of knights, whome he vied as his gard about him, and called them the gard against the Senate. D And one day as the Consulls kept their common assembly in the market place, Sulpitius coming in armed upon them, made them both take their heeles, and get them packing: and as they fled, one of the Consulls sonnes being taken tardy, was slaine, Sylla being thother Consull, and perceiving that he was followed hard at hand vnto Marius house, ranne into the same against the opinion of all the world: wherof that they ranne after him nor being aware, passed by the house. And it is reported that Marius him selfe conueyed Sylla safelie out at a backe dore, and that he being scaped thus, went vnto his campe. Notwithstanding, Sylla him selfe in his commentaries doth not say, that he was saued in Marius house when he fled: but that he was brought thither to geue his consent vnto a matter which Sulpitius would haue forced him vnto against his will, presenting him naked swordes on euery side. And he wryteth E also, that being thus forcibly brought vnto Marius house, he was kept there in this feare, vntill such time as returning into the market place, he was compelled to reuoke againe the adomement of iustice, which he and his companion by edict had commaunded. This done, Sulpitius then being the stronger, caused the commission & charge of this warres against Mithridates to be assigned vnto Marius by the voyce of the people. Therefore Marius geuing order for his departure, sent two of his Colonels before to take the army of Sylla: who hauing wonne his fouldiers harts before, and stirred them vp against Marius, brought them on with him directly towards Rome, being no lesse then five and thirty thousand fighting men: who setting upon the Captaines Marius had sent vnto them, slew them in the field: In reuenge whereof, Marius againe in Rome put many of *Sylla*es frendes and followers to death, and proclaimed open liberty by sound of trumpet, to all slaues and bondmen that would take armes for him: but there were neuer but three only that offered them selues. Whereupon, having made a litle resistance vnto Sylla when he came into Rome, he was soone after compelled to runne his way. Marius was no sooner out of the citie, but they that were in his company forsaking him, dispersed them selues here and there being darke night: and Marius him selfe got to a house of his in the contrie, called Salonium, and sent his sonne to one of his father in law Mutius farmes not farre from thence, to make some prouision for vittells. But Marius in the meane time, went before to Ostia, where one of his frendes Numerius had prepared him a shippe, in the which he embarked immediatly, not tarying for his sonne, and hoised saile, hauiing only Granius his wiues sonne with him. In the meane time the younger Marius beinge at his father in law Mutius farme, stayed so long in getting of prouision, in trussing of it vp, and carying it away, that broode day light had like to haue discovered him: for the enemies had aduertisement whether he was gone, whereupon certaine horsemen were sent thither supposing to haue found him. But the keeper of the house hauing an inkling of their comminge, and preventing them also before they came, sodainly yoked his oxen to the carte which he loded with beanes, and hidde this younger Marius vnder the same. And prickinge the oxen forward with his goade, set out, and met them as he went towards the city, and deliuered Ma-rius in this sorte into his wiues house: and there taking such things as he needed, when the night following came, went towards the sea, & tooke shippe, finding one crosse sayled, bound towards AFRICK. Marius the father saylinge on still, had a very good winde to poyntealongest the coast of ITALIE: notwithstanding, being afrayed of one Geminus, a chiefe man of TERRACINE, who hated him to the death, he gaue the maryners warning thereof betimes, and willed them to take heede of landing at TERRACINE. The maryners were very willing to obey him, but the winde stoode full against them comming from the mayne, which raised a great storme, and they feared much that their vessell which was but a bote, would not brooke the seas, besides that he him selfe was very sicke in his stomake, and sore sea beaten: notwithstanding, at the length with the greatest difficulty that might be, they recovered the coastouer against the city of CIRCES. In the meane time, the storme increased still, and their vi-tells failed them: whereupon they were compelled to land, and went wandring vp & downe not knowinge what to doe, nor what way to take. But as it falleth out commonly in such li-cates of extremitie, they thought it alwayes the best safetie for them, to flie from the place where they were, and to hope of that which they saw not: for if the sea were their enemy, the lande was so likewise. To meete with men, they were afrayed: and not to meete with them on thother side lacking vittells, was in dede the greater daunger. Neuerthelesse, in the end they met with heard men that could geue them nothing to eate, but knowing Marius, warned him to get him out of the way as soone as he could possible, because it was not longe since that there passed by a great troupe of horseme that sought him all about. And thus being brought vnto such perplexity, that he knew not where to bestowe him selfe, and specially for that the poore men he had in his company were almost starued for hunger: he got out of the high way notwithstanding, and sought out a very thicke wodde where he passed all that night in great sorrow, and the next morninge beinge compelled by necessity, determined yet to employ his body before all his strength failed. Thus he wandered on alongest the sea coast, still comforting them that followed him the best he could, & praying them not to dispayre, but to restore them selues to him, euen vntill the last hope, trusting in certaine prophecies which the Sooth-sayers had told him of long time before. For when he was but very young, and dwelling in the contrie, he gathered vp in the lappe of his gowne, the ayrie of an Eagle, in the which were seuen young Eagles: whereat his father and mother much wondering, asked the Soothsayers what that ment. They answered, that their sonne one day should be one of the greatest men in the world, and that out of doubt he should obtaine seuen times in his life the chiefe office of dignity in his contry. And for that matter, it is sayd that so in dede it came to passe. Other hold opinion, that such as were about Marius at that time, in that present place, and else where, during the time of his flying: they hearing him tell this tale, beleued it, and afterwards put it downe in wrytinge, as a true thinge, although of trothe it is bothe false and fayned. For they say, that the Eagle neuer getteth but two younge ones: by reason whereof it is sayd rayned also, that the Poet Museus hath lyed, in that which he hath wryten in these veries.

Howsoeuer it was, it is certaine that Marius many times during the time of his flying sayd, that he was assured he should come vnto the seuenth Consulship. When they were come neere now to the city of MINTURNES, about a two myle & a halfe fro it, they might perceiue a troupe of horsemen comming by the sea side, and two shippes on the sea that fell vpon the coast by good happe. Wherefore they all beganne to runne (so long as they had breath and strength) towards the sea, into the which they threw them selues, and got by swimming vnto one of the shippes where Granius was: and they crossed ouer vnto the Ile that is right against it called ENARIA. Now for Marius, who was heauy and sicke of body, two of his ser-uantes holpe to holde him vp alwayes aboue water, with the greatest paine and difficultie in the worlde: and at the last they labored so thoroughly, that they put him into the other shippe at the selfe same present, when the horsemen came vnto the sea side, who cried out alowde to the maryners, to lande againe, or else throw Marius ouer borde, and then to goe where they would. Marius on thother side humbly besought them with teares, not so to do: whereby the masters of the shippe in a shorte space were in many mindes whether to doe it, or not to doe it. In the ende notwithstanding, they answered the horsemen they would not throw him ouer the borde: so the horsemen went their way in a great rage. But as soone as they were gone, the masters of the shippe chaunging minde, drew towards lande, and cast anchor about the mouth of the riuer of Liris, where it leaueth her bankes, and maketh great marishes: & there C they tolde Marius he should doe well to goe a land to eate somewhat, and refresh his sea sicke body, till the winde serued them to make saile, which doubtlesse sayed they, will be at a certaine hower when the sea winde falles and becomes calme, and that there nixeth a litle winde from the lande, ingendred by the vapours of the marishes, which will serue the turne very well to take seas againe. Marius following their counsell, and thinking they had ment good faith, was set a lande vpon the riuers bankes: and there layed him downe upon the grasse, nothing suspecting that which happened after to him. For the mariners presently taking their shippe againe, and hoysing vp their ankers, failed straight away, and fled: iudging it no honesty for them to haue deliuered Marius into the hands of his enemies, nor safetie for them selues to haue faued him. Marius finding him selfe all alone, & forsaken of euery man, lay on the ground D a great while, and sayd neuer a word: yet at the length taking harte a litle to him, got vp once againe on his feete, and painefully wandred vp and downe, where was neither way nor path at all, ouerthwart deepe marishes and great ditches, full of water and mudde, till he came at the length to a poore olde mans corage, dwelling there in these marishes, and fallinge at his feete, besought him to helpe to saue and succour a poore afflicted man, with promise that one day he would geue him a better recompence then he looked for, if he might escape this present daunger wherein he was. The olde man whether for that he had known Marius aforetime, or that seeing him by coniecture only iudged him to be some great personage: told him that if he ment but to lye downe and rest him selfe a litle, his poore cabyne would serue that turne reasonably well: but if he ment to wander thus, to sic his enemies that followed him, he would E then bring him into a more secret place, and farder off from noyse. Marius prayed him that he would so much doe for him: and the good man brought him into the marishes, vnto a low place by the riuers side, where he made him lye downe, and then couered him with a great deale of reede and bent, and other such light thinges as could not hurte him. He had not long bene there, but he heard a great noyse comming towards the cabin of the poore old man: for Geminus of TERRACINE had sent men all about to seeke for him, whereof some by chance came that way, and put the poore man in a feare, and threatened him that he had receiued and hidden an enemy of the ROMAINES. Marius hearing that, rose out of the place where the old man had layed him, and stripping him selfe stark naked, went into a parte of the marish where the water was full of myre and mudde, and there was founde of those that searched for F him: who takinge him out of the slime all naked as he was, caried him into the citie of MINTURNES, and deliuered him there into the gouernours hands. Open proclamation was made by the Senate through all ITALIE, that they should apprehend Marius, and kill him where-fewer they founde him. Notwithstanding, the gouernors and magistrates of MINTURNES thought good first to consult therupon amongst them selues, & in the meane time they deliuered him into the safe custody of a woman called Fannia, whom they thought to haue bene a bitter enemy of his, for an old grudge she had to him, which was this: Fannia sometime had a husband called Tinnius, whom she was willing to leaue for that they could not agree, and required her dower of him againe, which was very great. Her husbande againe sayed, she had played the whore. The matter was brought before Marius in his sixt Consulshippe, who had geuen iudgement upon it. Both parties being heard, and the law prosecuted on either side, it was found that this Fannia was a naughty woman of her body, and that her husband knowing it well enough before he married her, yet tooke her with her faultes, and long time liued with her. Wherefore Marius beinge with them both, gaue sentence that the husband should repay backe her dower, and that for her naughty life, she should pay foure farthings. This notwithstanding, when Fannia saw Marius, she grudged him not for that, and least of all had any reuenging minde in her towards him, but contrarily did comforte and helpe him what she could with that she had. Marius thanked her maruelously for it, and bad her hope well because he met with good lucke as he was comming to her house, and in this manner. As they were leading of him, when he came neere to Fannias house, her dore being open, there came an affe running out to go drinke at a conduit: not farre from thence: and meeting Marius by the way, looked upon him with a liuely ioyfull countenance, first of all stopping sodainly before him, and then beginning to bray out alowde, and to leape and skippe by him. Whereupon Marius straight coniecturing with him selfe, said, that the goddess did signifie vnto him, that he should saue him selfe sooner by water then by lande: because that the affe leauing him, came to drinke, and cared not to eate. So when he had tolde Fannia this tale, he desired to rest, and prayed them to let him alone, and to shut the chamber dore to him. But the magistrates of the citie hauing consulted together about him, in the ende resolued they must deferre no longer time, but dispatche him out of the way presently. Now when they were agreed upon it, they could not finde a man in the citie that durst take upon him to kill him: but a man of armes of the GAULES, or one of the CIMBERS (for we finde both the one and the other in writing) that went thither with his sword drawn in his hande. Now, that place of the chamber wherein Marius lay was very darke, and as it is reported, the man of armes thought he saw two burninge flames come out of Marius eyes, and heard a voyce out of that darke corner, saying vnto him: O fellowe, thou, darest thou come to kill Caius Marius? The barbarous GAULE hearing these wordes, ranne out of the chamber presently, casting his sword in the midst of the flower, and crying out these wordes onely: I can not kill Caius Marius. This made the MINTURNIANS afraied in the city at the first, but afterwards it moued them to compassion. So they were angry with them selues, and did repent them that they conuerted their counsell to so cruell and vnkinde a deede, against one that had preferred all ITALIE: and to deny him aide in so extreame necessary, it was too great a sinne. Therefore let vs let him go, sayed they to them selues, where he will, and suffer him take his fortune appointed him else where: and let vs pray to the goddess to pardon this offence of ours, to haue thrust Marius naked and beggerly out of our city. For these considerations, the MINTURNIANS went altogether to Marius where he was, and stood about him, determining to see him safely conducted vnto the sea side. Now though euery man was ready, and willing to pleasure him, some with one thing, some with another, and that they did hasten him all they could possible, yet they were a good while a going thither: because there was a wodde called Marica, that lay right in their way betwene their city and the sea coast which they greatly reuerence, & thinke it a scriledge to cary any thing out of that wodde, that was once brought into it. On thother side, to leaue to goe through this wodde, and to compasse it rounde about, it would aske maruelous long time. So they standing all in doubt what they should doe, one of the ancientest men of the city, spake alowde vnto them, and said: that there was no way forbidden them, that went about to saue Marius life. Then Marius him selfe being the foremost man, taking vp some of the fardells which they caried with him, to pleasure him in the ship, went through the wodde. All other things necessary being thus readily prepared for him with like goodwill,

Marica Sylva.

A and specially the shippe which one Bellus had ordained for him: he caused all this storie to be painted in a table at large, which he gaue vnto the temple, out of the which he departed when he tooke shippe. After he was departed thence, the winde by good fortune caried him into the Ile of ENARIA, where he founde GRAMIN and some other of his frendes, with whom he tooke feagaine, and pointed towards AFRICK. But lacking water, they were compelled to lande in SICILIA, in the territory of the city of ERIX: where by chance there laye a ROMAINE Quæstor, who kept that coast. Marius being landed there, escaped very narrowly that he was not taken of him: for he slue sixteene of his men that came out with him to take water. So Marius getting him thence with all speede, crossed the seas, vntill he arrived in the Ile of MENYNGE, where he first vnderstoode that his sonne was saued with Cethegus, and that they were both together gone to Hiempsal king of the NUMIDIANS to beseeche him of ayde. This gaue him a litle corage, & made him bold to passe out of that Ile, into the coast of CARTHAGE. Nowe at that time, Sextilius a ROMAINE Prætor was gouernor of AFRICK, vnto whom Marius had neuer done good nor hurt, & therefore he hoped, that for pity only he might perhaps haue helpe at his hande. Howbeit he was no sooner landed with a few of his men, but a sergeant came straight and sayd vnto him: Sextilius, Prætor and gouernor of LIBYA, doth forbid thee to lande in all this prouince: otherwise he telleth thee, that he will obay the Senates commaundement, and pursue thee as an enemy of the *ROMAINE*s. Marius hearing this commaundement, was so angry and fory both, that he coulde not readily tell what answer to make him, and pawled a good while and sayd neuer a word, still eying the sergeant with a grimme looke: vntill he asked him, what answer he would make, to the Prætors commaundement. Marius then fetching a deepe sigh from his harte, gaue him this answer. Thou shalt tell Sextilius, that thou hast seene Caius Marius banished out of his countrey, sitting amongst the ruines of the city of CARTHAGE. By this answer, he wisely layed the example of the ruine and destruction of that great city of CARTHAGE, before Sextilius eyes, and the change of his fortune: to warne Sextilius that the like might fall vpon him. In the meane time, Hiempsal king of the NUMIDIANS, not knowing how to resolue, did honorably increate young Marius and his companie. But when they were willing to goe their way, he alwayes founde newe occasion to stay them, and was very glad to see that he started not for any opportunity or good occasion that was offered: notwithstanding, there fortuned a happy meane D vnto them, whereby they saued them selues. And this it was. This Marius the younger being a fayer complexioned young man, it pitied one of the kinges concubines to see him so hardly delid withall. This pity of hers was a shadow to cloke the loue she bare him: but Marius would not hearken at the first to her intimentes, and refused her. Yet in the ende, perceiuing that there was no other way for him to escape thence, and considering that he did all things for their auail, more diligently and louingly then he would haue done, if the had not ment further matter vnto him, then only to enioy the pleasure of him: he then accepted her loue and kindnesse, so as at the length he taught him a way howe to fflye, and saue him selfe and his frendes. Hereupon he went to his father, and after they had embraced and saluted eche other, going alongest the sea side, they founde two Scorpions fightinge together. Marius tooke this E for an ill signe: wherupon they quickly tooke a fisher boate, and went into the Ile of CHERTINA, which is no great distance of from firme lande. They had no sooner hoised vp anchor, but they sawe the horse men which kinge Hiempsal had sent vnto the place from whence they were departed: and that was one of the greatest daungers that Marius euer escaped. In the meane time there was newes at ROME, that Silla made warre against kinge Mithridates LEUCOTENANTES: and furthermore, that the Consulls being vp in armes thoe against thother, OSTIENS wanne the battell, and being the stronger had driuen out Cinna, who sought to haue usurped tyrannicall power, and had made Cornelius Murela Consul in his place: and that Cinna on thother side leauied men out of other partes of ITALIE, and made warres vpon them that were in ROME. Marius hearing of this diffention, thought good to returne as soon as he F could possible into ITALIE. And assembling certaine horsemen of the nation of the MAVRSIANS in AFRICK, & certaine ITALIANS that had saued them selues there, vnto the number of a thousand men in all: he tooke sea, & landed in a hauen of THYSCANS called TELEMON, and being landed, proclaimed by founde of tromper, liberty to all slaues and bonde men that A would come to him. So the laborers, heard men, and neateheardes of all that marche, for the onely name and reputation of Marius, ranne to the sea side from all partes: of the which he hauing chosen out the stoutest and lustiest of them, wanne them so by fayer wordes, that hauing gathered a great companie together in fewe dayes, he made fortie fayer of them. Furthermore, knowing that Ottavius was a maruelous honest man, that would haue no authoritie otherwise then law & reason would: and that Cinna to the contrarie was suspected of Sylla, and that he sought to bring in change and innouation to the common wealth, he determined to ioyne his force with Cinna. So Marius sent first vnto Cinna, to lette him vnderstande that he would obay him as Consul, and be ready to do all that he should commaunde him. Cinna receiued him, and gaue him the title and authoritie of Viceconsull, and sent him sergeants to carie axes and rodde before him, with all other signes of publicke authoritie. But Marius refused them, and sayed, that pompe became not his miserable fortune: for he euer went in a poore threede bare gowne, and hadler his heare grow still after he was banished, being about three score and tenne yeare olde, and had a fober gate with him, to make men pitie him the more that sawe him. But vnder all this counterfeite pitie of his, he neuer changed his namall looke, which was euer more fearefull and terrible, then otherwise. And where he spake but litle, & went very demurely & soberly: that shewed rather a cankered corage within him, then a minde humbled by his banishment. Thus when he had saluted Cinna, and spoken to the souldiers: he then beganne to set things abroache, and made a wonderfull change in fewe dayes. For first of all, with his shippes he cut off all the vittells by sea, & robbed the marchants that caried corne and other vittells to Rome: so that in a shorte space he was master purueyer for all necessarie prouision and vittells. After this he went alongest the coast, and tooke all the cities upon the sea side, and at the length wanne O SYRIA also by treason, put the most parte of them in the towne to the sword, and spoyled all their goodes: and afterwards making a bridge upon the riuier of Tiber, tooke from his enemies all hope to haue any manner of prouision by sea. That done, he went directly towards Rome with his armie, where first he wanne the hill called Ianiculum through Ottavius faulte: who ouerthrew him selfe in his doings, not so much for lacke of reasonable skill of warres, as through his vnprofitable curiositie and stinnes in obseruing the law. For when diuerselie did perswade him to set the bond men at liberty, to take armes for defence of the common wealth: he aunswered, that he would neuer geue bond men the law and priuiledge of a ROMEINE citizen, hauing driuen Caius Marius out of Rome, to maintaine the authoritie of the lawe. But when Casilius Metellus was come to Rome, the sonne of that Metellus Numidicus, that hauing begonne the warres in LIBYA against king Iugurthe, was put out by Marius: the souldiers forooke Ottavius immediatly, and came vnto him, because they tooke him to be a better Capitaine, and desired also to haue a leader that could tell how to commaund them, to saue the citie, and the common wealth. For they promised to fight valiantly, & perswaded them selues that they should overcome their enemies, so that they had a skilfull & valiant Capitaine that could order them. Metellus mistaking their offer, commaunded them in anger to returne againe vnto the Consul: but they for spite went vnto their enemies. Metellus on thother side, seeing no good order taken in the citie to resist the enemies, got him out of Rome. But Ottavius being perswaded by certaine Soothsayers and CHALDEAN sacrificers, who promised him all should goe well with him, taried still in Rome. For that man being otherwise, as wise as any ROMEINE of his time, and one that delt as vprightly in his Consulshippe, not caried away with flattering tales, and one also that followed the auncient orders and customes as infallible rules and examples, neither breaking nor omitting any parte thereof: me thinks yet had this imperfection, that he frequented the Soothsayers, wise men, and astronomers, more then men skilfull in armes and gouernment. Wherefore, before that Marius him selfe came into the citie, Ottavius was by force pluckt out of the pulpit for orations, and slaine presently by Marius souldiers, whome he had sent before into the citie. And it is sayed also, that when he was slaine, they founde a figure of a CHALDEAN prophecie in his bosome: and here is to be noted a great contrarietie in these two notable men, Ottavius and Marius. The first lost his life, by trusting to soothsaying: and the seconde prospered,

A prospered, & rose againe, because he did not despise the arte of diuination. The state of Rome standing then in this manner, the Senate consulting together, sent Ambassadors vnto Cinna and Marius, to pray them to come peaceably into Rome, and not to embroile their hands with the blood of their citizens. Cinna sitting in his chayer as Consul, gaue them audience, & made them a very reasonable and courteous aunswere. Marius standing by him, spake neuer a worde: but hewed by his fower looke that he would straight fill Rome with murder and blood. So when the Ambassadors were gone, Cinna came into Rome enuironned with a great number of souldiers: but Marius stayed sodainly at the gate, speaking partly in anger, and partly in mockerie, that he was a banished man, and driuen out of his contrie by law. And therefore if they would haue him come into Rome againe, they should first by a contrarie decree abolish B and reuoke that of his banishment, as if he had bene a religious obseruer of the lawes, and as though Rome had at that present enioyed their freedom and libertie. Thus he made the people assemble in the market place to proceede to the confirmation of his calling home againe. But before three or foure tribes had time to geue their voices, disguising the matter no longer, and showing plainly that he ment not to be lawfully called home againe from exile: he came into Rome with a garde about him, of the veriest rascalls, & most shamelesse slaues, called the BARDIOEANS, who came to him from all partes: and they for the least word he spake, or at the twinkling of his eye, or at a nodde of his head made to them, flew many men through his commaundement, and at the length slew Ancharius a Senator (that had bene Praetor) at Marius feete with their swordes, because only that Marius did not salute him when he came one C day to speake with him. After this murder, they continued killinge all them that Marius did not salute, and spake vnto: for that was the very signe he had geuen them, to kill them openly in the streetes before euery man, so that his very frendes were asfearde of being murdered, when they came to salute him. Thus being a great number of men slaine, Cinna in the end beganne to be satisfied, and to appease his anger. But Marius anger and vnstable desire of reuenge increased more and more, so that he spared not one if he suspected him neuer so litle: and there was neither towne nor high way, that was not full of skowtes & spies, to hunt them out that hidde them selues and fled. Then experience taught them, that no frende is faithfull, and to be trusted, if fortune especially frowne neuer so litle: for there were very fewe that did not betray their frendes that fled to them for succor. And therefore doe Cornelius seruantes so D much the more deserue praise, who hauing secretly hidden their master in his house, did hang vp the dead body of some common persone by the necke, and hauing put a golde ring on his finger, they shewed him to the BARDIOEANS, Marius garde, and buried him in steade of their owne master, without suspition of any man that it was a fained thing: and so Cornelius being hidden by his seruantes, was safely conueyed into the contrie of GAULE. Marke Anthony the Orator had also founde out a faithfull frende, yet was he vnfortunate. This faithfull frend of his, was a poore simple man, who hauing receiued one of the chiefe men of Rome into his house to kepe him close there: he being desirous to make him the best chere he could with that litle he had, sent one of his men to the next tauerne to fetch wine, and raising the wine more curiously then he was wont to do, he called for better. The drawer asked him, why E the new ordinary wine would not serue him, but he must needs haue of the best and dearest: the foolish fellow simply aunswered him (telling him as his familiar frend) that his master did feast Marke Anthony, who was hidden very secretly in his house. He was no sooner gone with his wine, & his backe turned, but the vile traiterous drawer ranne vnto Marius, who was set at supper when he came. The drawer being brought to him, promised him to deliuer Marke Anthony into his handes. Marius hearing that, was so ioconde, that he cried out, and clapt his handes together for ioy: and would haue risen from the borde, and gone thither him selfe in person, had not his frendes kept him backe. But he sent Annus one of his Capitaines thither with a certaine number of souldiers, and commaunded them to bringe him his head quickly. So they went thither, and when they were come to the house which the drawer had F brought them to, Annus taried beneath at the dore, and the souldiers went vp the stayers into the chamber, & finding Anthony there, they beganne to encourage one an other to kill him, not one of them hauing the harte to lay handes vpon him. For Anthones tongue was as

sweete as a Sirene, and had such an excellent grace in speaking, that when he began to speake vnto the fouldiers, and to pray them to faue his life: there was not one of them so hard hearted, as once to touch him, no not onely to looke him in the face, but looking downewardes, selt weeping. Annus perceiving they taried long, and came not downe, went him selfe vp into the chamber, and found Anthony talking to his fouldiers, and them weeping, his sweete eloquent tongue had so melted their hartes: but he rating them, ranne furiously apon him, and strake of his head with his owne handes. And Catulus Lucatius also, that had bene Consul with Marius, and had triumphed ouer the CIMBERS with him, seeing him selfe in this perill, set men to intreate Marius for him: but his aunswere was euer, he must needs dye. So Catulus locked him selfe into a litle chamber, and made a great fire of charcole to be kindled, and with the smoke thereof choked him selfe. Now after their heades were cut of, they threw out the naked bodies into the streetes, and trode them vnder their feete: the which was not onely a pitiefull, but a fearefull sight to all that sawe them. But after all this yet, there was nothing that grieved the people so much, as the horrible lechery & abhominable cruelty of this gard of the BARDIANS, who coming into mens houses by force, after they had slaine the masters, desiled their young children, and rauished their wiues and maidens, & no man would once reprove their crueltie, lecherie, and vnstatiable auarice: vntill Cinna and Sertorius in the end set apon them as they slept in their campe, and slewe them euery one. But in this extremitie, as if all things had bene restored vnto their first estate, newes came againe from all partes to ROME, that Sylla hauing ended his warre against king Mithridates, and recouered the prouinces which he had vsurped: returned into ITALIE with a great power. This caused these euills and vnspokeable miseries to cease a litle, because the wicked doers of the same looked they should haue warres on their backes ere it were long. Whereuppon Marius was chosen Consul the seuenth time. He going out of his house onely the first day of Ianuarie, being the beginning of the yeare, to take possession of his Consulshippe: caused one Sexus Lucius to be thrown downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian, which seemed to be a great signe and certaine token of the euills and miseries, that fell out afterwards the selfe same yeare apon them of their faction, and vnto all the citie beside. But Marius being fore broken with his former troubles, and his minde oppressed with extreame sorow and griefe, could not now at this last time of neede plucke vp his harte to him againe, when he came to thinke of this newe toward warre that threatened him, and of the daungers, griefes, and troubles he should enter into, more great and perillous then any he had passed before. For through the great experience he had in warres, he trembled for feare when he beganne to thinke of it, considering that he had to fight, not with Octavius, nor with Mercula, Captaines of a companie of rebels gathered together: but with anoble Sylla, that had driuen him out of ROME before, and that came now from driuing the puissant king Mithridates, vnto the furddest parte of the realme of PONT, and of the sea Euxinum. Thus, deeply waying and considering the fame, and specially when he looked backe vpon his long time of banishment, how vacabondlike he wandered vp and downe in other contries, and remembered the great misfortunes he had passed, and the sundrie daungers he fell to often into, being pursued still by sea and by land: it grieved him to the harte, and made him so vnquiet, that he could not sleepe in the night, or if he slept, he had fearefull dreames that troubled him, and still he thought he heard a voyce buffing in his eares.

A Lyons very denne, is dreadfull to behold:

Though he him selfe be gone abroade, and be not therein hold.

But fearing most of all that he should no more sleepe and take his rest, he gaue him selfe to make vnreasonable bankets, and to drinke more then his yeres could beare, seeking to winne sleepe by this meanes, to auoyde care the better. But at the length there came one from the sea, that gaue him certaine intelligence of all: & that was an increase of a new feare vnto him. And thus he being now extremely troubled, partly for feare of the thing to come, & partly also for the ouer heauie burden of his present ill, there needed but litle more aggravation, for fall into the disease whereof he dyed, which was a pleurisie: as Polidonius the Philosopher wryteth, who sayeth plainly that he went into his chamber when he was sicke, and spake vnto him

A him about matters of his Ambassade, for the which he came to ROME. Yet an other historiographer Caius Pifowryteth, that Marius walking one day after supper with his frendes, fell in talke of his fortune from the beginning of his life, telling them at large how often fortune had turned with and against him: concluding, that it is no wife mans parte to trust her any more. So when he had done, he tooke his leaue of them, and layed him downe vpon his bed, where he lay sicke seuen dayes together, and on the seuenth day dyed. Some wryte that his ambition appeared plainly, by a straunger rauiing that tooke him in his head during his sickenes. For he thought that he made warres with Mithridates, and shewed in his bed all his gestures and moouings of his bodie, as if he had bene in a battell, crying the selfe same cryes out alowde, which he was wont to crie when he was in the extreamest fight. The desire he had to haue taken this charge in hande against Mithridates, was so deeply settled in his minde through extreame ambition and ieaousy that posselt him: that being then three score and ten yeare old, after he had bene the first man that euer was chosen seuen times Consul in ROME, and also after that he had gotten a world of goodes and richesse together that might haue sufficed many kinges: yet for all this he dyed for sorrowe, lamenting his harde fortune, as if he had dyed before his time, and before that he had done and ended that which he had desired. But this was cleane contrarie vnto that the wise Plato did, when he drew neere to his death. For he gaue God thanks for his fatal end and good fortune. First, for that he had made him a reasonable man, and no brute beast: secondly, a Greke and no barbarous man: and furthermore, for that he was borne in Socrates time. It is reported also, that one Antipater of THARSIS, calling to mind a litle before his death the good fortune he had in his life time, did not forgette amonge other things, to tell of the happie navigation he made, coming from his contrie vnto ATHENS: which did witnesse that he put vpon the fyle of his good accompts for a singular great grace, all fauor fortune had shewed him, and that he kept it in perpetual memorie, being the onely and most assured treasure a man can haue, to kepe those gifts that nature or fortune doe bestowe vpon him. But contrariwise, vnthankfull fooles vnto God and nature both, doe forget with time the memory of their former benefittes, and laying vp nothing, nor keeping it in perpetuall memory, are alwayes voyde of goodes and full of hope, gaping still for things to come & leauing in the meane time the things present, though reason perswades them the contrary. For fortune may easily let the of the thing to come, but she can not take that from the which D is already past: and yet they vtterly forget the certaine benefit of fortune, as a thing nothing belonging vnto the, & dreame alwayes of that which is vncertaine. And sure it chaunceth to them by great reason. For, hauing gathered outward goodes together, and locking them vp before they haue built and layd a sure grounded foundation of reason through good learning: they can not afterwards fill nor quenche their vnstatiable greedie couetous minde. Thus ended Marius his life, the seuenteenth day of his seuenth Consulshippe, whereof all the citie of ROME was not a litle glad, and tooke harte againe vnto them, supposing they had then bene deliuered from a bloodie cruell tyranny. But within few dayes after they knew it to their cost, that they had chaunged an olde master taken out of the worlde, for a younger that came but newly to them: such extreame vnnaturall cruelties, & murders did Marius the younger commit, after the death of his father Marius, murdering in manner all the chiefe noble men of ROME. At the first, they tooke him for a valliant and hardy young man, whereuppon they named him the sonne of Mars: but shortly after his deedes did shew the contrary, and then they called him the sonne of Venus. In the end he was shut in, and besieged by Sylla in the city of PERYSTIA, where he did what he could possible to faue his life, but all was in vaine: & lastly, seeing no way to escape, the city being taken, he slewe him selfe with his owne handes.

IN the treasure of the A CANTHIANS, which is in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES, there is this inscription: Brasidas, and the A CANTHIANS, with the spoile of the A THENIANS. That inscription maketh many men thinke, that the image of stone that standeth within the chamber by the dore thereof, is the image of Brasidas: howbeit in truth it is the liuelike image of Lysander him selfe, made with a great bush of haire, & a thicke long beard after the old auncient facion. And where some say that the ARGIVES, after they were overcome and had lost a great battell, did all of them shawe them selues in token and signe of common sorrow: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS on thother side to shewe the ioy of their victory, did all let their heares growe, that is not true. No more then this is true which other do reporte of the BACCHIADÆS: who being fled from CORINTHE VNTO LACEDÆMON, the LACEDÆMONIANS founde them so ill fauoredly disguised and deformed, because their heares were all shauen, that thereupon they had a desire to let their heare and beards grow. For this was one of the ordinaunces of Lycurgus, who sayd that the long bushe of haire, maketh them that are naturally fayer, the pleasaunter to looke vpon: and those that are ill fauored, more ougly and fearefull to see to. And furthermore, it is sayd that Aristoclitus, the father of Lysander, was not of the royall blood of the kinges of SPARTA, though he came of the race of the Heraclides: and that his sonne Lysander was very meanelly and poorly brought vp; being as obedient to the lawes and statutes of his contrie, as any other man was, showing him selfe alwayes very strong and constant against all vanitie and pleasure, sauing only in matters of honor and curtesie, which they offer vnto those that deserue well. For they thinke it no shame nor dishonour in SPARTA, that the young men doe suffer them selues to be overcome with that delite and pleasure: but doe so bring vp their children, that from their youth they would haue them to haue some taste and feeling of honor, delighting to be praised, and forie to be discomended. For they make no accompt of him that is not moued with the one nor the other, but take him to be of a base cowardly nature, that hath no manner of minde to doe good. And therefore it is to be thought, that the ambition and stownesse that was bred in Lysander, pro-

A seed of the LACEDÆMONIALL discipline and education he had; and not so much of his owne nature. But in dede of his owne nature he was a right courtier, & could tell howe to entertaine and flatter great states and nobility, farre better then the common manner of the NATURAL SPARTANS: and moreover for his priuate benefit, he could easily beare with the flowryes of greater men of authority then him selfe, which some iudge to be a great poynt of wisdom; to know how to deale in matters of state. Aristotle in a place where he layeth, that the greatest wittes commonly are subiect vnto melancholye; (as Socrates, Plato, and Hercules were) wryteth, that Lysander in his later age fell into the melancholy disease, but not in his youth. He had also this singular gift aboue all other, that in his pouerty he alwayes kept that honest modesty with him; as he would neuer be overcome nor corrupted with gold nor silver: and yet he filled his contrie with riches and couetousnes, which lost him the reputation he had wonne; because him selfe made none accompt of riches nor getting. For bringing store of golde and silver into his contrie after he had ouercomen the A THENIANS, he refused not vnto him selfe one Drachma only. And furthermore, when Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACUSA, had on a time sent goodly riche gownes out of SICILIA to his daughters: he refused them, saying, that he was affrayed such gownes would make them fowler. Neuerthelesse, shortly after being sent Ambassadors out of his contrie vnto the same tyrant, Dionysius sending him two gownes, praying him to chooseth which of the two he would cary to his daughter: he answered, that she her selfe could best chooseth which was the fitter, and so caryed both with him. But now to come to his doings in warlike causes: the warres of PELOPONNESVS fell out maruelous long. For after the overthrow of the armie which the A THENIANS had sent into SICILIA, when euery man thought they had vterly lost all their force by sea, and that by all coniecture they shoulde soone after loose all by lande also: Alcibiades returning from his exile to deale againe in matters of the state, made an exceeding great chaunge and alteration. For he set the A THENIANS a flote againe, and made them as strong by sea as the LACEDÆMONIANS: who thereupon beganne to quake for feare, and to looke eftsoones for a freshe warre, perceiuing that they stood in neede of a greater power, and of a better Captaine then euer they had before. Whereupon they made Lysander their Admirall, who arriuing in the citie of EPHEVS, founde them very well affected towards him, and maruelous willing and ready to take the LACEDÆMONIANS parte: howbeit otherwise in very pouere state, and ready almost to take vp all the barbarous manners and facions of the PERSIANS, because they did continually frequent them, being enuironned round about with the contry of LYDIA, where the king of PERSIAES Capitaines were euer resident. Wherefore, hauing planted his campe there, he brought thither marchauntes shippes out of all partes, and sette vp an arsenal or store house to builde gallies in: so that in shorte space, by oft recourse of marchauntes that beganne to trade thither, he quickened their hauens, and let vp their staple againe for trafficke of marchaundise, and filled euery priuate artificers house with an honest trade to make them riche by, so that euer after it grewe in continuall hope to come vnto that flourishing state and greatnes, in the which we see it at this present. Furthermore, Lysander being aduertised that Cyrus, one of the great king of PERSIAES sonnes, was come vnto the city of SARDIS, he went thither to speake with him, and to com-E plain of Tisaphernes: who hauing commaundement geuen him from the king to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and to helpe to expulse the A THENIANS, and to driue them from the sea, seemed to deale but coldly and faintly against them, for the fauor he bare to Alcibiades. For, furnishing the LACEDÆMONIANS very scantily with money, was an occasion that all their armie by sea went to wracke. Cyrus for his owne parte was very glad that he heard complaintes of Tisaphernes, and that they spake against him: because he was an ill man, and the rather for that he had him selfe a litle odde grudge to him. Wherefore he loued Lysander maruelous well, as well for the complaintes he made of Tisaphernes, as also for the pleasure he tooke in his companie, because he was a man that could wonderfully please & delite noble men: by which means hauing wonne the fauor of this young Prince, he did perswade, and also incourage him to follow this warre. And when Lysander was vpon his departure to take his leaue of him, Cyrus sealed him, and afterwards prayed him not to refuse the offer of his liberalitie, and that was: that he would freely aske him what he would, assuring him he should not be denied any thing. Wherunto Lysander answered him. Sithence I see Cyrus you are so willing to please vs, I beseeche you, and doe also counsell you then to increase the ordinarie pay of our maryners, one halfe penny a day: to the end that where now they haue but three halfe pence, they may thenceforth receaue two pence a day. Cyrus was glad to heare Lysanders bouny, and the increase that he would make, and caused tenne thousande Darickes to be deliuered him: by meane whereof he added to the ordinarie pay of the maryners, the increase of a halfe penny a day. This liberality, within few dayes after, emptied all their enemies galleies of their men. For, the most parte of their maryners & galley men went where they might haue the best pay: and such as remained behinde, became very dull, lasie, and seditious, dayly troubling their Capitaines and gouernors. Now though Lysander had drawn his enemies men from them by this policie, and had done this great hurte, yet he durst not fight it out by sea, fearing the worthines of Alciades: who was a valliant man, and had greater store of shippes then he had, and besides that, was neuer overcome by lande nor by sea, in any battell where he was General. So it chanced, that Alciades went out of the Ile of Samos, vnto the city of Phocæa, which standeth vpon firme lande directly ouer against Samos, and leauing the whole charge of his flecte in his absence, with Antiochus his pylot: he being more hardie then wife, in some derision of Lysander, went with two galleies only into the haven of Ephesus, and went by the arifenal (where all their shippes lay in docke) with great noyse and laughing. This put Lysander in such a heate and chafe, that first of all he put a fewe galleies to the sea, and had him in chafe with them. But afterwards, perceiving that the other Capitaines of the Athenians came out one after another to the rescue, he armed other galleies also: so that supplying still with a few on either side, at the length they came to a maine battell, which Lysander wanne, & hauing taken fiftene of their galleies, he set vp a token of triumphe and victory. When the peoples Athenians heard the newes of this ouerthrow, they were so angrie with Alciades, that they discharged him presently of his charge: and the souldiers also that lay in campe in the Ile of Samos, beganne to mislike him, and to speake ill of him. Whereupon he presently left his campe, and went into the contry of Cheronefus in Thracia. This battell was more spoken of then there was cause, by reason of Alciades reputation. Furthermore, Lysander causinge the stowttest and boldest men of euery city, aboue the common sorte, to come to Ephesus vnto him: layed there secret foundations of great change and alteration, which he stablished afterwarde in the gouernmentes of cities. For he perswaded his priuate frendes to make tribes amongst them selues to winne them frendes, and to practise to gette the rule of their cities into their handes: promising them, that so soone as the Athenians were ouerthrowen, they them selues also should be deliuered from subiection of their people, and euery one of them should beare chiefe rule in their contry. And this he performed to them all, and made euery one of them proue his wordes true. For he preferred all them that had bene his olde frendes, vnto the best offices and charges: not sparing to doe against all right and reason, so that they were aduanced by it. And thus by this meanes, euery man came to take his part, and they all sought and desired to gratifie and please him: hoping, that what great matter soeuer fell out, they assured theselues in manner that they should obtaine it of him, when he came to haue the gouernment in his owne handes. And therefore they nothing reioyced at Callicratidas comming, who came to succede him in the office of the Admirall: neither afterwards also, when they saw by experience that he was as honest and iust a man as coulde be. Neither did they like his manner of gouerninge which was plaine, and without any arte or cunning. But they commended the perfection of his vertue, as they would haue done the image of some demy god made after the olde facion, which had bene of singular beawty. But in the meane time, they wished for Lysander, as well for the tender loue and good will he bare to his frendes and them, as also for the profit and commodity they got by him. So when Lysander tooke the seas to returne home againe, all they that were in the campe, were as sory as could be possible, inso much as the teares stooode in their eyes: and he on thother side, studied to make them worse affected vnto Callicratidas. For amongst many other things, he sent the rest of the money backe againe to Sardis, which Cyrus had geuen him to pay the maryners: saying, that Callicratidas should go him selfe to aske it, if he would haue it, and finde the meanes to entertaine his

A his men. And lastly, when he was ready to imbarke, he protested before all them that were present, that he did deliuer, leaue, and assigne ouer the armie into his handes, commanding all the sea. But Callicratidas, to ouercome his false ambition, and fowle boasting lyed answered him againe, and saied. If that be true thou saiest, come then and deliuer me the galleies in the city of Miletum, as thou goest by, before the Ile of Samos: for sith thou commandeest all the sea, we shall not neede to feare our enemies that are in Samos. Lysander thereto replied, that the armie was no more at his commaundement, and that he had the charge ouer them: and so departed thence, taking his course directly vnto Pheloponnessus, and left Callicratidas in great perplexity. For he had brought no money out of his contry with him, neither would he compell the cities to furnishe him with any, feelinge that they were at that time too much troubled already. Then had he no other way but to goe to the Lieutenantes of the king of Persia, to aske them money as Lysander had done. But he was the vnmeettest man for it that could be possible: for he was of a noble and liberrall nature, and thought it lesse dishonor & reprocche vnto the Grecians, to be overcome by other Grecians, then to goe flatter the barbarous people, and seeke to them that had gold & siluer enough, but otherwise, no goodnes nor honesty. In the end notwithstanding, making vertue of necessity, he tooke his iorney towards Lydia, and went directly to Cyrus court: where at his first comming he willed them to let him vnderstand, that Callicratidas the Admirall of the Lacedæmonians would speake with him. One of the souldiers that warded at the gate, told him: my frende, syr straunger, Cyrus is not at leasure nowe, for he is set at dinner. Callicratidas answered him plainly againe: no force, I willy tarry here till he haue dined. The barbarous Persians hearing this, tooke him for some plaine lowte, and so he went his waye the first time with a mocke at their handes. But the second time when they would not let him come in at the gate, he fell in a rage, and returned backe (as he came) to the cite of Ephesus, cursing and banning them that at the first had so much embased them selues, as to goe sue to the barbarous people, teaching them to be proud and stately for their goodes and riches: swearing before them all that were present, that so soone as he came to Sparta againe, he would doe all that he could possible to pacifie the Grecians, & let them at peace one with another, to the end they might be fearefull to the barbarous people, & also that they should medle with them no more, nor neede their aide to destroy one another. But Callicratidas hauing the noble hate of a Spartan, and being to be compared in iustice, valliancy, and greatnes of corage, with the most excellent Grecians in his time, dyed shortly after in a battell by sea, which he lost vpon the Iles Arginuses. Wherefore, the confederates of the Lacedæmonians seeing that their state was in declining, they all together sent an Ambassade vnto Sparta, by whom they made request to the counsell, that they would send Lysander againe for their Admirall, promising that they would do all things with better corage & goodwill vnder his conduction, then they would vnder any other Capitaine they could sende them. So much did Cyrus also wryte vnto them. But because there was an expresse law forbidding that one man should be twice Admirall, and besides, they being willing to graunt the request of their confederats, made one Arachus their Admirall, but in effect gaue Lysander the whole authoritie of all things. Who was maruelous welcome vnto them, and specially vnto the heades and rulers of cities, which long before had wished for his comming: because that by his meanes they hoped to make their authority greater, and altogether to take away the authority from the people. But they that loued plaine dealing, and open magnanimite in the nanners of a gouernor and generally, when they came to compare Lysander, with Callicratidas: they founde that Lysander had a fine subtil head, and did more in warres with his policy and subtiltie, then by any other meanes. And moreover, that he esteemed iustice, when it fell out profitable: and tooke profit, for iustice and honestie, not thinking that plaine dealing was of better force then craft, but measuring the value of the tone and thother, by the profit that came out of them, and mockinge of them that sayed that the race of Hercules should not make warres with craft and subtilty. For sayd he, when they loons skin I will not serue, we must help it with the cefe of a foxe. And hereunto agreeth that, which they wryte he did in the cite of Miletum. For his frendes and familiars to whome he had promised aide for destruction of the peoples authority, and to driue their enemies out of the city:

they hauing changed their mindes, and being reconciled vnto their aduersaries, he openly made great shewe of gladnes, and seemed as though he would helpe to agree them together; but secretly being alone, he tooke them vp sharply, and told them that they were cowards to doe it, and did procure them to the contrary, to set upon the people. And then when he understood that there was commocion among them in the citie, he ranne thither sodainly as it were to appease it. But when he was also comen into the citie, the first he met with of them that would alter the state of gouernement, and take the authority from the people: he fell out withall, and gaue them rough wordes, commanding with extremitie that they should follow him, as though he would haue done some great punishment. And againe, meeting with them on the contrary parte, he willed them also that they should not be afrayed, nor doubt that any man should doe them hurte where he was. This was a wicked and malicious practise of him, to stay the chieftest of them that were most affected to the popular faction, to the ende that afterwards he might put them all to death as he did. For they that trusting to his words remained quiet in the citie were all put to death. Moreover, Androclidas touching this matter, hath left in writing that which Lysander was wont to say: by the which it appeareth, that he made very litle reckning to be periured. For he sayd, that children should be deceiued with the play of kayles, and men with othes of men, following therein Polyrates, the tyrant of Samos, but without reason: for he was a lawfull Captaine, and the other a violent usurper of tyrannicall power. Furthermore, it was not done like a true LACONIAN, to behaue him selfe towards the goddes none otherwise, then towards men, but rather worse, & more inuiously. For he that deceiueh his enemy, & breaketh his othe to him: sheweth plainly that he feareth him, but that he careth not for God. Cyrus therefore hauing sent for Lysander to come to SARDIS to him, gaue him money largely, and promised him more: and because he would more honorably thewe the good will he had to gratifie him, tolde him, that if the kinge his father would geue him nothing, yet he would geue him of his owne. And furthermore, when all othe meanes failed to helpe him with money, that rather then he should lacke he would make his owne chayer to make money off, which heate in when he gaue audience in matter of iustice being altogether of gold and silver. And to be shorte, when he was going into MEDIA to the king his father, he gaue Lysander power to receiue the taxes and ordinary tributes of the cities vnder his gouernment, and made him Lieutenant of all his contry. And lastly, bidding him farewell, praised him that he would not geue battell by sea vnto the ATHENIANS, until he returned from the court: and that before his coming againe he would haue authority to leaue a greate number of shippes, as well out of PHOENICIA, as out of CILICIA. Wherefore whilest Cyrus was in his iorney, Lysander not being able to fight with his enemies with like number of shippes, nor also to lye still and doe nothing with so good a number of gallies, went and scowred the seas, where he tooke certaine Ilandes, and robbed also BEGINA and SLAMINA. From thence he went & landed on the firme lande in the contry of ATTICA, and did his dutie there vnto Agis king of LACEDAMONIA, who came purposely from the fort of Declea to the sea side to see him, because their armye by lande also should see what power they had by sea, and howe it ruled more by sea then they would. Neuertheles, being aduertised that the fleet of the ATHENIANS followed hard after him, he tooke an other course to flye backe againe into ASIA by the Illes: and returninge againe, founde all the conny of HELLSPONT without men of warre. So he laied siege before the citie of LAMPACVS, and did assault it with his gallies by sea: and Thorax being come thither also at the selfe same time in great haist with his armye by land, gaue chaffault on his side. Thus was the citie taken by force, which Lysander left to the spoile of the souldiers. Now in the meane time the fleet of the ATHENIANS (which was a hundred and foure score saile) came to an anker before the citie of ELEVENTE, in the contry of CHERRONESVS: and newes being broughte them that the city of LAMPACVS was taken, they came with all speede possible vnto the citie of SARDIS, where getting freshe acates and vitelles, they coasted all alongest the coast vnto a certaine place called the goates riuer, directly ouer against the fleet of their enemies, which laye at anker before the citie of LAMPACVS. Now there was a captaine of the ATHENIANS amongst other called Philocles, he that perswaded the ATHENIANS to cut off the prisoners

A thumbe of their right handes that were taken in the warres, to thend they should no more handle the pyke, but only serue to pull the ower. Both the tone and the tother rested that day, hoping to haue battell without faile the next morning. But Lysander hauing an other meaning with him, commaunded the maisters and maryners notwithstanding, that they should haue their gallies ready to geue battell the next morninge by breake of day, because euery man should get a bord betimes, and should keepe them selues in order of battell, making no noyse at all, attending what he would commaunde them: and further, made the armie by lande also to be ranged in battell ray, by the sea side. The next morning at sunne rising, the ATHENIANS beganne to row with all their gallies set in order of battell in a fronte. But Lysander, though he had his shippes in order to fight, the proes lying towards the enemies before day, rowed not for all that against them, but sending out pynnales vnto the first gallies, commaunded them straightly that they should not stirre at all, but keepe them selues in order, making no noyse, nor rowing against the enemy. Though the ATHENIANS also were retired in the night, he would not geue the souldiers leaue to come to lande out of the gallies, before he had sent first two or three gallies to discrie the fleet of his enemies: who brought him word that they had seene the ATHENIANS take laude. The next morning they did the like, the third day, and the fourth also all in one forte: so that the ATHENIANS beganne to be bold of them selues, and to despise their enemies, imagining they lay thus close for feare of them, and durst not come forward. In the meane time, Alcibiades (who lay at that time in the contry of CHERRONESVS) in certain places which he had conquered came ryding to the campe of the ATHENIANS, to tell the Captaines and generalls of the armie, the great fautes they committed. First, for that they had cast anker, and kept their shippes in an open place, where there was no manner of succor, nor harbor to retire vnto vpon any forme: and worst of all, because that they were to fetch their vittells farre of, at the citie of SESTOS, vnto which haue they should rather draw them selues vnto, considering that they had but a litle way to go, & also that they should haue the citie to backe them, which would furnish them with all things necessarie: and beside that, they should be further of from their enemies, which were gouerned by one generally that did commaund them all, and were so well trained, that at a whistle they were ready straight to execute his commaundement. Alcibiades perswasions to these Captaines of the ATHENIANS were not only misliked, but furthermore there was one called Thydem, that answered him very lowly: that he had nothing to doe to commaunde the armie, but other that had the charge of them. Alcibiades mistrusting thereby some treason, quietly went his way. The fifth day, the ATHENIANS hauing made the same countenance to present battell vnto their enemies, and retrying the same night as of custome very negligently, and in ill order, as men that made no reckning of their enemies: Lysander sent againe certaine galliots to discrie them, commaunding the Captaines of the same, that when they perceiued the ATHENIANS had left their gallies and taken lande, they should then returne backe with all possible speede they could, and being mid way ouer the straights, that they should lift vp a copper target into the ayre, upon the top of a pyke in the foredecke, for a signe to make all the whole fleet to row in battell. Now Lysander him selfe in the meane time went in person from galley to galley, perswading & exhorting euery Captaine that they should put their galliots, maryners, and souldiers in good readines, to thend that when the signe should be lifted vp, they should rowe with all their might in battell against the enemies. Wherefore, so soone as the copper target was set vp in the ayre, and that Lysander had made his trompet sound out of the Admirall, for a token to hale out into the sea the gallies immediatly beganne to row for life in enuy one of an other, and the footemen that were upon the lande, ranne with speede also to the toppes of a high cliffe neere vnto the sea, to see what would be the ende of his fight, because the distance from one side to the other in that place was not fully two myles, which they had gone out, and in a litle space, through the great diligence & force of rowing with their owers. So Conon the chiefe Captaine of the ATHENIANS perceiuing from the shore this great fleet coming with a full force to assault them: he then cried out to the souldiers that they should runne to their shippes, and being in a rage to see things in this daunger, called some by their names, others he intreated, and the rest he compelled to take their gallies. But all his diligence was to no purpose, because the souldiers were wholly scattered here and there. For so soon as they were set a lande out of their gallies at their returne, some went to buy provision, some went a walking in the fieldes, some were set at supper in their cabines, and other were layd downe to sleepe, nothing mistrusting that which happened to them, through their Captaines ignorance and lacke of experience. But when the enemies were ready to ioyne and fall vpon them with great cries and noyse of owers, Conon hauing eight gallies, itale secretly out of the fleet, and flying vnto Enagoras, laued him selfe in the Ile of CIPRVS. In the meane time, the PELOPONNESIANS falling apon the other gallies, tooke some of them emptie, and brake the others as the souldiers beganne to come aborde apon them. And as for the men, some were flaine by their shippes as they ranne vnto them like naked men without weapon, and out of order, thinking to haue saued them selues: other were killed in flying, because the enemies landed and had them in chafe. And there were taken aliue of them, three thousand prisoners with the Captaines. Lysander moreover tooke all the whole fleet of their shippes, the holie galley excepted called Paralos, and the eight that fled with Conon: and after he had destroyed all the campe of the ATHENIANS, he fastened the gallies that were taken, vnto the keele of his gallies, and returned with fonges of triumphe, with the sound of flutes and hoboyes, towards the citie of LAMPACVS, hauing wonne a great victory with litle labor, and had cut of in a small time, the long continuing and most diuerse warre that euer was, and had brought forth so many sundrie strange euentures of fortune, as are vncredible. For there had bene infinite battells fought both by sea and lande, and had altered many sundry times, and there was flaine at that time more Captaines, than in all the other warres of GREECE together: all which were at the length brought to ende and determined, by the good wisdom and conduction of one onely man. And therefore some thought, that this great overthrow was geuen by the gods, and sayd: that at the departure of Lysanders fleet out of the haue of LAMPACVS, to get set apon the fleet of the enemies, they perceaued ouer Lysanders galley the two fires, which they call the starres of Castor and Pollux: the one on the one side of the galley, and the other on the other side. They say also, that the fall of the stone was a token, that did signifie this great overthrow. For about that time, (as many hold opinion) there fell out of the ayer a maruolous great stone, in the place they call the goates riuer, which stone is seene yet vnto this day, hidden in great reuerence by the inhabitants of the citie of CHEIRONESVS. It is sayd also, that ANAXAGORAS did prognosticate, that one of the bodies tyed vnto the vaulte of the heauen, should be plucked away, and should fall to the ground by a flying & shaking that should happen. For he sayd, that the starres were not in their proper place where they were first created, considering that they were heauy bodies, and of the nature of stone: howbeit that they did shine by reflection of the fire elementary, & had bene drawn vp thither by force, where they were kept by the great violence of the circular motion of the element, euen as at the beginning of the world they had bene stayed & let from falling downe beneath, at that time when the separation was made of the colde and heauy bodies, from the other substance of the vniuersal world. There is an other opinion of certaine Philosophers, where there is more likely hooke then in that. For they say, that those which we call falling starres, be no fluxions nor deriuations of the fire elementary, which are put out in the ayer, in a manner so soone as they be lighted: nor also an inflammation or combustion of any parte of the ayer, which by her too much quantity doth spread vpwardes: but they are celestiall bodies, which by some slackenes of strength, or falling from the ordinary course of heauen, are thrown and cast downe here beneath, not alwayes in any parte of the earth inhabited, but more often abroade in the great Ocean sea, which is the cause that we do not see them. Notwithstanding, Anaxagoras words are confirmed by Damachus, who writeth in his booke of religion, that the space of three foot and fiftene yeares together, before that this stone did fall, they saw a great lumpe of fire continually in the ayer like a clowde inflamed, the which taried not in any one place, but went and came with diuerse broken remouings, by the driuing whereof there came out lightnings of fire that fell in many places, and gaue light in falling, as the starres do that fall. In the ende, when this great body of fire fell in that parte of the earth, the inhabitants of the contrie, after that they were a litle boldened from their feare and wonder, came to the place to see what

A was: and they found no manner of shew or apparance of fire, but only a very great stone lying vpon the ground, but nothing in comparison of the least parte of that which the compasse of this bodie of fire did shew, if we may so name it. Sure herein, Damachus wordes had neede of fauorable hearers. But againe if they betruue, then he vtterly contuteth their argumentes, that maintaine that it was a peece of a rocke, which the force of a boylterous winde did reare from the toppes of a mountaine, and caried in the ayer, so long as this hurle winde continued: but so soone as that was downe, and calme againe, the stone fell immediately. Neither doe we say that this lightning bodie, which appeared so many dayes in the element, was very fire in deede, which comming to dissolue and to be put out, did begeth this violent storme and boylterous wind in the element, that had the force to reare the stone in sunder, & to cast it downe. Nevertheless, this matter requireth better discourse in some other booke then this. But now to our story. When the three thousand ATHENIANS that were taken prisoners at that overthrow, were condemned by the counsell to be put to death: Lysander calling Philochus, one of the Captaines of the ATHENIANS, asked him what paine he would iudge him worthy of, that gaue the citizens so cruell & wicked counsell. Philochus being nothing abashed to see him selfe in that miserie, answered him. Accuse not them that haue no iudge to heare their cause: but since the goddess haue geuen thee grace to be conqueror, doe with vs, as we would haue done with thee, if we had overcome thee. When he had sayd so, he went to washe him selfe, and then put on a fayer cloke vpon him, as if he should haue gone to some feast: and went lustily the foremost man to execution, leading his contrie men the way, as Theophrastus writeth. After this done, Lysander with all his fleet went by all the cities of the sea coast, where he commanded so many ATHENIANS as he founde, that they should get them to ATHENS, letting them vnderstand that he would not pardone a man of them, but put them all to death as many as he found out of their city. And this he did of policie to bring them all within the precinct of the wallles of ATHENS, because he might so much the sooner famish them for lacke of vittells: for otherwise they would haue troubled him sore, if they had had wherewithall to haue maintained a long siege. But in all the cities as he passed by, if they were gouerned by the authority of the people, or if that there were any other kinde of gouernment, he left in euery one of them a LACEDÆMONIAN Captaine or gouernor, with a counsell of sennet officers, of them that had bene before in league and amity with him: the which he did as well in the cities that had euer bene confederates and frendes vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, as in them that not long before had bene their enemies. So he went sayling all alongest the coastes, fayer and softerly making no haste, stablishing in manner a generall principality ouer all GREECE. For he did not make them officers that were the richest, the noblest, or honestest men, but such as were his frendes, out of those tribes which he had placed in euery citie: & to them he gaue authority to punish, and reward such as they liked of, and would be present him selfe in persone to helpe them to put those to death, whome they would execute, or otherwise expulle or banish their contrie. But this gaue the GREECIANS small hope of good or gracious gouernment vnder the rule of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Wherefore, me thinks that Theopompus the comical Poet doth, when he compared the LACEDÆMONIANS, vnto tauerneers wines, saying: that they had geuen the GREECIANS a tast of the sweete drinke of libertie, and that afterwards they had mingled it with vineger. For, the tast they gaue the GREECIANS of their gouernment from the beginning, was very sharpe vnto them: because Lysander tooke the rule and authority of gouernment out of the peoples handes, and gaue it vnto a fewe of the boldest, and most seditious men in euery citie. Thus hauing spent a great time in this voyage, to make these alterations: he sent newes before to LACEDÆMON, that he was comming with two hundred saille. He spake also with the kinges Agis and Pausanias, in the contrie of ATTICA, perswading him selfe that he should winne the city of ATHENS at the first assault. But when he saw his expectation failed, & that the ATHENIANS did valiantly resist him: he returned once againe with his fleet into ASIA, where he made an end of chaunging and altering the manner of gouernment through euery city in equall maner, stablishing a counsell of sennet officers only in euery one of them, & putting euery where many citizens to death, and banishing many also. Among others, he draue all the SAMIANS out of their contrie, and restored againe all them that had bene banished before: and the city of Sesios also, being yet in the Athenians hands, he tooke it from them. And furthermore, he would not suffer the natural Sestians to dwell there, but draue them away, and gaue their citie, their houses, and landes, vnto shippe masters, officers of gallies, and galley slaues, that had bene in the warres with him. But therein the Lacedæmonians were against him, and this was the first thing that they did forbid him: for they restored the Sestians, against his will, vnto their landes and goodes againe. But as the Grecians were very much offended, to see the partes Lysander played: so were they all very glad againe, to see these others which he afterwarde did. For he restored the Eginetes againe to their landes and houses, who had bene put from them a long time. He restored also the Melians, and the Scionians to their landes againe, which the Athenians had gotten from them, and draue out the Athenians. Furthermore, Lysander being aduertised, that the citizens and inhabitants of Athens were pinched sore for lacke of vittells, he returned againe, and came into the haue of Piræa: by meanes whereof he kept the citie so straight, that he made them yeelde vpon such condicions as he him selfe would. Howbeit there are certaine Lacedæmonians that say, Lysander wrote vnto the Ephors: the city of Athens is taken. And that the Ephors wrote againe vnto him: it is well that it is taken. But this is but a tale deuised to make the matter seeme better: for in deede the capitulations which the Ephors sent vnto him, were these. The Lordes of the counsell of Lacedæmon haue thus decreed: that ye doe raise the fortification of the haue of Piræa. That ye do ouerthrow also the long wall that ioyneth the haue to the citie. That ye yeelde vp and redeliuer all the cities which ye doe holde, and content your selues with your liues and contry only. This doing, ye shall haue peace, so that ye performe our demaundes. That ye shall receiue those which are banished, for the number of shippes, ye shall dispose of them as we shall will you. The Athenians agreed vnto the articles contained in that bill, following the counsell of Themistocles, the sonne of Agnon. Who when a young orator called Cleomenes, did openly aske him in anger, if he were bold to dare to doe, or say, any thing contrary vnto that, which Themistocles had done before time, to assent vnto the Lacedæmonians, that the walles which he built in despite of them, should by their commaundement now be raised: he answered him openly againe, young man, my friend, I doe nothing contrary to Themistocles doings. For like as he heretofore did build the walles, for the safety and benefit of all the citizens and people that were in Athens at that time: euen so doe we that are here now, for the selfe same cause plucke it downe and raise it. And if it be true that walles doe make cities happy, then it must needs follow that the city of Sparta which neuer had any walles, should be the vnfortunate of all other. So Lysander hauing receiued all the Athenians shippes buttwelue, & the walles of the city allowe vnto them at his pleasure: on the sixteenth day of march, on which day in olde time the Athenians had wonne the battell by sea, within the straight of Salamina, against the king of Persia, he counsell'd them straight to chaunge the forme of their gouernment. The people could not brooke that motion, and were maruelously offended withall. Wherevpon Lysander sent to declare vnto them, that they had broken the articles of the peace made between them, for that their walles were yet standing, the tenne dayes being expired in which they had promised to ouerthrow them: and therefore that he would once againe referre it to the determination of the counsell, howe they should be vied, that had broken the articles and couenaunts of the first peace. Other say, that immediately he referred it vnto the deliberation of the counsell of their confederates, that is to say: whether they should altogether destroy the city, and make the inhabitants thereof, slaues, and bondmen or no. In this counsell, it is reported that there was a Theban called Erianthus, whose opinion was, that they should utterly raise the city, & make the contry a desert: so that it should neuer after serue for other thing, but for pasturage of beastes. But during this dyet & counsell, there was a banquet made, whereunto all the Captaines and chiefe officers of the army being bidden, there was a Phocian, a singer of songes, that sang the entry of the Chorus to the tragedy of Electra, made by the Poet Euripides, which beganne in this sorte.

A notable saying for the walls of cities.

Erianthus cruelly advise against the Athenians.

I come now to your courtes, which by both sides was vvasht: By spoyle of warres depopulate, destroyed, and disgraft.

These words moued all the hearers with compassion, so that the most parte of them thought it were too great a sinne to destroy so noble a city, which brought forth so many famous wife men, & great persones. Wherefore Lysander, when the Athenians had submitted the selues altogether to his will, caused all the women players of pipes or shalmes to come out of the city, and gathered all those together which he had in his owne campe also, and with the sound of their instruments he made the walles and fortifications of the city of Athens to be pulled downe to the very ground, and set all their gallies on fire, & burnt them in the presence of the confederates of the Lacedæmonians, who daunced and played in the meane season with garlandes of flowers on their heades, in token that that day was a beginning of their full and perfect liberty. Immediately after he chaunged also the state of the gouernment, establishing a counsell of thirty Magistrates in the city, and other tenne also in the haue of Piræa, hauing allequall and like authority: and therewithall made Callibius a gentleman of Sparta Captaine of the castell there, and left a good garrison of the Lacedæmonians with him. This Callibius one day lift vp his staffe he had in his hande to strike Autolycus withall, a strong mad man to wrestle: wherevpon Xenophon the Philosopher made his booke in olde time, a called Conitiuium. But Autolycus that was a cunning wrestler, hauing all the sleights of wrestling, sodainly tripped Callibius with his legge, and lifting him vp at the armes end, cast him to the ground. Howbeit Lysander was not angry with Autolycus for it, but reproued Callibius, telling him that he should haue remembered (if he had bene wife) that he had the gouernment ouer free men, and not of bonde men. Notwithstanding, shortly after the thirty gouernors of the city, to satisfie Callibius, put this Autolycus to death. When Lysander had done all these things, he tooke sea againe, and went into the contry of Thracia, and sent by Gylippus before vnto Sparta (who had bene Captaine and generall of the Syracusan in Sicilia) all the golde and siluer that was left in his handes, with all the presentes besides which had bene priuately geuen him, and with the crownes also that had bene presented him: which were maruelous in number as it is to be thought, for that many came to present him, considering the great power he had, and that in manner he was chiefe and sole prince of all Greece. This Gylippus did rippe the feames of euery bagge in the bottome where the money was, and tooke a good summe out of euery of them: and afterwarde sowed them vp againe, not thinking that there had bene a border vpon euery bagge, upon the which was declared, the number and kindes of gold and siluer that were therein. Now when he was come to Sparta, he hid the money he had stolen, vnder the house eauinges, and went and deliuered the bagges he had brought, into the handes of the Ephors, shewing them Lysanders seale, which he had set to euery one of them. The Ephors hauing opened the bagges, & told the money, found that the summe agreed not with the borders of the contentes: and yet could not tell where the fault was. But a seruant of Gylippus told them in darke wordes, saying: that vnder the tyles of his masters house there lay a great number of owles. Nowe the greatest parte of the coyne of golde and siluer which was currat through Greece, was stamped with the marke of an owle, by reason of the Athenians. Thus Gylippus after so many noble exploitos done in warres, committing so shameful & vile a dede, was banished out of his cotry of Lacedæmonia. But the wisest men of Sparta, and of deepest iudgement, fearing the power of golde and siluer, and seeing by prooffe of Gylippus doings, that it had such power to make one of their chiefe men to fall through couetousnes: they greatly blamed Lysander for bringing of it into Lacedæmon, beseeching the Ephors that they would send all this golde and siluer out of Sparta, as a plague, prouocation, and wicked baite, to make them do euill: declaring vnto them, that they should vie no other money, but their owne only. Whereupon they referred all, to the wisedom and determination of the counsell. Theopompus writeth, that Sciraphides was he that did moue the counsell of the Ephors in it. Howbeit Ephorus calleth him Phlogidas, who was the first that spake against it in the counsell, that they should not admit, nor receiue into the city of Sparta any money of golde or siluer: but should only content them selues with their owne contry iron coyne, the which first of all, coming from the fire redde hotte, was quenched with vineger, to thend they should be forged no more, nor employed vnto any other vse. For it was so eager and brittle by meanes of this temper, that they coule no more conuert it to any other purpose: and besides, it was very heauie and vnhandsome to remoue, considering that a great heape and quantitie of it, was but of small value. And it seemeth they did vse of olde time, certaine litle iron money, and in some places copper money, called Obelisci, from whence the small peeces of money now extant are called Oboli, whereof fix make a Drachma, so termed, for that it was as much as the hand could gripe. Neuerthelesse, at the earnest sute of Lysanders frendes that stood against it, and held hard with him: it was decreed in the counsell, that the money should remaine in the city, and ordained that it should be currant onely but for that sayres of the common wealth. And if it were found, that any priuate man did either locke vp, or keepe any money, that he should suffer death for it: as if Lycurgus when he made his lawes feared gold and siluer, and not the couetousnes and auarice which the golde and siluer bringeth with it. The which was not taken away so much, prohibiting priuate men to haue it: as it was ingendred only by a common tolleracion of getting it. For, the profit which they sawe brought withall, made it to be esteemed and desired. For it was vnpossible they should despayse a thing priuately for vnprofitable, which they sawe reckoned of commonly, as a thing very necessary: and that they should thinke it would not serue their turne priuately, seeing it so commonly esteemed and desired. But we are rather to thinke, that priuate mens manners are conformed according to the common vses and customes of cities: then that the faultes and vices of priuate men doe fill cities and common weales with ill qualities. And it is more likely, that the partes are marred & corrupted with an infection of the whole, when it falleth out, that the partes corrupted should drawe the whole vnto corruption. For to the contrary, the faultes of a parte destroyed, which might be preiudiciall vnto the whole, are oftentimes redressed and corrected by thother partes, whole and entier. But they that tooke this resolution in their counsell at that time, to haue money in the common wealth: made feare of punishment, and of the law, to be the outward watchmen of citizens houfes, to keepe that no money should come in to them. But all this while they made no inward prouision, to keepe the contrary of their foules from all passion & greedy desires of money: but to the contrary, they made them all to haue a couetous desire to be rich, as if it were a great and honorable thing. But for that we haue hertofore in other places reprobued the LACEDÆMONIANS. And moreover Lysander caused a statue of brass to be made like him selfe of the spoile he had gotten of the enemies, to set it vp in the citie of Dalphe, and for euery priuate Captaine of the gallies in like case: and the two starres of Castor & Pollux in golde besides, which vanished away a litle before the battell of Leuctres, and no man knewe what became of them. Again, in the chamber of the treasury of Brasidas, and of the Acanthians, there was also a galley made of gold and iuory, of two cubittes long, which Cyrus sent vnto him after the victory he had wonne by sea, of the Athenians. And furthermore, Alexandrides the historiographer borne at Deephes, wryteth, that the selfe same Lysander had left there to be kept safe, a tallent of siluer, two & fifty Minas, and eleuen peeces of gold called Stateres. But all this accordeth not with that which all the other historiographers write, agreeing of his poverty. But Lysander being able then, and of greater power then euery Grecian was before him: caried a greater power and countenance then became his ability. For, as Duris writeth, he was the first of the Grecians vnto whom they did euer erect any altars, and offer sacrifice vnto as a god, and in honor of whom they did first sing any hymnes: and at this day there is yet good memory of one which beganne in this maner.

The noble Captaines praise, we meane to celebrate,

The SAMIANs by publicke decree ordained, that the seales of Iuno, which were called in their city Heroea, should be called Lysandria. Lysander had euer one Cherilus a SPARTAN Pagan about him, to wryte and set forth all his doings in verse. An other Poet called Antilocus, one day made certaine verses in his praise: which pleased him so well, that he gaue him his name full

A fall of siluer. There were two other Poets, Antimachus Colophonian, and Nicarchus borne at HERACLEA, which did both wryte verses to honor him, struing whether of them should do best. Lysander iudged the crowne and victory, vnto Nicarchus: which with Antimachus was so angry, that he rased out all that he had writt of him. But Plato who at that time was young, & loud: Antimachus because he was an excellent Poet, did comforte him, and tolde him that ignorance did blinde the vnderstanding of the ignorant; as blindness doth the sight of the blinde. Aristonous an excellent player of the citterne, & one that had fix times wonne the prizes of the Pythian games: to winne Lysanders fauor, promised him, that if euer he wained the prize of his arte againe, he would cause him selfe to be proclaimed Lysanders slave. (This ambition of Lysander was very odious and grieuous, only vnto great persones, and men of his estate: but besides his ambition, in thende he became very prowde and cruel, through the flatteries of his followers, and them that courted him: so that he exceeded in recompensing his frendes, as also in punishinge of his enemies. For, to gratifie his frendes and familiars, he gaue them absolute power and authority of life and death in their townes and cities: and to pacifie and appease his anger where he once hated, there was no other way but death, without all possibility of pardon. And that he plainly shewed afterwards in the city of Miletus; where, fearing least they would flie that tooke parte with the people, & because he would haue them appeare that hid them selues: he gaue his word, and sware that he would doe them no hurt at all. The poore men gaue credit to his worde. But so soone as they came out, and did appeare, he deliuered them all into the handes of their aduersaries, (which were the chiefe of the nobility) to put them all to death: & they were no lesse then eight hundred men one with another. He caused great murders of people to also be done in other cities: for he did not only put them to death that had priuately offended him, but numbers besides, onely to fauour and reuenge the priuate quarrells, enmities and couetousnes of his frendes, whom he had in euery place. And therefore was Eteocles LACEDÆMONIAN greatly commended for his saying: that GABRIS could not abide two Lysanders. Theophrastus wryteth also, that the very like was spoken of Alcibiades by Archestratus. Howbeit in Alcibiades there was nothing, but his infoleney, and vaine glory that men misliked: but in Lysander, a seuer nature, and sharpe condicions, that made his power fearfull & intollerable. Neuerthelesse, the LACEDÆMONIANS passed ouer all other complaints exhibited against him: sauing when they heard the complaints of Pharnabazus, who purposely sent Ambassadors vnto them, to complaine of the wrongs and iniuries Lysander had done him, spoyling and destroying the contry vnder his gouernment. Then the Ephori being offended with him, clapped vp Thorax in prison, one of his frendes and Captaines that had serued vnder him: and finding that he had both gold and siluer in his house contrary to the law, put him to death. And to him selfe they sent immediately that which they call Scytala, (as who would say, the scrolle wrytten upon a rounde staffe) commanding him that he should retorne immediately upon receite thereof. The Scytala is in this forme. When the Ephorides sende a Generall, or an Admirall to the warres, they cause two litle rounde staues to be made of the like bignes and length, of which the Ephori doe keepe the tone, and thother they geue to him whom they sende to the warres. These two litle staues they call Scytalas. Nowe when they will aduertise their Generall secretly of matters of importance, they take a scrolle of parchment, long and narrow like a leather thonge, and wreath it about the round staffe, leauing no voyde space betweene the knottes of the scrowle. Afterwards when they haue bound them fast together, then they wryte vpon the parchment thus rolled what they will, and when they haue done wryting, vnfolde it, and sende it to their Generall, who can not else possibly read it to know what is writt, (because the letters are not ioined together, nor follow in order, but are scattered here and there) vntill he take his litle rowle of wodde, which was geuen him at his departure. And then wreathing the scrowle of parchment about it which he receaueth, the folding and wreathes of the parchment falling iust into the selfe same place as they were first folded: the letters also come to ioyne one with another, as they ought to doe. This litle scrowle of parchment also is called as the rowle of wodde, Scytala: euen as we commonly see in many places that the thing measured, is also called by the name of the measure. When this parchment scrowle was brought vnto Lysander, who was then in the contrie of HELLASPONT, he was maruelously troubled withall, fearing about all other things the accusations of Pharnabazus: so he sought meanes to speake with him before he departed, hoping thereby to make his peace with him. When they were together, Lysander prayed him would write an other letter vnto the Lordes of SPARTA, contrary to his first, how that he had done him no hurt at all, and that he had no cause to complaine of him: but he did not remember that he was a CRETIAN, (as the common proverbe sayeth) that could deceaue an other. For Pharnabazus hauing promised him that he would performe his desire, wrote a letter openly, purporting the effect of Lysanders request: but behinde he had an other contrary effect, so like on the out side vnto the other, that by sight no man could discern the one from the other. And when he came to put his seale, he changed the first with the last that was hidden, & gaue it him. When Lysander came vnto SPARTA, he went as the maner is, straight to the pallace where the Senate kept, and gaue his letters vnto the Ephores, thinking that he should haue bene cleared from all daunger of the greatest accusations they could haue burdened him withall: because that Pharnabazus was very well thought of of the Lordes of LACEDÆMONIA, for that he did euer shew him selfe willing and ready to helpe them in all their warres, more then any other of the kinges Lieutenantes of PERSIA. The Ephori hauing read this letter, they shewed it vnto him. Then did Lysander plainly see, that the common proitch was true:

Thereupon he went home to his house maruelously troubled. But within few dayes after returning to the pallace againe to speake with the Lords of the counsell, he told them that he must needs make a voyage vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon, to discharge certaine sacrifices which he had vowed and promised to him before he had wonne the battells. Some say, that in deede Iupiter Ammon appeared to him in a dreame as he did besiege the city of the ATHEANS, in the contry of THRACIA, and that by his commaundement he raised the siege, and charged them of the city, that they should thanke Iupiter Ammon, and doe sacrifice vnto him by reason whereof, they thinke that he ment good faith, when he sued for licence to make this voyage into LIBYA, to performe the vowes which he had made. But the most parte did certainly beleue that he made sure to goe this iorney, for a cloke and colour only to absente himselfe, because he feared the Ephores, and that he could not endure the yoke and subiection which he must abide remaining at home, neither could like to be commaunded. And this was the true cause of his sute to goe this voyage, much like vnto a horse taken out of a freshe pasture and goodly meadows, to bring him into a stable, & make him to be iorneyed as heers before. Neuerthelesse, Ephorus writeth an other cause, the which I will recite hereafter. In deede, Lysander hauing hardly obtained licence, tooke shippe, and crosseid faile. But during his absence, the kinges of LACEDÆMON remembering that he kept all the cities at his commaundement, by meanes of the frendes he had in euery city, whom he had made chiefe gouernors of the same, & that by their meanes he came in maner to be absolute prince ouer all GREECE they tooke vppon them to redeliuer the gouernment of the townes and cities againe into the hands of the people, and also to put downe his frendes whome he had established there. And hereupon fell out great insurrection againe. For first of all, they that were banished from ATHENS, hauing surprised and taken the castell of Phyla apon the sodaine, did set apon the thirty gouernors tyrans (whom Lysander had placed there) and ouercame them in battell. Whereupon Lysander straight returned to SPARTA, & perswaded the LACEDÆMONIANS to restore the gouernment to the number of a few, and to punish the infolency of the people. So by his procurement, they sent first a hundred tallents vnto the thirty tyrans for an aide to maintaine this warre, and appointed Lysander him selfe generally. But the two kinges of SPARTA enuying him, and fearing least he should take the city of ATHENS againe: they determined that one of them would go. Whereupon Pausanias went thither immediatly, who in apparance seemed to maintaine the tyrannes against the people: but in effect, he did his inuicior to appease this warre, for feare least Lysander by meanes of his frendes and followers should once againe come to haue the city of ATHENS in his power, the which he might easily doe. And thus hauing agreed the ATHEANS againe one with an other, and pacified all faction and commocion among

Among them, he plucked vp the roote of Lysanders ambition. But shortly after, the ATHEANS rebelling againe against the LACEDÆMONIANS, Pausanias him selfe was repproued, because he yielded so much to the boldnes and infolency of the people, which were bridled and restrained before, by the authority of the small number of gouernors: and to the contrary, they gaue Lysander the honor to be generally, who ruled not in this rebellion to please mens mindes and to content them, neither with fond ostentation of glory, but seuerely, for the profit and commodity of SPARTA. It is true he would geue great wordes, and was terrible to them that resisted him. As he answered the ARGIENS one day, who contended for their confines with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and seemed to allege the best reasons. Euen they (sayd he) that shall proue the stronger hereby, shewing the sword halbe they that shall please their cause best for their confines. An other time, when a MEGARIAN had tolde his minde boldly enough in open counsell, he answered him: thy wordes (good frend) had neede of a city, meaning thereby that he was of too meane a towne to vie so great wordes. And to the BEOGTIANS also, who were in dout to professe them selues frends or enemies: he sent vnto the, to know if he should passe through the contry with his pykes vpwardes or downwardes. And when the CORINTHIANS also were reuolted from their allyance, he brought his army harde vnto their wallles: but when he sawe his men were afrayed, and made curley whether they should goe to the assault or not by chance spying a hare coming out of the towne ditches, he sayd vnto them: Are ye not ashamed to be afrayed to goe and assault your enemies that are so cowardly and slothfull, as hares doe keepe their formes at ease within the circuite of their wallles? Now king Agis being deceased, he left behinde him his brother Agefilas, and his supposed sonne Leotychides. Wherefore, Lysander that had loued Agefilas aforetime, gaue him counsell to stande for the right of the crowne, as lawefull heire and next of the blood, disfending of the race of Hercules: because it was suspected that Leotychides was Alcibiades sonne, who secretly had kept Timas Agis wife, at what time he was banished out of his contry, and came then to remaine in SPARTA. And Agis selfe also, concluding by reckening of the time of his absence, that his wife could not be with childe by him: made reckening of Leotychides, (and had openly hewed it all the rest of his life time) that he did not acknowledge him for his sonne, vntill such time as falling sicke of that disease whereof he died, he was caried to the city of HERACLA, and there lying in his death bed, at the humble sute of Leotychides him selfe, and partly at the instant request of his frendes who were importunate with him: he did acknowledge Leotychides for his sonne in the presence of diuers, whome he prayed to be witnesses vnto the Lordes of LACEDÆMON, of his acceptation and acknowledging of him to be his sonne. Which they all did in fauor of Leotychides. For all that, Agefilas tooke it apon him, by the support and maintenance of Lysanders fauor. Howebeit, Diopithes a wife man, and known to be skillfull in ancient prophecies, did great hurt to Agefilas side, by an ancient oracle which he alleged against a defect Agefilas had, which was his lamenes.

Lysanders terrible words

The death of king Agis. Lysander depriveth Leotychides of his kingdome.

O Spartan people you, which beare high haughty hartes, And looke a loft: take heede I say, looke vrell vnto your matres: Least whiles you stande upright, and guide your fate by grace, Some halting kingdom priniely, come creeping in a pace.
By that meanes might you moue great troubles, carke and care,
And mischiefs heape vpon your head, before you be auare.
And plunged should you be, euen ouer head and eares, VVith vvaist of vvarres, which here on earth doth perish many peares.

Many by occasion of this oracle, fell to take Leotychides parte: but Lysander declared vnto them, that Diopithes did not conster the meaning of the oracle well. For God, sayd he, cared not whether he halted of one legge or no, that should come to be king of LACEDÆMON: but in deede, the crowne and kingdome should halte and be lame, if bastardes not lawfully begotten, should come to raigne ouer the true naturall issue and right line of Hercules. By these persuasions, Lysander with his great countenance and authority besides, wanne all men to his opinion: so that Agefilas by this meanes was proclaimed king of LACEDÆMON. This done, Lysander began straight to counsell him to make warres in ASIA, putting him in hope that he should destroy the kingdom of PERSIA, and should come to be the greatest man of the world. Moreover, he wrote vnto his frendes in the cities of ASIA, that they should send vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to require king Agesslaw for their generall, to make warres against the barbarous people. Which they did, and sent Ambassadors purposely vnto SPARTA to sue that they might haue him: the which was no lesse honor procured vnto Agesslaw by Lysander meanes, then that he did, in making him to be chosen king. But men ambitious by nature, being otherwise not vnapt nor vnfit to commaunde, haue this imperfection: that through the ialousie of glory, they doe commonlie enuie their equalles, the which doth greatly hinder them for doing any notable things. For they take them for their enemies, enuying their vertue: whose seruice and meanes might helpe them to doe great matters. Thus Agesslaw being chosen generall of this enterprife, tooke Lysander with him in this iorney, amongst the things counsellors which were geuen vnto him to assitt him: and made speciall choyce of him, as by whose counsell he hoped most to be gouerned, and to haue him neereft about him, as his chiefeft frende. But when they were arriued in ASIA, they of the contry hauing no acquaintance with Agesslaw, seldome spake with him, or but litle: and to the contrary, hauing known Lysander of long time, they followed him, and waited vpon him to his tent or lodging, some to honor him, because they were his frendes, others for feare, because they did mistrust him. Euen much like as it falleth out oftentimes in the Theaters, when they play tragedies there: that he that shall play the person of some messenger or seruant, shalbe the best player, and shall haue the best voyce to be heard aboue all others: and to the contrary, that he which hath the royall bande about his heade, and the scepter in his hande, a man doth scant heare him speake. Euen so fell it out then: for all the dignitie due vnto him that commaundeth all, was shewed only vnto the counsellor: and there remained to the king no more, but the royall name only of a king, without any power. Therefore me thinks that this vndiscreete and importunate ambition of Lysander, did well deserue reproofe perhappes, to make him only to be contented with the second place of honor next vnto the king. But for Agesslaw againe, through extreame couetousnes and ialousie of glory, to cast Lysander altogether of, and to set foorth by his frende and benefactor, that surely became not him neither. For first of all, Agesslaw neuer gaue Lysander occasion to doe any thinge, neither did commit any matter of weight vnto him, that might be honorable for him: but which is worst of all, if he perceiued that he had taken any mens caufes in hand, and that he did fauor them, he did alwayes sende them backe againe into their contry, denying their sute, without that they coulde obtaine any thing they sued for, lesse then the meanest persones that could haue come, extinguishing Lysander's credit by litle, and litle, and taking from him all authority by this meanes. Wherefore, Lysander perceiuing howe he was thus refused and reiected in all things, seing that the countenance and fauor which he thought to shew vnto his frendes, fell out hurtfull vnto them: lest of solicite their matters any more, and prayed them to forbear to come vnto him, or to follow him, but to go to the king, and vnto those that could doe them better pleasure then him selfe, and specially those that honored them. When they heard that, many desired to trouble him any more in matters of importunance, but not to doe him all the honor they could, and continued still to accompanie him, when he went out to walke, or otherwise to exercise him selfe: the which did aggrauate and increafe Agesslaw's anger more against him, for the enuy he bare vnto his glory. And where he gaue very honorable charge & commission in the warres, oftentimes vnto very meane souldiers to execute, or cities to gouerne: he appointed Lysander treasurer or generall of all the ordinary prouision of vittells, and distributor of flesh. And then mocking the LONIANS that did honor him so much: let them go now, sayd he, and honor my flesh distributor. Wherefore, Lysander seeing it high time to speake: went vnto Agesslaw, and tolde him in few wordes after the LACONIAN manner: Truly Agesslaw, thou hast learned well to abate thy frendes. In deede sayed he againe, so haue I, when they wilbe greater then my selfe and to the contrary, they that maintaine and increafe my honor and authority, it is reason that I esteeme of them. Yea mary, sayd Lysander, but perhappes I haue not done as thou sayst. Yet I pray thee geue me such an office, as I may be least hated, & most profitable for thee: though it be but in respect of straungers eyes that looke apon vs both. After this talke betweene them, Agesslaw sent him his Lieutenant into the contry of HELLESPOINT, where Lysander still kept his anger secret in his hart against him, but for all that, did not leaue to doe all that he could for the benefit of his matters affaires. As amongst many other thinges, he caused a PERSIAN Captaine called Spithridates, to rebell against his master, who was a valliant man of his hands, and a great enemy of Pharnabazus, and had an army also which he brought with him vnto Agesslaw. Now concerning this warre, this was all that he did in that iorney. Wherefore, he returned againe to SPARTA not long after, with litle honor, being maruolously grieved and offended with Agesslaw; and hating more then before, all the state and gouernment of the citie of SPARTA: by reason whereof, he determined to put that in practise, which he had long time thought vpon, concerning the alteration of gouernment, and his enterprife was this. Amongst the offspring and issue of Hercules, who were mingled with the DORIANS, and returned againe into the contrie of PELOPONNESVS, the greatest number and chiefeft of them, dwelled in the city of SPARTA: howbeit, all they that came of that race had no right of succession to the crowne, sauing two families only, the Eurytionides, and the Agades. The other families, albeit they were all for nobility of blood descended out of one selfe house, yet had they no more right nor interest vnto the realme, then the residue of the people: for, the dignities that were attained vnto by vertue, were geuen vnto the inhabitants that could deserue them. Lysander then being one of those which was descended of the true race of Hercules, who notwithstanding had no interest in the crowne: when he saw him selfe alonely called to great honor through his famous actes and merites, and that he had wonne many frendes, and great credit and authority by dealing in matters of the state: it grieved him much, to see that they which were no nobler then him selfe, should be kings in that city, which he had increased by his vertue, and that he could not haue so much power as to take from these two houses, the Eurytionides, and the Agades, the prerogatiue that the kinges should be chosen onely out of one of those two houses, and to cast it apon the offspring of Hercules. Some say againe, that he would not only haue enlarged that prerogatiue vnto the issue of Hercules, but vnto all the natural SPARTANS also: because that Hercules race should not only desire this reward of honor, but euen they also that followed his steps in vertue, which had made him equal with the gods in honor. For he doubted not, but if they would dispose the crowne in this sorte, that there was no man in the city of SPARTA that should sooner be chosen king then him selfe: whereupon he attempted first to perswade his citizens by very good reasons, & to bring this about the better, he conned an oration without booke, penned by Cleon Halicarnassens, made him for this purpose. But afterwards weying with him selfe, that so great and straunge a change as he would bring in, had neede of some better and stronger helpe: he beganne to frame a deuise as they say, to moue the people by, much after the manner they vse in tragedies, framing engines to bring some god to come downe from heauen vnto them, and this was his faigned inuention. He deuised certaine oracles & prophecies, thinking that all Cleons rethoricke would stand him in no steade, if first of all he did not fill the citizens hartes with some superstition & feare of the goddes, that he might bring them afterwards more easly vnto reason. And Ephorus sayeth, that he proued first to corrupt the Nunne with money, that geueth all the oracles and answers in the temple of Apollo at DELPHES: and that afterwards, he would haue wonne the Nunne also of the temple of DODONA with money, by Pherecles practise. And that he being reiected by them both, went lastly vnto the temple of Iupiter Ammon: and that there he spake vnto the priestes, and offered them great store of money for the same purpose. But they were so offended with Lysander, that they sent men of purpose to SPARTA, to accuse him, that he would haue corrupted them with money. The counsell clearing Lysander of this accusation, the LIBYANS his accusers at their departing sayd: we will one day iudge more iustly, then you my Lordes of LACEDÆMON haue done now, when you shall come to dwell in our contry of LIBYA: supposing there was an auncient prophcy that sayd, the LACEDÆMONIANS one day should come to dwell in the contry of LIBYA. But we shall doe better to wryte the whole story at large of this practise, subtlety, and malicious deuise, which was no matter of small importunance, nor lightly ground: but as in a mathematicall proposition there were many great coniectures and preliuppositions, & many long circumstances to bring it to conclusion, the which I will dilate from point to point, deliuering that which an historiographer and philosophes both hath written. There was in the marches of the realme of PONTUS a man that sayed he was gotten with childe by Apollo, the which many (as it is to be thought) would not beleue at all, and many also did beleue it: so that the beinge deliuered of a goodly sonne, diuers noble men and of great estate were careful to bring him vp, and to haue him taught. This childe, I know not whereuppon, nor how, was named Silenus: and Lysander beinge the plat of his deuise from thence, added to all the rest of him selfe, to goe on with his practise. Now he had many (and they no small men) that made his way to frame this idle going out a rumor of the birth of this childe, without any suspicion gathered out of the intence of this rumor: And furthermore, they brought other newes from DELPHES, which they dispersed abroade through the city of SPARTA, to wit: that the priestes of the temple kept secret bookes of very auncient oracles, which they them selues durst not touch nor handle, neither might any man read them, onlesse he were begotten of the seede of Apollo, who should come after a long time, and make his birth appeare vnto the priestes that kept these papers, that by some secret marke & token, which they had amongst them: & thereby being knowne for Apolloes sonne, he might then take the bookes, & read the auncient reuelacions & prophecies of the same. These things prepared in this sorte, there was order taken that Silenus should come and aske for these bookes as though he were the sonne of Apollo: and that the priestes which were priuy to this practise, should make as though they did diligently examine him of euery thing, and how he was borne. And that at the length, after they had seemed to know all, they should deliuer these prophecies vnto him, as if he had bene in deede Apolloes sonne: and that he should openly read them in the presence of many witnesses. And among the rest of the prophecies, that he should read that specially, for the which this long paltry fained drift was framed, touching the kingdome of LACEDÆMONIA: that it was better, and meetelier for the SPARTANS they should chooe them for their kinges, whome they found the meetest men of all their magistrats. But when Silenus was come of full age, and brought into GREECE of purpose to performe this practise, all the military was made by the faine heart of one of the players and companions of Lysander, who holpe him to countenance this deuise: who when the matter should haue taken effect, throngke for feare, and let the misterie alone. This notwithstanding, nothing was bewrayed in Lysanders life time, till after his death. For he dyed before king Agefilus returned out of ASIA, being fallen into warres with BOEOTIA before his death, or rather hauing him selfe made GREECE to fall into warres. They doe reporte in this way, and some lay the fault upon him, other upon the THERBANS, and other upon them both: and they burden the THERBANS withall, because they did vterly ouerthrowe the common sacrifices which Agefilus made in the city of AVLIDE. And they say also, that Androtides and Amphisheus did raise this warre among the GREECIANS, being before corrupted with money by the king of PERSIA to bring warres upon the LACEDÆMONIANS in GREECE: and beganne to invade and destroy the countrie of the PHOCIANS. Other say that Lysander was very angry with the THERBANS, because they onely of all other their confederates did aske the tenth parte of all the spoyle which was wonne in the warre against the ATHENIANS: and that they were not pleased that Lysander had sent the money away vnto SPARTA. But about all Lysander did malice them most, because they were the first that made way for the ATHENIANS to be deliuered from thoppresion of thirty tyrannes, whom he had stablished gouernors in ATHENS, and in whose fauor (to make them to be dreaded the more) the LACEDÆMONIANS had ordained by a common edict: that they that were banished and did flee from ATHENS, might lawfully be taken and apprehended in what place soeuer they fled vnto, and that whosoever should resist or let them to do it, they should be proclaimed rebels, & open enemies vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. Again to contrary this edict, the THERBANS made an other very like, & meete for the glorious dedes of Bacchus and Hercules their auncelstors, for whom it was made that euery house and city through the contry of BOEOTIA, should be open for the ATHENIANS that would come thither, & that he that would not helpe a banished man from ATHENS, against him that would take him away by force, should be fined and amerced at a talent. And also if there were any fouldiers that went vnto ATHENS, through the contrie of BOEOTIA, that

A that the THERBANS should not see nor heare it. This was no diffimulation to speake of, that they should ordaine things with so gentle wordes, and so meete for the people of GREECE, and then that the dedes should not aunswer vnto their edicts & proclamations. For Thrafsbulus, and his fellows of the conspiracie, who kept the castell of Phyla, they departed from THERBS, with armor and money, and the THERBANS did helpe them to beginne and practise their enterprife so secretly, that it was not discovered. These were the causes why Lysander was so earnestly bent against the THERBANS, & his choller being so extreame, by reason of his melancholies that grewe dayly upon him more and more through his age, he solicited the EPHORES so, that he perswaded them to sende a garnison thither: and him selfe taking the charge of them, vnderooke the iorney straight with his men. But afterwarde they sent kinge Pausanias also with an army thither, who was to fetch a great compasse about to enter into the contrie of BOEOTIA, by mount Cithæron: and Lysander should goe to meete him through the contry of PHOCIDES, with a great company of fouldiers besides. Now as Lysander went, he tooke the city of the ORCHOMENTANS, who willingly yelded them selues to him as soone as he came thither. From thence he went to the city of LEBADIA, which he spoyled: & from thence he wrote vnto king Pausanias, that departing from PLATEES, he should march directly to the city of ALIASTE, where he would not faile to meete him the next morning by breake of day at the towne walles. These letters were intercepted by certaine skowtes of the THERBANS, who met with the messenger that caried them. Thus the THERBANS hauing intelligence of their purpose, left their cite in custodie vnto the ATHENIANS who were come to aide them: and departed out of THERBS about midnight, and marched all night with great speede, that they came to ALIASTE in the morning a litle before Lysander, and put halfe their men into the cite. Now for Lysander, he was determined at the first to keepe his men upon a hill which is nere to the city, and there to tary the coming of king Pausanias. But afterwards, when he sawe that the day was farre spent, and that he came not, he could tary no longer, but arming him selfe, after he had made an oration vnto the confederates which he had brought with him, he marched on with his men in battell ray, longer then large, by the high way that went vnto the city. In the meane season, the THERBANS that were left without the city, leauing ALIASTE on the left hande, did let vpon Lysanders reterwarde of his army against the fontaine called Cissusa: where the Poets faine that the nurles of Bacchus did washe him, when he came out of his mothers wombe, because the water that commeth out of it (though it be very clere and sweete to drinke) hath notwithstanding (I can not tell by what meanes) a collour like wine: and not farre from thence there grow great plenty of Styrac trees. The which the ALIASTIANS do allege, to proue that Radamanthus heretofore dwelt in that parte, & doe shew his sepulchre there yet to this day, which they call Alea. And hard by that also, there is the monument of Alcmena, which was buried (as they say) in that place, & was married to Radamanthus, after the death of Amphitryon. But the THERBANS who were within the city with the ALIASTIANS, stirred not vntill they sawe that Lysander with the first of his troupe was nere vnto the towne walles: & then opening the gates on the sodaine, they made a salie out vpon Lysander, & slue him with his footthaier & a few other, because the most part of the voward fled, into the strength of the battell. Howbeit the THERBANS gaue the not ouer so, but followed the so valiantly, that they brake their order, & made the all flee through the mountaines, after they had slaine three thousand of the in the field: so were there three hundred THERBANS also slaine there, who followed their enemies so fiercely, till they recovered straight narrow waies, of great strength for them. These three hundred were in manner all those that were suspected in THERBS to fauor the LACEDÆMONIANS secretly: wherefore, for the desire they had to take away this opiniõ from their citizens, they hazarded the selues to no purpose, & were cast away in this chafe. King Pausanias heard newes of this ouerthrow, going for PLATEES vnto THE SPIES, & went on further, marching still in battell ray towards ALIASTE, where Thrafsbulus also arrived at the selfe same time, bringing the aide of the ATHENIANS from THERBS. And when Pausanias was purposed to send to aske licence of the enemies to take away the bodies of their men which they had slaine, to thintent to bury them: the olde SPARTANS that were in his army, mistaking it much, at the first were angry in them selues. But afterwarde they went vnto the king him selfe, to tell him that he dishonored SPARTA, to offer to take vp Lysanders bodie by his enemies leaue & fauor; A and that he should valiantly recouer him by force of armes, and honorably burie him; also that he had ouercome their enemies; or else if it were their fortune to be ouerthrowe, that yet it should be more honorable for them, to lye dead in the field by their Capitaine, then to take leaue to take vp his body. But notwithstanding all these wordes of the old men, king Pausanias seeing that it was a hard matter to ouercome the THEBANS in battell, now that they had gotten the victory, and furthermore, that the body of Lysander lay hard by the walls of ALIARTE, and that he could not come to take it away without great danger, although they should win the battell: he sent a herald to the enemies. And hauing made truce for certaine dayes, he led his army away, and tooke vp Lysanders body with him, and buried him after they were out of the confines of BOEOTIA, within the territory of the PANOPHIANS: where vntill this day his tombe remaineth upon the high way, goinge from DELPHES vnto the city of CHERONNEA. Thus Pausanias campe being lodged there, it is sayd there was a PHOCIAN, who reporting the battell vnto one that was not there, sayd that the enemies came to geue a charge vpon them, as Lysander had passed the Oplites. Thother wondering at that, there was a SPARTAN a very friend of Lysanders by, hauing heard all their talke, asked him what that was which he called Oplites: for that he had not heard that word named before. What? answered the PHOCIAN to him againe. Euen then it was where the enemies did ouerthrow the first of our men which were slaine in the feldes: for the riuier that runneth by the walles of the city, is called Oplites. The SPARTAN hearing that, burst out of weeping for sorrow, saying: then I see it is vnpossible for a man to auoyde his destinie. For Lysander aforetime had an oracle that tolde him thus.

*Lysander take good heede, come not I thee aduise: Neere Oplites that riuers bankes, in any kinde of vruife.

Howbeit some take it, that this riuier of Oplites is not that which passeth by the walles of ALIARTE, but it is the riuier that runneth neere vnto the city of CORONEA, and falleth into the riuier of Philarius, hard by the city: and they say that in oldetime it was called Hoplia, but now they call it Ifo mantus. He that flue Lysander, was an ALIARTIAN called Neochorus, who caried a Dragon painted upon his target: and this was that which the oracle of likelyhoods did signifie. They say also, that in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the THEBANS had an oracle from the temple of Apollo Ismenias: which oracle did prophesy the battell which they wanne by the castell of DELIVM, and the battell of ALIARTE also, which was thirty yeares after that. The effect of that oracle was this.

*Vvhen thou thy nets shalt spread, the vvoolues for to intrappe: Beware thou come not neere vnto, a little bill by happe,

He calleth the territory that is about DELIVM, the vttermoost confines, because BOEOTIA doth confine there with the contry of ATTICA: and the hill Orchalide which is now called A-lopecon (to say the foxe denne) which lieth on that side of the citie of ALIARTE, that looketh towards mounte Helicon. Lysander being slaine, the SPARTANS tooke his death so ill, that they would haue condemned king Pausanias of treason by law: who durst not abide the tryall, but fled vnto the citie of TEGRA, where he ended the rest of his life within the sanctuare of the temple of Minerua. When Lysander was dead, his poverie appeared to the world which made his vertue farre more famous, than when he liued. For then they sawe, that for all the gold & siluer which had passed through his hands, for all his great authority & countenance that he had caried, and for all that for many cities & townes did come to honor him, & briefly, for al that he had so great & puissant a kingdom in manner in his hands: yet he did neuer enrich nor increase his house for so much, as one farthing. So writeth Theopompus, whom we should rather beleue when he praiseth, then when he discommendeth: for commonly he taketh more delite to dispraise, then to praise any. It fortuneth not longe after, as Ephorus writeth, that the King Agesslaus goinge thither to perseue them, amongst other writings, founde the oration penned by Cleon Halicarnassens which Lysander had prepared to perswade the SPARTANS to change their gouernment, and to declare vnto them that they should reuoke the prerogatiue which the Enrytiomides and the Agiaides had: that the kinges of SPARTA could not be chosen but out of those two families, and to leue the prerogatiue at liberty, that the chiefeft magistrats might be lawfully chosen kinges of SPARTA. Agesslaus stood indifferēt to haue shewed this oratiō openly to the people, that the SPARTANS might see what manner a citizen Lysander had bene in his harte. But Lacratidas, a graue wise man, & president at that time of the counsell of the Ephori, would not suffer him: saying, that he should not digge Lysander out of his graue againe, but rather bury his oration with him, that was so passingly well, and eloquently penned to perswade. Yet notwithstanding, they did him great honor after his death: and amongst others, condemned two citizens in a great summe of money, that were made sure to two of his daughters while he liued, and refused to marie them when he was dead, seeing their father dyed lo poore: because they fought to marche in his house, supposing he had bene riche, and forooke them afterwards for their fathers poverty, when they saw he dyed a good and iust man. Thus we see, that at SPARTA there was a punishment for them that did not mary, or that maryed too late, or that married ill: and vnto this punishment were they most subiect, that sought great matches for couetousnes of goods. This is all we haue to wryte of Lysanders life and actes.

THE LIFE OF Sylla.

Vetus Cornelius Sylla was of the race of the Patricians, who be the noble men & gentlemen of ROME: & there was one of his ancestors called Rufinus, that obtained the dignity of Consul. He notwithstanding his Consulshippe, wanne more dishonor by defame; then he obtained honor by dignity of Consul. For they finding in his house about ten poundes worth of plate, contrary to the lawe at that time expressly forbidding it: he was expelled the Senate, and lost his place there, after which dishonor once receiued, his issue neuer rose, nor yet recouered it. And Sylla him selfe had very litle left him by his father: so that in his youth he was faine to hyer an other mans house, & sat at a small rent, as afterward he was twitted in the teeth withall, when they saw him richer then they thought he had deserved. For when he gloried & boasted of the victory at his returne from the warres of AFRICA, there was a noble man that sayd vnto him: why, how is it possible thou shouldst be an honest man, that hauing nothing left thee by thy father, thou art now come to haue so much? Now, though ROME had left her auncient iustice and purenes of life, wherewith she brought vp her peoplen former times, and that their hartes were poysoned with couetous desire of vaine & superfluous delites: yet notwithstanding, it was as fowle a reproche to them that did not maintaine them selues in the poeerty of their fathers, as vnto them that did consume their patrimony, and bring all to naught which their parentes had left them. But afterwards also when he caried the whole sway in ROME, and that he had put so many men to death: a free man being borne of the slaues infranchised, & being ready to be throwen downe the rocke Tarpeian, bicause he had faued and hidden one of the outlawes and men proclaimed to be put to death, wherfore they were found: cast it in Syllaes teeth, how that they had liued and dwelt together a long time in one selfe house, he hauing payed thousande Nummos for the rent of the vppermost roomes of the same house, & Sylla three thousand for all the nearemost rooms beneath. So that betwene both their wealthes, there was but onely two thousande and fiftie Drachmas of ATHENS difference. And this is that we finde in wryting of his first wealth. As for his stature and persone, that appeareth sufficiently by the statues and images that were made for him, which yet remaine. But for his eyes, they were like fire, and wonderfull redde and the colour of his face withall, made them the more fearefull to beholde. For he was copper nosed, and that was full of white streakes here and there: whereupon they say that the surname of a Sylla was geuen him, by reason of his colour. And there was a ieafter at ATHENS that finely mocked him in his verbe:

Sylla is like a blacke Berry sprinkled with meale.

It is not amisse to search out the naturall disposition of this man by such outward marks and tokens. It is sayd also that he was so naturally geuen to mocke & ieaft, that being a young man vnknown, he would neuer be out of the company of players, fooles, and tomblers, but still eating and tippling with them in dissolute manner. And afterwards also when he was his chiefest authoritie, he would commonly eate and drinke with the most impudent ieafters and scoffers, and all such rakehelles, as made profession of counterfeite mirth, & would thinne with the baddest of them to geue the finest mockes: wherin he did not only a thing vncomely for his yeres, & dishonored the maiesty of his office & dignity, but thereby also grew careless & negligent in matters of great importance, wherunto he should haue taken good regard. For after he was once sette at his table, he was not to be moued any more in matters of weight. Now, though from the table he was commonly found both very actiue, painefull, and seuer: yet falling into such cōpany by drinking, bowling, & making good chere, he sodainly became an other maner of man. So that without all compasse of modesty and iudgement, he was too familiar and conuersant with players, ieafters, tomblers, and daunfers: who when they had him in that vaine, might doe what they would with him. Of this riotyng came (in mine opinion) his vice of lechery, whereunto he was greatly geuen, and easily drawn after loue and pleasure: in such sorte, as his gray heares could not restrain his voluptuous life. His vnlawfull lustful loue beganne in his young yeres, with one Metrobis a common player, which stretched on increasing his amorous desire vntill his latter age. For at the first he loued Nicopolis a rich curtsan: and frequenting her company by oft accesse, and besides that he spent the prime of his beawty and youth in feasting her with great delight and passing pleasure, she afterwards became in loue with him, so that when he dyed, she made Sylla her heire of all she had. He was heire also vnto his mother in lawe, who loued him as her owne begotten sonne: and by these two good happes he was stept vp to pretie wealth. Afterwards beinge chosen Quaestor (to saye treasurer) the first time that Marius was Consul, he embarked with him in his iorney into AFRICA, to warre with kinge Iugurthe. When he was arriued at the campe, he shewed him selfe a man of great seruice in all other things, but in this especially, that he could wisely vse the benefit of any occasion offered him, and thereby wanne Bocchus kinge of the

the NUMIDIANS to be his fast and faithfull frende: whose Ambassadors, that escaped from a company of NUMIDIAN theues he courteously entertained, and hauing geuen them goodly presentes, sent them backe againe with a safe conuoy. Now concerninge kinge Bocchus, he had of long time both hated and feared kinge Iugurthe his sonne in lawe: in so much, that after he was overcome in battell, and came to him for succor, Bocchus practised treason against him, and for this cause sent secretly for Sylla, desiring rather that Iugurthe should be taken by Sylla, then by him selfe. Sylla brake this matter vnto Marius, of whom hauing receiued a small number of souldiers to accompany him, (without respect of perill or daunger) went and committed him selfe to the faith and fidelity of one barbarous king, to take an other: considering also that the king whom he trusted was so vnjust of his word, euen vnto his neerest friends and confederates. Now Bocchus hauing Iugurthe and Sylla both in his power, and brought him selfe to that pinch that of necessity he must betray the one or the other: after he had taken good breath to resolue which of the two he should deale withall, in the end went on with his first plot & device of treason, and so deliuered Iugurthe into Syllaes hands. In deede Marius triumphed for taking of king Iugurthe: but his euill willers, for the spite and grudge they bare him, did attribute the glory and honor of Iugurthes taking wholly vnto Sylla. That secretly went to Marius hate, and specially for that Sylla being high minded by nature (comming then but newly from abate, obscure, and vnknown life to be knowne & well accepted of the people in ROME, and to talso what honor ment) became so ambitious and couetous of glory, that he caused the story to be grauen in a ring, which he did euer after vse to weare & seale withall. Where king Bocchus was deliuering of Iugurthe vnto Sylla, and Sylla also receiuing Iugurthe prisoner. These thinges misliked Marius much: but notwithstanding, judging that Sylla was not so much enuied as him selfe, he tooke him with him vnto the warres. Marius in his seconde Consulship, made Sylla one of his Lieutenantes: and in his third Consulship, he had charge vnder him of a thousand footemen, and did many notable and profitable exploitcs for him. When Sylla was his Lieutenant, he tooke one Capillus, a general of the GAULES Tectosages. And when he was Colonell of a thousand footemen, he brought the MARSIAKS (a maruelous great contry of people in ITALIE) and perswaded them to remaine good frendes, and confederates of the ROMAINES. For this his good seruice, he founde that Marius grewe in great misliking with him, bicause from thence forth he neuer gaue him any honorable charge, or occasion to shewe good seruice: but to the contrary, did what he could to hinder his rising. Wherefore, Sylla afterwards tooke Catulus Lucatius parte, who was companion with Marius in his Consulship. This Catulus was a very honest man, but somewhat slacke and colde in marshall matters, which was the cause that in deede he did committe vnto Sylla all the speciall seruice and matters of weight in his charge: whereupon he gaue him occasion not onely to increase his estimation, but also his credit and power. For by force of armes, he conquered the most parte of the barbarous people which inhabited the mountaines of the Alpes: and Catulus campe lacking vittells, hauing commission, he made a maruelous great quantity of provision to be brought thither, in so much as Catulus campe being plentifully vittelled, they sent their store & surplusage vnto Marius souldiers, the which Sylla him selfe wryteth, did much mislike. And this is the first cause of their enmity. The which being grounded vpon so light occasion, was followed with ciuill warres, great effusion of blood, and with incurable factions and dissensions: that it ended at the length with a cruell tyranny, and confusion of all the ROMAINE state and Empire. This doth proue that Euripides the Poet was a wise man, and one that foresaw the ruines of common weales, when he counselled, and also commanded gouernors to flie ambition, as a most pestilent and mortall furie vnto them that are once infected withall. Now Sylla thinking that the reputation he had gotten already in the warres, would haue made his way open to preferre him to some honorable office in the city of ROME: he was no longer returned from the warres, but he would needes proue the peoples good willes vnto him, and procured his name to be billed among them that sued for the Praetorshippe of the city (that is to say, the office of the ordinary iudge that ministreth iustice vnto the citizens) but he was rejected by the voyce of the people. For the which he layed the fault vpon the meane sort, saying, that the commonalty knew well enough the frendshippe he had with king Bocchus, and that therefore they hoping that if he were made Ædilis before he came to be Prætor, he would make them see noble huntings and great fightinges of wilde beastes of LIVIA, that therefore they did choole other Prætors, and put him by his sute, in hope to compell him by this meanes to be first of all Ædilis. Howbeit it seemeth that he doth not confesse the truth of his refusal, for his owne act doth condemne him selfe: because the next yeer following he was chosen Prætor, partly for that he wan the people with curtesie, and partly with money. So he fallinge out with Cæsar upon that occasion, in his anger threatned him that he would vnto the power and authority of his office upon him. But Cæsar smiling, answered him: thou hast reason to call it thine office, for in deede it is thine, because thou hast bought it. But after the time of his Prætorshippe was expired, he was sent with an army into CAPPADOCIA, colouring his voyage thither with commision to restore Ariobarzanes into his kingdom againe: howbeit thonly cause of his iorney was in deede to suppress kinge Mithridates a litle, who tooke too many thinges in hande, and increased his power and dominion with a new figure of no lesse greatnes, then that which he had before. In troth he brought no great army out of ITALIE with him, but he was faithfully holpen by the confederates of the ROMAINES, every place, through whose aide he ouerthrew a great number of the CAPPADOCIANS; and afterwarde also a greater number of the ARMENIANS, which came in like case to aide them: so that he expulseth Gordius king of PHRYGIA out of CAPPADOCIA, and restored Ariobarzanes to his realme againe. After which victory, Sylla remained by the riuier of Euphrates; and thither came vnto him one Orobazus a PARTHIAN, Ambassador of Asfages, king of the PARTHIANES. Now these two nations, the ROMAINES, and the PARTHIANES, were neuer frendes before: and that with other thinges shewed the great good fortune Sylla had, that the PARTHIANES came first to him by his meanes to seeke frendshippe with the ROMAINES. They say, that receiuing this Ambassador Orobazus, he made three chayres to be brought out, the one for king Ariobarzanes, the other for Orobazus the Ambassador, and the third for him selfe, which he placed in the midst betwene them both, and sitting downe in the same, gaue audience vnto the Ambassador: for which cause the king of PARTHIA afterwarde put Orobazus to death. Some doe commend Sylla for this acte, for that he kept his state in such mailety among the barbarous people. Other do reprove his ambition in it, shewing him selfe stouid out of time, and to no purpose. We doe read that a soothsayer of CHALDEA being in Orobazus traine, hauing diligently viewed and considered the physiognomy of Sylla, and all his other mouinges and gestures of minde and body, to iudge not by the clymate of the contry, but according to the rules of his arte what his nature should be: all well considered of, he sayd that Sylla one day must needs come to be a great man, and that he marueled how he could suffer it that he was not euen then the chiefeft man of the worlde. When Sylla was returned againe to ROME, one Censorinus accused him of extortion, that he had caried away a great summe of money with him, contrary to the lawes, out of one of their confederates contry: howbeit he prosecuted not his accusation, but gaue it ouer. In the meane time, the enmity begonne betwixt him and Marinus, kindled againe vpon a new occasion of king Bocchus ambition: who partly to creepe further into the peoples fauor of ROME, and partly also for to gratifie Sylla, gaue and dedicated certaine images of victory carying tokens of triumphe, vnto the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and next vnto them also the image of Iugurthe, which he deliuered into the handes of Sylla, being all of pure golde. This did so offende Marinus, that he attempted to take them away by force: but others did defend the cause of Sylla. So that for the quarrell of these two, the city of ROME taking armes, had like to haue brought all to ruine: had not the warres of the confederats of ITALIE bene, which of long time did kindle and smoke, but at the length brake out into open flame and fedition for that time. In this maruelous great warre which fell out very dangerous, by sundry misfortunes and great losses to the ROMAINES, Marinus did no notable exploit: whereby it appeareth, that the vertue of warlike discipline hath neede of a strong, lusty, and able body. For Sylla to the contrary, hauing done notable seruice, and obtained many profitable victories, wanne the fame and elimation among the ROMAINES, of a noble souldier, and worthy Captaine: and among themenies them selues, of a most fortunate man. Notwithstanding, Sylla did not as Timotheus ATHENIAN, the sonne of Conon had done

A Who, when his aduersaries and ill willers did attribute his noble deedes vnto the fauor of fortune; and did paine fortune in tables, that brought him all the cities taken and secured in times whilst he slept: he tooke it in very ill parte, and was maruelous angrie with them that did it, saying, that they robbed him of the glory that iustly belonged vnto him. Wherefore one day when this Timotheus was returned from the warres with great victories, after he had openly acquainted the ATHENIANS with the whole discoure of his doings in his voyage, he sayd vnto them: my Lordes of ATHENS, fortune hath had no parte in all this which I haue told vnto you. Hereupon the goddes it should seeme were so angrie with this foolish ambition of Timotheus, that he neuer afterwarde did any worthy thing, but all went vnto against the heare with him: vntill at the length he came to be so hated of the people, that in the end they banished him from ATHENS. But Sylla to the contrary, did not only patiently abide their wordes: that sayd, he was a happy man, and singularly beloued of fortune: but also increasing his opinion, and glorying as at a speciall grace of the goddes, did attribute the honor of his doings vnto fortune, either for a vaine glory, or for that he had in fanly, that the goddes did prosper him in all his doings. For he wrote him selfe in his commentaries, that the enterprises which he hazarded most hotly, according to the sodaine occasion offered, did better prosper with him, then those which by good aduise he had determined of. Furthermore, when he sayd that he was better borne vnto fortune, then to the warres: it seemeth that he confessed all his prosperity came rather by fortune, then by his worthinesse. And to conclude, it appeareth that he did wholly submit him selfe vnto fortune, acknowledging that he did altogether depend vpon her: considering that he did attribute it to the speciall grace and fauor of the goddes, that he neuer disagreed with Metellus his father in law, who was a man of like dignitie and authoritie as him selfe was. For where it was thought he would haue bene a greater hinderer of his doings, he found him verie courteous and gentle in his behalfe, in all that they had to deale in together, by reason of the societie of their office. And furthermore, in his commentaries which he dedicated vnto Lucillus, he counselled him to thincke nothing more certaine and assured, then that which the goddes should reueale vnto him, and commaunde him in his nightes dreame. He wryteth also that when he was sent with an army vnto the warres of the confederates, the earth sodainly opened about LAVRINA, out of the which immediately came a maruelous bright flame of fire that ascended vp to the element. The wise men being asked their opinions about the same, made aunswere: that a very honest, and also a maruelous fayer man of complexion taking soueraine authoritie in his handes, should pacifie all tumultes and fedition which were at that time in ROME. Whereupon Sylla sayd it was him selfe whom the goddes ment, because that amongst other things he had that singular gift of beawty, that his heare was yellow as golde: and he was not ashamed to name him selfe an honest man, after he had wonne so many notable great victories. Thus haue we sufficiently spoken of the trust he had in the fauor of the goddes. And furthermore, he seemed to be very contrary in his manners, and vnlike to him selfe. For if he tooke away much in one place, he gaue as much more also in an other. Some he preferred without cause: and others he put downe without reason. He would be very gentle to them, of whom he would haue ought: and vnto those that fought of him, he would stand much upon his honor, and looke for great reuerence. Whereby men could hardly decerne his nature, whether pride or flattery did more abound in him. And as for the inequality he vsed in punishing of them that had offended him: sometimes he hanged vp men for very small and light causes: Some other times againe to the contrary, he patiently aboade the most grieuous offences in the worlde: and lightly pardoned and forgave such fautes as were in no wise to be forgiven. And afterwarde againe would punish right small crimes, with murders, effusion of blood, and confiscation of goodes. This iudgement may be geuen of him: that by nature he had a malicious and a reuenging minde: yet notwithstanding he qualified that naturall bitternes with reason, geuing place to necessity, and his benefit. For in this warre of the confederates, his souldiers slue Albinus one of his Lieutenantes, beating him to death with staues and stones, being a man of good quality, and one that had bene Prætor. This great offence he passed ouer with silence, vnto no manner of punishment, and turned it to a boast in the end, saying, that his men were the more obedient and diligent in any peece of service that was to be done, and that he made them amendefaulkes by worthy service. And furthermore, he did not regard them that did reprove him but hauinge determined with him selfe to destroy Marinus, and to procure that he might be chosen generall in the warres against king Mithridates, because that this warre of the confederates was now ended: for this cause he flattered & carried fauor with his souldiers that folued vnder him. At his returne to Rome from these warres of the confederates, he was chosen Consull with Q. Pompeius, being then fifty yeare olde, and married with Cecilia a noble Ladie, and Metellus daughter, who was then chiefe bishoppe of Rome, for which marriage the common people sang songes and ballades vp and downe Rome against him: and many of the noble men enuied him for it, thinking him unworthy of so noble a Ladie, whom they thought worthy to be Consull, as Titus Lucretius sayth. Now she was not his only wife, for he had a young wife before called Ilia, by whom he had a daughter. After her he married Aelia, then a third called Celia, whom he put away because she brought him no children. But notwithstanding he went honorably away from him with very good wordes of her, besides many other good ly riche giftes he gaue her: howbeit shortly after he married Metella, which made the world suspect that Celia was put away for her naughtines. Howsoeuer it was, Sylla did euer honor and loue Metella: in somuch as the people of Rome afterwards making feare, that they that were banished for Marinus faction might be called home againe: and being denied, and refused by Sylla, they cried out with open voyce for Metella, praying her to helpe them to obtaine their request. And it seemeth also that when he had taken the city of Athens, he delt more cruelly with them, because that some of them had scoffed at Metella from the walles: howbeit that was afterwards. So Sylla making his reckening at that time that the Consullshippe was small matter, in comparison of that which he looked for in time to come: was maruelous desirous to go against Mithridates. But therein Marinus also, of a mad furious ambition and euerousnes of glory stoodde against him, and fied to goe that iorney in like manner, being subiect to those passions, which neuer waxe olde, as we may dayly see by experience. For being now a heavy man, sickly of body, and broken in seruice abroad in the warres, from the which he came but newly home, and brusd moreouer with age: did notwithstanding yet aspire to haue the charge of the warres so farre of beyond the seas. Wherefore, to obtaine his purpose, whilest Sylla was gone a litle vnto the campe to geue order for certaine things that were to be done, he remaining in the city, did practise this pestilent mortall sedition, which alone did more hurte vnto the city of Rome, then all the enemies that Rome euer had: the which the goddess them selues had foreshewed by many signes and tokens. For fire tooke of it selfe in the statues of the ensignes, which they had much a doe to quenche. Three rauens brought their young ones into the high way, and did eate them vp in the sight of many people, and afterwardes caried the garbage they left of them into their neastes. Rats also hauing gnawen some iuells of golde in a church, the sextens setting a trappe for them, a rat was taken full of young, and kended five young rats in the trappe, of the which he ate vp three. But more yet, on a fayer bright day whē there was no clowde seene in the element at all, men heard such a sharp sound of a trompet, that they were almost all out of their wittes, for feare of so great a noise.

Whereuppon the wife men and soothsayers of Thyscan being asked their opinions, tolde them: that this so strange and wonderfull signe did pronounce the chaunge of the worlde, and the departure out of this into another life. For they holde opinion, that there should be eight worldes, all contrary one vnto another, in manners and facions of life: vnto every one of the which sayd they, God hath determined a certaine time of continuance. Howbeit they all came to ende their course within the space of the reuolution of the great yeare: and that when the one is ended, and the other ready to begin, there are seene such wonderfull strange signes on the earth, or in the element. And such as haue studied that science, doe certainly know, as soone as men be borne, which are meere contrary vnto the first in their liues & ma-ners, and which are either more or lesse acceptable vnto the goddes, then those which liued in former age. For they say, that amongst great chaunges and alterations which are done in those places from one age vnto another, the science of diuination, and foretelling of things to come doth grow in reputation, and meeteth in their predictions, when it pleaseth God to send

A fearefull certaine and manifest signes, to knowe and foretell things to come. And in this world is full in a manner right groweth contempt, and loseth her reputation, for that it is very rich, and faith to meete with the most parte of her predictions, because the rich bill oblique meares, and all her instruments defaced, to knowe what should come. And these be the signes which the wildest soothsayers of Thyscan reported abroad, & they specially, who learned to haue some finger speculation aboute others. But as the Senate were talking with the soothsayers of these wonders, being assembled together within the temple of the goddesse Minerva, a sparrow came flying into the church in sight of them all, and caried a grasshopper in her bill, and parted it in the midst, and left one parte within the temple, and caried the other away with her. Whereupon the wife men and interpreters of such wonders, said, that they doubted a commotion and rising of the dontry men against the commons of the cite, because the common people of the cite doe crye out continually like grasshoppers, and the husbandmen doe keepe them selues vpon their landes in the contrary. Thus Marinus grew great and very familiar, with Salpurius, one of the Tribunes of the people; who in all kindes of wis-kednes and mischiefe that a man can reckon, would geue place to no living creature: so that a man neede not to seeke or demand any where for a worse then he, but the question is rather wherein he him selfe was not the worse of all others. For he was full replet with all kindes of covely, avarice, and rascallnesse, and charcolde extremely, as he cared not what villany and wick-kednes he openly committed, so that the same might turne to his profit. For he had let up a stall in the open market place, where he solde freedome; making slaves and strangers desirous of Rome for their money: and for that purpose he entertained a gard of three thousand about him, besides a band of young gentlemen of the order of knights that attended alwayes upon his person ready at commaundement, whome he called the garde against the Senate, that he might not let him selfe hauing passed a lawe by the voyce of the people, that no Senator should borrow money, above two thousand Drachmas: it was founde that at the hower of his death, he dyed three millions of Drachmas in debt. This man now like a furious raging beast, being left by Marinus amongst the people, turned all things topsie turuey, by force of arms and maine strength. He made also many wicked lawes to passe by voyce of the people, and amongst others, that one specially, whereby he gaue Marinus commission to make warres against king Mithridates. For which extreme oppressions and dealings of Sulpitius, the two Consuls (Sylla and Quintus Pompeius) left off to heare publike causes, and ceased the common sentence of law and iustice. And as they were one day occupied about the adiournement of the law in an open assembly in the market place, before the temple of Castor and Pollux: Sulpitius the Tribune came vpon them with his souldiers, and slue many people, and amongst others the Consull Pompeius by his sonne, and the father him selfe being Consull, had much a doe to save his life by flying. And Sylla the other Consull, was also pursued euen into Marinus house, where he was compelled to promise before his departure, presently to goe and reuoke that adiournment of the law, which he had before commaunded. Thus Sulpitius hauing depeined Pompeius of his Consullshippe, did not depose Sylla, but only tooke from him the charge he had geuen him to make warres against Mithridates, and transferred that vnto Marinus. And sending collons to the city of Nock to receiue the army that lay there, and to bring the same vnto Marinus, Sylla prevented them, and fled to the campe before them; and tolde the souldiers all what had passed, as it was in deede: who when they heard it, fell all to a tumult, and slue Marinus collons with stones. Marinus on the other side put all Sylla's friends to death at Rome, and tooke the spoyle of the goddes and houses: so was there nothing else but flying from the campe towards, and from Rome to the campe against. The Senate were in manner beside them, sel-ues not being able to gouerne as they would, but driuen to obey Marinus and Sulpitius commaundements. Who being aduertised that Sylla was coming towards Rome, as a iust straight vnto the city, these two Prayers spake a litle to holdly vnto Sylla: whereupon the souldiers fell to a tumult in such sort, that they stood indifferēt whether to kill him presently in the field or no, howbeit they brake their axes and bandells of rodde which were caried before them, and made their purple robes wherein they were apparelled as magistrates for them, and sent them home thus shamefully handled and intimated. Vpon their returne now to Rome their sadde silence only, and them selues so stripped besides, of all their markes and Prætoriall dignitie, made all men then to iudge that they brought no other newes; but as were the worst that possibly could be: and that there was no way then left to pacifie this condition, which was now altogether vncurable. Wherefore Marius and his followers began to make them selues strong by force: and Sylla, with his companion Q. Pompeius, departed in meane time from the city of NOLE, and brought six entiere legions on with him; who did not other thing but to make hast to march to ROME ward. Howbeit Sylla stood in doubt with him selfe what to do, thinking of the great danger that might follow. Vntill such time as his soothsayer Posthumius hauing considered the signes & tokens of the sacrifices, which Sylla had made vpon this determination, gaue him both his handes, and bad him binde them hard, and shut him vp fast, untill the day of battell should be past: saying, that he was cōtented to his death, if he had not good successe, and that out of hande, to his great honor. And it is sayd also, that the same night there appeared vnto Sylla in a dreame, the goddesse Bellona, whome the *ROMAINE*s do greatly honor, following therein the CAPPADOCIANS: and I knowe not whether it be the moone, Minerva, or Enyo the goddesse of battells. So he thought, that comming to him did put lightning into his hande, commanding him that he should light vpon his enemies, naming then one after another by their proper names: and that they being striken with his lightning, fell downe dead before him, and no man knew what became of them. This vision encouraged Sylla very much, and hauing reported the same to Pompeius his fellow Consul & companion, the next morning he marched with his army to ROME. When he was at PICUS, there came other Ambassadors vnto him, to pray him in the name of the Senate that he would not come to ROME in this heate and fury, declaring therewithall that the Senate would graunt him all things that should be meete and reasonable. When Sylla had heard the message, he answered them, that he would campe there: and so commaunded the marshalls to deuise the squadrons according to their maner. The Ambassadors beleuing that he would so haue done in deede, returned againe to ROME: howbeit their backs were sponer turned, but Sylla straight sent Lucius Bassulus, and Caius Manimius before to seale out the gates of ROME, and the walles which were on the side of mount Esquilin, and he him selfe also in person with all possible speede marched after them. Bassulus entered ROME, and waded the gate by force. But the common people vnarmed, got them vp straight to the toppe of the houses, and with ryles and stones stayed, and kept him, not onely from entering any further, but also draue him backe againe, euen to the very walles of the city. In this hurly burly sent Sylla him selfe to ROME, who seeing apparantly in what state things stood, cried out to his men, and bad them set fyre on the houses: and him selfe taking a torch light in his hand, showed them the way what they should doe, appoynting his archers and darters to wherle to flie their dartes, and other fiery instruments to the toppes of the houses. Herein he was not much overcome with vnreasonable choller, passion, and desire of reuenge. For, feeling that to plague his enemies, he tooke no regard to friends, to parentes, or confederates, neither had he yet any manner of remorse, or pity: such and so fiery was his anger then, that he put no kind of difference betwene those that had offended, and them that had done him no hurt at all: by this meanes was Marius driuen into the city, vnto the temple of the Earth, where he made open proclamation by sounde of trumpet, that he would make free all the slaues that would come to his parte. But forthwith came his enemies, set vpon him, and prest him so neere, that he was constrained vnto to flee and forsake the city. Then Sylla assembling the Senate, sent Marius, and certaine others, together with Sulpicius Tribune of the people: to be condemned to death. Sulpicius was betrayed by a slaue of his owne, whom Sylla made free according to his promise past by publike edict: but when he had made him free, he caused him to be thrown downe headlong from the rocke Tarpeian. And nor contented with this, he proclaimed by promise a great summe of money to him that would kill Marius: A very ingrate and thankfull parte, consideringe that Marius not many dayes before hauinge Sylla in his owne house, in his handes and custody, deliuered him from perill, and set him in liberty. Which at that time he had not done, but had suffered Sulpicius to haue slaine him: him selfe had beene

A foueraine Lord of the whole without all contradiction, and might haue ruled all things at his owne will and pleasure. But Sylla shortly after vpon the like aduantage, vied no such manner of requital or gratuite towards him, which bred a secret misliking amongst the Senate: howbeit the common people made open shewe of the euill will they bare vnto Sylla, by reiecting one Nonius his newiue, and one Seruius, who vpon confidence of his fauor, presented them selues to sue for certaine offices. And besides the shame of this refusal, to spyie him the more, they chose others in their steedes, whose honor and preferment they right well knew that Sylla would not onely mislike, but be much offended withall. Howbeit he wisely dissembling the matter, seemed to be very glad, saying, that by his meanes the people of ROME enjoyed a full & perfit liberty, that in such cases of election, they might freely do what they selues liked. And to mitigate somewhat the peoples euill will towards him he determined to chooſe Lucius Cinna Consul, who was of a contrary faction to him: hauing first bounde him by solemn othe and curse to fauor his doings & whole proceedings. Whereupon Cinna went vp to the Capitoll, and there holding a stone in his hand, did solemnly (weare and promise, that he would be *Sylla*s faithfull frende: beleeching the goddes if he did the contrary, that he might be thrown out of ROME, euen as he threw that stone out of his hand: and with those words, threw it to the ground before many people. But notwithstanding all these curses, Cinna was no sooner entred into his Consulshippe, but presently he beganne to chaunge and alter all. For amongst other things, he would needes haue Sylla acculed: and procured Verгинius, one of the Tribunes of the people, to be his accuser. But Sylla left him with his iudges, & went to make warres against Mithridates. And it is said, that about the time that Sylla tooke shippe, and departed out of ITALIE: there fortunied many tokens and warnings of the goddes vnto kinge Mithridates, who was at that present in the city of PERGAMVM. As amongst others, that the PARGAMENTIANS to honor Mithridates withall, hauing made an image of victory, carrying a garland of triumphe in her hand, which was let downe from aloft with engines: so soone as he was ready to put the garland vpon his head, the image brake, and the crowne fell to the ground in the middelt of the Theater, and burst all to peeces. Whereby all the people that were present, were striken with a maruelous feare, and Mithridates him selfe beganne to mislike this euill lucke: although all things at that time fell out more fortunately, then he looked for. For he had taken ASIA from the *ROMAINE*s, and BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA, from the kinges which he had driuen out: and at that time remained in the city of PERGAMVM, to deuise the riches and great territories among his frendes. As touching his sonnes: the eldest was in the realme of PONTVS, and of BOSPHORVS, which he inherited from his predecessors, euen vnto the desertes beyonde the mariffes of Maotides, without trouble or molestation of any man. The other also, Ariarathes, was with a great army, in conquering of THRACIA and MACEDON. His Captaines and Lieutenauntes moreover, did many notable conquestes in diuers places, with a great power: amongst the which, Archelaus being Lord and master of all the sea, for the great number of shippes he had, conquered the Iles CYCLADES, and all those beyonde the hed of Malea, and specially amongst others the Ile of EVBOA. And beginning at the city of ATHENS, had made all the nations of GREECE to rebell, euen vnto THESSALIE. Easing that he receiued some losse by the city of CHERONEA. Where Brutius Sura, one of the Lieutenauntes of Sentius gouernor of MACEDON (a man of great wisdom and valliantnes) came against him, and stayed him for goinge any further, ouerrunning the whole contrie of BORTHIA, like a furious raging riuier. And setting vpon Archelaus by the city of CHERONEA, ouerthrowe him in three feuerall battells: repulled, and inforced him to take the seaes againe. But as Brutius was following him in chase, Lucius Lucullus sent him commaundement to geue place vnto Sylla, to follow those warres against Mithridates, according to the charge and commission in that behalfe geuen him. Whereupon Brutius Sura went out of the contrie of BORTHIA, and returned towards his generall Sentius: notwithstanding his affaires prospered better then he could haue wished, and that all GREECE were very willing to renouel for the reputation of his wisdom and goodnes. Howbeit the things that we before haue spoken of, were the most notable matters that Brutius did in those partes. Sylla now vpon his annuall, recouered immediatly all the other cities of GREECE: who being aduertised of his comming, sent presently to pray him to come to their aide, the city of ATHENS only excepted, which was compelled by the tyrant Aristion, to take parte with Mithridates. Sylla thereupon with all his power went thither, besieged the haue of Piræa rounde, causing it to be battered and assailed on euery side, with all sortes of engines and instrumentes of batterie: whereas if he could haue had patience but a litle longer, he might haue had the high towne by famine, without putting him selfe in any manner of daunger, the same being brought to such extreme dearth and scarcity of all kinde of vitells. But the hast that he made to returne againe to ROME; for feare of the new change which he heard of daily from thence, compelled him to hazard this warre in that sorte with great danger, many battells, and infinite charge: considering also, that besides all other prouision and furniture, he had twenty thousand mules and mules laboring dayly to furnishe his engines of batterie. And when all other woode fayled him, because his engines were oftentimes marred after they were made, some breaking of them selues by reason of their weight, others consumed with fire thrown from the enemies: at the length he fell to the holy wood, and cut downe the trees of the Academia, being better stored and furnished, the any other parke of pleasure in all the suburbs of the city, & feld downe also the wood of the parke Lycæum. And standing in neede of a great summe of money to entertaine this warres withall, he delt alth with the holiest temples of all GREECE, causing the to bring him from the temples of EPIDAVRUM and OLYMPVS, all the richest and most precious iuels they had. He wrote moreover vnto the counsell of the AMPHICTYONS holden in the city of DELPHES, to bring him the ready money they had in the temple of Apollo, for that it should be kept in better safety with him, the if it still remained there: promising besides, that if he should by occasion be compelled to vſe it, he would restore as much againe vnto them: and for this purpose he sent Caphis PHOCIAN, one of his very friends & familiars, and commaunded him to wey all that he tooke. So Caphis went vnto DELPHES: but when he came thither, being afraid to touch the holy things, in presence of the counsell of the AMPHICTYONS, he wept, that the teares ran downe by his cheekes, as a man compelled to doe such an act against his will. And when some that were present told Caphis that they heard the found of Apoloes citherne in the temple: whether he beleued it was fo in dede, or because he would put this superstitious feare into Syllas head, he wrote to him of it. But Sylla mocking him, sent him word, that he marvelled he could not consider, that fingring and playing of the citherne, were tokens rather of ioye then of anger: and therefore that he should not faile to procede further, and bring him those things which he commaunded, for that (said he) Apollo did geue them him. Now for the other iuels of the temple of Apollo, the common people knew not that they were sent vnto Sylla: but the siluer tonne, which only was that that remained of the offerings of the kings, the AMPHICTYONS were faine to breake that in peces, because it was so great & masse, that the beastes of draught could not draw it whole as it was. This act made them to remember the other auncient ROMANE Capitaines, as Flaminius, Manius Acilius, and Paulus AEmilius: of the which, the one hauing driuen king Antiochus out of GREECE, and the rest also hauing ouerthrowen the kings of MACEDON, they neuer once touched the gold and siluer of the temples of GREECE: but contrarily sent their offerings thither, and had them all in great honor and reuerence. But as to them, they were all Capitaines lawfully chosen and sent to their charges: their souldiers wel trained, & obedient at commaundement, void of rebellion, or any manner of mutiny. And for them selues, were kings in greatnes of corage and magnanimity of minde: but in expence of their persones, very spare and scant, without any lauish, but needfull and necessary, proportioned by reason, and thinking more shame to flatter their souldiers, then feare their enemies. Now the Capitaines contrarily in Syllas time, fought not their preferment in the common wealth by vertue, but by force, and hauing greater warres one with an other, then with straungers their enemies: were compelled to flatter their souldiers whom they should commaund, and to buy their paines & seruice, feeding them still with large & great expences, to please & content them. Wherein they did not consider, that they brought their contry into bondage, & made themselves slaues of the vilest people of the world, whiles that in the meane time they sought to commaund by all meanes possible those, which in many respects were farre better then them selues. And this was the cause that both draue Marinus out of ROME, & made him also to returne againe against Sylla. This selfe same cause made Cinna to kill Octavius, and Fir-

Aristion to stay Flaminius: of which euills, Sylla was the very first and only author, spending out of all reason, and geuing the souldiers largely that serued vnder him, to winne their good willes the more, and thereby also to allure them. By reason whereof, Sylla had neede of mountaines of money, and specially at the siege where he was: both to make straungers traytors, and besides, to furnishe and satisfie his owne dissolute souldiers. For he had such an earnest desire to take the city of ATHENS, that he could not possibly be dissuaded from it. And either it was of a certain vaine ambition he had to fight against the auncient reputation of that city, being then but a shadow to that it had bene: or els of a very anger, for the mockes & gibes which the tyrant Aristion gaue in his speches from the wals, against him & Metella, to spite him the more withall. This tyrant Aristion was full of all cruelty & wickednes, hauing taken vp all the worst qualities and greatest imperfections of king Mithridates, & heaped them wholly together in him selfe: by reason whereof the poore city of ATHENS which had escaped from so many warres, tyrannies, & ciuill dissentions vntil that present time, was by him, as by an incurable disease, brought vnto all extremity. For a bushell of wheate was worth a thousand Drachmas, and men were driuen for famine to eate feustfew that grew about the castell: & they caused old shoes & old oyle pots to be sodden, to deliuer some laior vnto that they did eate, whilst the tyrant himselfe did nothing all day long but cramme in meate, & drinke dronke, daunse, maske, & scotte & bowe at the enemies, suffering the holy lampe of Minerua in the meane season to go out for lacke of oyle. And when the Nunne of the same temple sent vnto him for a quarter of a bushell of wheate, he sent her a quarter of a bushell of pepper. And when the counsellors of the city, the priestes & religious came to the castell, holding up their hands, & beseeching him to take some pity of the city, & fall to composition with Sylla: he made the to be driuen away, & scattered with slings. In the end, very late, & yet with great ado, he sent two or three of his quaffing copanions vnto Sylla, who when they were come to him, made no demand of composition for the towne, but began to praise & magnifie the dedes of Theseus, of Euamolpus, & of the ATHENIANS against the MEDS. Whereupon Sylla made them this aunswere. My goodly orators, returne you againe with all your rhetoricke: for the ROMAINES sent me not hither to learne nor to study, but to ouercome & conquer those that are rebelled against them. In the meane time there were certaine spies in the city that heard old men talking together in a place called Ceramicus, blaming the tyrant because he kept no better watch on that side of the wal that was directly ouer against the Hepstachalon, which was the only place where the enemies might easilist get vp vpon the wals. Those spies went straight vnto Sylla, & told him what they had heard the old men say. Sylla traacted no time, but came to the place in the night to see it: & perceiving that it was to be taken, set the matter straight abroach. And him selfe wrytes in his commentaries, that the first man that scaled the wals, was Marcus Teinus: who finding a souldier ready to resist him, gaue him such a fore blow with his sword vpon his head peece, that his sword brake in two, and yet notwithstanding that he saw him selfe naked & deformed of a sword, did not for all that giue back, but stoode fill to it, & kept the place so long, till through him the city was take, & all upon the talke of these old men. So Sylla caused the wall to be pulled downe betwene the haue of Piræa, & the holy haue: & hauing before made the breach very plaine, entered into the city about midnight with a wonderfull fearefull order, making a maruelous noise with a number of hornes, & sounding of trumpets, & all his army with him in order of battel, crying, to the sack, to the sack, kill, kill. For he had geuen them the towne in spoyle, and to put all to the sword. The souldiers therefore ran through the streetes with their swords drawn, making an vncredible slaughter: so that to this daye they be not acknowen, nor doe not declare what number of persons were slaine, but to shew the greatnes of the murder that there was committed, the place is yet extant to be seene where the blood ranne. For besides them that were slaine through all the city, the blood of them only that were slaine in the market stede, did wet all the ground of Ceramicus, euen vnto the very place called Dipylon: and some say also, that it ranne by the gates into the suburbs of the citie. But if the multitude of the people that were slaine in this sorte were great, much more (or so many at the least) it is sayd were those that slue the selues, for the sorrow & compassion they had to see their cotry in such pitiful state, supposing certainly that their city was now come to vtter ruine & destruction. This opiniõ made the noblest men of the city to dispaire of their owne safety, & feared to lue any longer: because they thought they should finde no mercy, no moderacion of cruelty in Sylla. Notwithstanding, partly at the request of Midias and Calliphon, who were banished men from Athenes, and fell at Sylla's feet vpon their knees: and partly also at the requests of the Romaine Senators that were in his campe, who prayed him to pardon the body of the city, and the rather for that he had already quenched the thirst of his rauening mind sufficiently well, after that he had somewhat sayd in praise of the auncient Athenians, he concluded in the end, to geue the greater number vnto the smaller, and the liuing to the dead. Sylla wryteth him selfe in his commentaries, that he tooke the city of Athenes on the very selfe day of the calendes of march, which commeth to agree with the first day of the moneth that we call Antheſterion, on the which day by chance many things are done at Athenes in memory of Noes flood, and of the vniuersall destruction of the whole world that was in olde time by rage of waters, falling out euen in that very moneth. When the city was thus taken, the tyrant Aristion fled into the castell, where he was besieged by Curio, whome Sylla left there of purpose about that matter. And after he had a great time kept it, at the last, constrained thereunto for lacke of water, yielded. The castell was no sooner gauen vp, but immediately by goddes providence, the weather miraculously altered. For the selfe same day, and at the very selfe instant that Curio caried the tyrant Aristion out of the castell: the element being very fayer and clere, the clowdes sodainly gathered together, & there fell such a maruelous glut of raine, that all the castell was full of water. Shortly after also, Sylla hauing gotten the haven of Piræa, burnt the greatest parte of the buildings: amongst others was the arsenal and armory, which Philo in olde time had caused to be built, being of a strange and wonderfull edifice. In the meane time, Taxilles, one of the Lieutenants of king Mithridates, comming from Thracia and Macedon, with a hundred thousand footemen, tenne thousand horsemen, and foure score and tenne thousand carts of warre all armed with sythes: sent vnto Archelaus to ioyne with him, lying yet at anker in the haven of Munychia, and not willing to leaue the sea, nor come to fight with the Romaines, but seeking rather to draw these warres out in length, and to cut of all vittells from his enemies. Sylla vnderstanding this drift better then him selfe, departed out of the contry of Attica (a very barren soyle, and in deede not able to keepe him in time of peace) and went into Boeotia: wherein most men thought he committed great error, to leaue Attica, which is a very hard contry for horsemen, and to go into Boeotia, a plaine champion: and so much the rather, because he knew well enough that the chiefest strength of the barbarous people consisted in their horsemen, and their armed cartes with sythes. But to auoyd famine, and lacke of vittells as we haue sayd, he was compelled to seeke battell. Furthermore, he had an other cause also that made him afraied, and compelled him to go: and that was Hortensius, a famous Captaine, and very valiant also, who brought him aide out of Thessalie, and the barbarous people lay in waite for him in his way, in the straight of Thermopyles. And these were the causes that made Sylla take his way into Boeotia. But in the meane time, Caphis that was our contry man, deceiuing the barbarous people, guided Hortensius an other way by mount Parnassus, and brought him vnder the city of Tithora, which was not then so great a city as nowe at this present it is, but was a castell only, situated vpon the point of a rocke, hewen all about: whether the Phocians in olde time flying king Xerxes comming vpon them, retyred them selues for their safety. Hortensius lodged there, and there did also both defend and repulse his enemies, so long as day light lasted: and when the night came on, got downe through very hard stony wayes, vnto the city of Patronide, where he ioynd with Sylla, who came to meete him with all his power. Thus being ioynd together, they camped vpon a hill that standeth about the middle of the plaine of Elatea: the soyle was very good, and well replenished with great store of trees, and water, at the foote of the same. The hill is called Philobæotus, the nature & situation whereof, Sylla doth maruelously commend. When they were camped, they seemed but a handfull in the eye of their enemies: and no more were they in deede, for they had not about fiftene hundred horse, and lesse then fiftene thousand footemen. Whereupon the other Capitaines their enemies, against Archelaus minde, brought out their bandes into the field, and filled all the valley and plaine thereabouts with horsemen, with cartes, with shieldes and targettes, so that the ayer was euen cut a sunder as it were with the violence of the noyle & cries of so many sundry nations, which altogether did put them selues in battell ray. The sumptuousness of their furniture moreouer, was not altogether superfluous and vnprofitable, but caused great feare the beholders. For the glittering of their harness, so richly trimmed and set forth with gold and siluer, the cullers of their arming coates vpon their curaces, after the fashion of the Mædes and Scythians, mingled with the bright glittering Steele and shining copper, gaue such a show as they went and remoued to and fro, that made a light as clere as if all had bene on a very fire, a fearefull thing to looke upon. In somuch as the Romaines durst not so much as once goe out of the trenches of their campe, nor Sylla with all his perswasion coulde take away this great conceiued feare from them: wherefore, (and because also he would not compel them to go forth in this feare) he was driuen not to stirre, but close to abide, (though it grieved him greatly to see the barbarous people so proudly and villanously laugh him and his men to scorne. Howbeit the disdain & scoffing of his enemies, stoode him to great good purpose afterwards. For they making now none account of him, kept small watch & ward, strayed vp and downe disorderly besides, though otherwise they were not very obedient vnto their Capitaines, being many commanders, and fewe good followers: by reason whereof, a small number kept in the campe, and all the rest of the great multitude intified with the gaine they made by spoyleing and sacking of townes thereabouts, disperfed them selues many dayes iorney from their campe. For it is sayd, that at that very time they destroyed the city of Paropæia, sacked the city of Lebadia, and spoyled the temple without commandement or licence of any of all their Capitaines to doe it. In the meane while, Sylla seeing so many cities and townes spoyled and destroyed, tooke it both grieuously, and also angrily: howbeit he suffered not his men to lie idly, but kept them in labor, to turne the course of the riuer of Cephissus, and to cast great trenches, not suffering any man to take ease or rest, but constantly with great severity punished such as went faintly and lazely to worke, to the end that being wearied with the paine they tooke after so many workes, they would rather proue to hazard battell, as it fell out in deede. For the third day after they had begonne thus to labor, as Sylla passed by them, they cried out vnto him to leade them against their enemies. But his answer was vnto them againe: that those were but cries of men wearied rather with labor, then desirous to fight. Notwithstanding, if it be so in deede, and that you haue so good a will to fightras you make shewe of: then I will sayd he, that you arme your selues presently, and get you to yonder place, (showing them therewithall where the castell of the Paropæians stoode in olde time, which then (the city being destroyed) was no more but the toppes of a stony mountaine cut all about, and seuered from the mount of Edylium by the breadth of the riuer of Asius that runneth betwixt, and which at the very foote of the same mountaine falleth into the riuer of Cephissus, and both these riuers running in one, carying a swift streame, doe make the knappe of the sayd hill very strong of situation to lodge a campe vpon. And therefore Sylla seeing the soldiers of his enemies campe, marching with their copper targets to take vp that place to lodge in: to preuent them, and to get it before them (as in deede he did) he marched thither in all hast possible, & got it euen with the earnest good will of all his soldiers. Archelaus being so repulsed from thence, turned his way towards the city of Chæroneæ. Whereupon certaine of the Chæroneans that were in Sylla's campe, besought him that he would not forsake their city, and leaue it to their enemy. Sylla desiring to gratifie them therein, sent one of his Colonells Gabinus with a legion, and therewithall gaue the Chæroneans leaue to go thither, who did what they could possible to get into their city before Gabinus: but that they could not, such was the diligence and honesty of the man, as he seemed more desirous of their safety, then they were them selues. Neuerthelesse, Sylla doth not call the Colonell that was sent thither Gabinus, but Hircius. And thus was our city of Chæroneæ preferred from the danger it stoode in at that time. In the meane time came very good newes to the Romaines, both of oracles and prophecies, which promised them victory from the temple of Lebadia, and the caue of Troponius: of which prophecies, those contry men make great mencion. But Sylla in his tenth booke of his commentaries writeth that Quintus Titius, a man of quality & name amongst them that trafficked into the contry of Chæroneæ, came vnto him after he had wonne the battell of Chæroneæ, to sell him that Troponius gaue him to understand, that shortly after he should haue a second battell, and that he should yet againe haue an other victory in the same place. After him an other mā of warre called Salvatoris told him also what successe he should haue in the warres of ITALIE, saying, that he knew it by reuelation: and both these men agreed in the manner of the reuelation. For they sayd, that they had seene a god, in maiesty, beawty, and greatnes, like vnto the image of Impiter Olympi. Sylla hauinge passed the riuier of Aflus, went to lodge at the foote of mount Edylum, hard by Archelaus, who had placed and fortified his campe betweene the two mountaines of Acontium, and of Edylum, ioyninge to the city of the ASIANES. The place where Archelaus camped, beareth his owne name Archelaus vnto this day. One day after Sylla had chaunged his lodging, he left Murana in his campe with a legion, and two cohorts, to keepe the enemies still occupied that were in great trouble, and he him selfe in the meane time went and sacrificed by the riuier of Cephissus. His sacrifice being ended, he marched towards the city of CHERONEA, to take the force he had there vnder Gabinus, & to know the mountaine also called Thurium, which the enemies had taken. It is a knappe of a mountaine very steepe and sharpe of all sides, with a narrowe point like a pine apple, by reason whereof we doe call it Orthopagum. At the foote of the same runneth the riuier called Morian, and there is also the temple of Apollio furnished Thurians: and they say that this surname of Thurians was geuen vnto him of the name of Thuros, who was mother of Cheron, the founder and builder of the city of CHERONEA. Other thinke, that the cow which was geuen to Cadmus for a guide, came to him in that place: which hath euer since kept the name, for that the PHENICIANS call a cow, Thor. Now when Sylla came neere vnto CHERONEA, the Colonell Gabinus whome he had sent thither with a garison to defend the same, went to meete him with his men very well armed, wearing a lawrell garland: and Sylla after he had saluted him, and his fouldiers, made an oration vnto them, exhorting them to do their duty in fighting. And as he was in his oration, there came two citizens of CHERONEA to him, one, his name was Omoloichus, and the other Anaximachus, who promised him to driue the enemies from mount Thurium which they had taken, if he would but geue the some small number of fouldiers. For there was a litle path way, which the barbarous people mistrusted not, beginning at a place called Petrochus, hard by the temple of the Muser, by the which they might easily go to the toppe of this mountaine Thurium: so that following that pathe, it would bring them ouer the barbarous peoples heads, and they might easily kill them with stones, or at the least they should driue them mawgre their heads, downe into the valley. Gabinus assuring Sylla that they were both very valliant men, and such as he might boldly trust vnto, Sylla gaue them men, and commaunded them to execute their enterprise: and he him selfe in the meane season went and set his men in order of battell in the plaine, deuiding his horsemen on the wings, placed him selfe in the right wing, appointinge the left vnto Murana. Galba & Hortensius his Lieutenantes, were placed in the tayle with certaine bandes of the reregard which they kept vpon the hils, to watch and let that the enemies should not inclose them behinde: because they perceived a farre of that the enemies put forth a great number of horsemen and footemen light armed in the wings, to tend that the points of their battell might the more easily bowe and enlarge them selues, to compasse in the ROMAINES on the backe side. Now in the meane time, these two CHERONEANS whome Sylla had sent vnder Hircius their Captaine, hauing compassed about the mountaine Thurium, before the enemies were aware of them: sodainly came to fiew them selues vpon the toppe of the mountaine, which did so feare the barbarous people, that they began immediately to stie, one of them for the most parte killing an other. There was no resistance, but flying downe the mountaine, fell upon the pointes of their owne partisans and pykes, and one of them thrusting in an others necke, tombléd hedlong downe the mountaine together, hauing their enemies besides on their backes, which draue them from the hill, and strake them behinde where they lay open vnto them: so as they were slaine a three thousande of them about this mountaine Thurium. And as for them that fought to saue them selues by flight, Murana that was already set in battell ray, met with some, cut them off by the way, and slue them downe right. The other fled directly to their campe, and came in great companies, thrusting into the battell of their footemen, put the most parte of them quite out of order, & maruelously troubled their

A their Capitaines before they could set them againe in order: which was one of the chiefeft causes of their ouerthrowe. For Sylla went and gaue a charge vpon them in this trouble and disorder, and had quickly wonne the ground that was betweene both armies, whereby he tooke away the force of all their armed cartes with sythes, which are then of greatest force, when they haue the longest course, to geue them a swift and violent stroke in their chafe: whereas when their course is but short, the blow is so much the weaker, and of lesse strength, euen as arrows are, that a farre of enter not deepe into the thing they be shot at: as at that time it fell out with the barbarous people. For their first cartes set forth so faintly, and came on with so feeble a force, that the ROMAINES sent them backe, & easily repulled them, with great slaughter and clapping of handes one to an other, as they commonly vse in the ordinarie games of horse running at ROME. When they had thus repulled the cartes, the battell of Syllas footemen beganne to charge the barbarous people, who basing their pykes, stood close one to an other because they would not be taken: & the ROMAINES on thother side bestowed first their darts among them, and then sodainly drew out their swordes in the heate they were in, and put a side the enemies pykes, whereby they might come neerer to their bodies. There were fiftene thousande slaues in the fronte of the battell of the barbarous people, whom Antydates Lieutenaut had made free by open proclamation, and had deuied them by bandes amongst the other footemen. By occasion whereof there was a ROMAINE Centurion, spake pleasauntly at that time, saying, that he neuer saw slaues before haue liberty to speake and do like free men, but only at Saturnes feastes. Neuer thelesse, they against the nature of slaues, were very valliant to abide the (hocke), and the ROMAINE footemen could not so readily breake nor enter into them, nor make them geue backe, because they stood very close one to an other, and their rankes were of such a length besides: vntill such time as the ROMAINES that were behinde the first rankes, did so pelt them with their slinges, hurling stones, bestowing their darts & arrows upon them, that in thend they compelled them all to turne their backes, and stie a maine. And when Archelaus did first thrust out the right wing of his army, supposing to enclose the ROMAINES behinde: Hortensius straight wayes caused the bands he had with him to run & charge vpon the flankes. Which Archelaus perceiving, made the horsemen he had about him turne their faces forthwith, which were in nūber aboue two thousand: inso much as Hortensius, being set apon with all his trowpe, was compelled to retyre by lide and lide towards the mountaine, perceiving him selfe farre from the battell of his footemen, and enuironed round about with his enemies. Sylla seeing that, being in the right wing of his battell, and hauing not yet fought, went straight to the rescue of Hortensius. But Archelaus coniecturing by the dust which the horses raised, what the matter was: left Hortensius there, and with speede returned againe towards the right wing of his enemies from whence Sylla was gone, hoping he had left it vnurnished of a sufficient Captaine to commaund them. Taxillus on thother side, caused his copper targets also to march against Murana: so as the noyle they made on both sides, caused the mountaines to ring againe, wherewithall Sylla stayed, standing in doubt which way to take. At the last he relolued, to returne to the place from whence he came, & sent Hortensius with foure ensignes to aide Murana: and him selfe with the fift in great speede, went towards the right wing of his army, the which was now already bickering, and ioynd with their enemies, fighting hand to hand with Archelaus. By reason whereof, when Sylla was comen with his aide, they did easily distresse them: and after they had broken their array, they chased them flying for life to the riuier, & vnto the mountaine Acontium. But Sylla notwithstanding forgate not Murana, but went againe to his reliefe: and finding that he on his side had also put the enemies to flight, followed with him the chafe of them that fled. There was a maruelous slaughter made in that field of the barbarous people, and many of them supposing to haue recovered their campe, were slaine by the way: so as of all that infinite multitude of fighting men, there escaped only tenne thousande, who saued them selues by flying vnto the city of CHALCIDE. Sylla for his parte wyreth, that he could make reckening of no more but fourteene of his fouldiers onely that were slaine, whereof there came two againe to him the same night. Whetefore in the markes of triumphe which he set vp for tokens of that victory, he caused to be wyrtten on the toppe thereof, Mars, victory, and Venus: signifying thereby, that he had overcome in these warres as much by good fortune, as by force, policie, or martiall discipline. These markes of triumphe were let vp for the battell which he wanne in the plaine field, in that place where Archelaus beganne to flie, euen vnto the riuer of Molus. And he set vp an other also in the topp of mount Thurius, where the barbarous people were set vpon behinde : and there is writen in Greeke letters, that the valliant deedes of Omolochus and Anaxidamus, gaue way to the winning of this victorie. Sylla for the ioy of this great vantage battell, caused musitions to play in the city of THEBES, where he builded a stage for all the musitions, neere vnto the fountaine OEdipus, and certaine noble GRECEIANS were appointed iudges of that musicke, whom he caused to be sent for out of other cities, because he mortally hated the THEBANS : in somuch as he tooke from them halfe their landes, which he consecrated vnto Apollon Pythias, and Iupiter Olympius, appointing that of the reuenue thereof, they should redeliuer and pay backe the money which he had taken and caried away from out of their temples. Sylla after this hauing intelligence that Flaccus, one of his enemies, was chosen Consull at ROME, and had passed the sea Ionium with an army, vnder pretext to make warre against king Mithridates, but in deede to make warre with him selfe: tooke his iorney towards THESSALIE to meete him. But when he was in the citie of MELITEA, there came newes to him out of all partes, that there was a new and second army of the kings arrived, no lesse then the first, the which spoyled and destroyed all the contry which he had left behinde him. For Dorylaeus, one of king Mithridates Lieutenantes, was arrived in the city of CHALCIDE with a great fleet of shippes, hauing brought thither with him foure score thousand fighting men, the best trained, the best armed and appointed souldiers, that were in all his kingdom of PONTVS in ASIA: and from thence went into BOEOTIA, had all that contry at commandement, and fought to fight with Sylla, notwithstanding that Archelaus alleaged many reasons to dissuade him from it: and furthermore, gaue it out in euery place, that so many thousandes of souldiers could not haue bene cast away in the first battell, without some notable reason. Whereupon Sylla returned with all possible speede, & made Dorylaeus know before many dayes passed ouer his head, that Archelaus was a wise man, and knew well enough the worthines and valliant corage of the ROMAINES. And Dorylaeus hauing had but a litle proofe only in certaine light skirmishes which he made against Sylla, about TILPHOSION in THESSALIE: him selfe was the first that could say then, it was not for them to hazarde battell, but rather to draw out the warres in length, and supplant the ROMAINES with charge & expence. And yet notwithstanding, the commodity of the great large plaine that lyeth all about ORCHOMENE, where they were encamped, gaue great encouragement to Archelaus, who iudged it a very fit place to geue battell in, specially because he was the stronger of horsemen in the field. For of all the plaines that are within the contry of BOEOTIA, the greatest & largest of them, is the plaine nere to the city of ORCHOMENE: which is altogether without trees, and runneth out in length vnto the marishes, where the riuer of Melas dispereth it selfe abroad. The head of the same riuer is not farre from the city of ORCHOMENE, & that riuer only of all other riuers in GREECE from the very head whence it cometh, is naugable: and hath besides an other singular property, that it riseth & welletth euen in the longest sommer dayes, as the riuer of Nilus doth, and bringeth forth the selfe same plantes and trees, sauing that they beare no frute, neither are they so great as those of Egypt. This riuer hath no longe course, because that the most parte of the water runneth into lakes and marishes, couered with brambles and briars, and there is but a very litle parte of it that falleth into the riuer of Cephissus, in the place where the reded grow that they make good flutes withal. When they were camped one nere to an other, Archelaus lay quietly and sturred not. But Sylla presently cast great trenches from one side to an other, to stoppe the way against their enemies, that they could not come into that great plaine where they might haue taken what ground they would for their men of armes, and haue driuen the ROMAINES into the marishes. The barbarous people not being able to endure that, so soone as their Capitaines had geuen them liberty, discharged with such a fury, that they did not only scatter them that wrought in Syllas trenches, but put the most parte of their gard also that stode in battell ray to defend them, in a maruelous feare, who also beganne to flie. Which Sylla perceiuing, lighted straight from his horse, and taking an ensigne in his hande, ran through the middell of his

MAINE souldiers, mine honor commaundeth me to dye here; and therefore I will not take you where you forsooke your Capitaine, remember that you minisiter it was to OLYMPIUS NAME: They were so ashamed at these wordes; that he made them wanne besides that there came two cohorts vnto him from the right wing of his battell, who vnder his leading gaue such a hotte charge vpon their enemies; that they fled forth with open fall: Thus done, Sylla con-gred with his men, and made them dine and therupon by and by sent him againe to the trenches to enclose his enemies campe, who then came out in better order then they did before.
There was Diogenes, Archelaus wiues sonne slaine, fighting valliantly before them all in the right wing of their battell. And the bowe men being pressed to come by the ROMAINES, and B their bowes would doe no good: toke their arrowes in their handes in stead of swordes, and strake their enemies with them to force them to geue backe, vntill such time as at the last they were all driuen into their campe, where they passed that night in great sorrow; as well for the losse of them that were slaine, as also for the number of those that were hurt. The next morning, Sylla leading his men againe towards the campe of his enemies, went on still continuing his trenches: & certaine of them being come out to skirmish with them, he set upon them so suddenly; that at the first charge he put them to flight. Thus broughe such a feare to all the whole campe of the enemies, that none man durst abide any longer: so as Sylla valliantly following on his victory, thrust in among them as they fled, and in thende tooke all together.
Straight way all the marishes were filled with blood; and the lake full of dead bodies: so that C vntill this present day they find there in that place many bowes of the barbarous people; mo-ny, peces of talles, and swordes drowned in the middle of the marishes, notwithstanding that it is well neere two hundred yeres agoe since this battell was stricken: And thus ended the warres about the cities of CHALCIDEA, and ORCHOMENE. Now the warres being past in this fore in GREECE, Cinna, and Carbo delt very cruelly and vnnaturally at ROME with the noble men and greatest persons: by reason whereof, many flying their tyranny, went to Syllas campe, as vnto the haue of their health and fulnes of felicity, so that in short time Sylla had an assembly of a ROMAINE Senate about him. Metella her selfe, his wife, hauing tolled away very hardly with her children, came to bring him newes that his houses in the citie and county both, were all burnt and destroyed by his enemies: praying him that he would go and help D them that yet remained at ROME. Sylla vpon hearing of these newes, felt in great perplexity.
For on the one side, it grieved him to see his contry so miserably afflicted; and on the other side he knew not well how he might go; leauing so great an enterpryse as that warre was; and specially against a king of such might and power as Mithridates (he would himselfe to be). And being in these dumps, there came one Archelaus a marchant to him, borne in the city of DUL-LYM, who brought him a secret message from thither. Archelaus, king Mithridates Lieutenant: the which pleased Sylla so well, that he desired that Archelaus & him selfe might meete and talke together. So at the length they met by the sea side, neere vnto the city of DULLYM; where there is a temple of Apollon. Archelaus beganne to enter the talke with him, declaring vnto E Sylla that he would wish him to leaue the conquest of ASIA; & of the realme of PONTVS; and to returne into his contry to the ciuill warres at ROME: and in doinge, the king would supply him, not onely with as much money, but with as many shippes and men, as he him selfe would desire. Sylla apon this motion told him againe: that he would wish him to forsake Mithridates seruice, and to make him selfe king, offering to proclaim him a friend and confederate of the ROMAINES, so that he would deliuer him all his manie which then he had in his bandes. Archelaus seemed much to abhorre to heare him speake of treason. But Sylla going on with his tale, replied againe vnto him: why Archelaus, sayd he, thou that art a CAPTIVE of a barbarous king, or his friend at the least: hast thou a good hart with thee, that for all the benefits I offer thee, thou wilt not once commit treason? And art thou indeede so bolde to speake to me of treason; which ain the ROMAINES a lesse man generally F and Sylla? As if thou wert not he, that at the battell of CHALCIDEA didst slay thy selfe by dying with a small number left thee of six score thousand fighting men, which thou before haddest in thy campe: and that hid thy selfe two dayes together in the marishes of ORCHOMENE, leaving the fieldes of Bosphorus with foule heapes of dead bodies, that no man could burye them. At this his reply, Archelaus altered his speech, and falling downe at Syllas feete, besought him to end this warre, and to make peace with Mithridates. Whereunto Sylla answered, that he was very well contented withall. And thereupon peace was concluded betwene them vnder conditions that Mithridates should departe from ASIA the lesse, and from BABYLONIA, that he should restore BITHYNIA vnto Nicomedes, and CAPPADOCIA vnto Ariobarzanes, that he should pay two thousand talents to the ROMAINES, & geue them thirty sorce and tenne galleies, with all their furniture. And upon this, Sylla would assuredly him the rest of his realme, and would cause him to be proclaimed a frende of the ROMAINES. These articles being past by agreement betwene them, Sylla taking his iorney through Thessaly, and Macedon into the contry of Hellaspont, carried Archelaus with him, whom he had notably intreated. For Archelaus falling dangerously sicke of a disease in the city of Larissa, he stayed there for him, and was very careful to recouer him, as if he had bene one of his chiefest Capitaines and companions. And this was the cause that made Archelaus to be the med for the battell of Cheronea, as if he had not faithfully fought it out, nor Sylla truly won it, but by treason. And againe, Archelaus was the more suspected, because Sylla redelivered Mithridates all his seruants and frends which he had prisoners, sauing the tyrran Ariston that kept Athens, whom he payoned, because he was Archelaus ennemie: but specially, for the lands Sylla gaue vnto this Cappadocian. For he gaue him tenne thousand Lugera, (or shires of lande) within the Ile of Euboea, and gaue him moreover the title of a frende of the ROMAINES for euer. But Sylla denyeth all these things in his commentaries. In the meane time, Ambassadors came from king Mithridates vnto Sylla, who told him that the king their master did raise and accept all the articles of peace, sauing that he onely prayed him he would not take the contry of Patragonia from him: and as for the galleies, he would not so much as once say he would promise them. Sylla being offended herewith, angrily answered them in gaue. Then Mithridates, as ye say, meaneth to kepe Patragonia still, and refuseth to geue the shippes I demanded: where I looked that he would haue humbly thanked me on his knees, if I left him his right hand only, with the which he put so many ROMAINE citizens to death. But I hope to make him tell me an other tale, if I come once into ASIA: but now in Bergamum, he speaketh his pleasure of this warre which he hath not seene. The Ambassadors being afrayed of his wordes, replied not againe. Whereupon Archelaus spake, and besought him with teares in his eyes to be contented, and tooke him by the hande. By intreating he obtained of Sylla to sende him vnto Mithridates: promising that he would either bring him to agree to all the articles & conditions of peace that he demanded, or if he could not, he would kill him selfe with his owne handes. Vpon this promise Sylla sent him away, and in the meane while entred with his armie into the contry of Medica: and after he had destroyed the most parte thereof, returned backe againe into Macedon, where Archelaus being returned from Mithridates, founde him neere vnto the city of Philippes, bringing him newes that all should be well, howbeit that his master Mithridates prayed him he might speake with him in any case. Now, the matter that made Mithridates to earnestly to speake with Sylla, was chiefly for Fimbria: who hauing slaine Flaccus the Consul, being of the contrary faction vnto Sylla, and certaine of Mithridates Lieutenantes also, went him selfe against him to fight with him. Mithridates fearing his comming, chose rather to make him selfe Sylla friend. So Mithridates and Sylla met together in the contry of Thracia, in the city of Durandari: Mithridates being accompanied with a flecte of two hundred faile of shippes without at sea, with twenty thousand footemen, and thousande horse, and a number of armed caruel with fyrth beades byland, Sylla having onely but foure ensignes of footemen; and two hundred horsemen. Mithridates went to Sylla, and offering to take him by the hande, Sylla asked him first, if he did accept the peace with the conditions which Archelaus had agreed vnto. Mithridates made him no answer. Sylla following on his tale, sayd vnto him, 'It is for thee to speake first, that haue request to make: & for conquerors, it is enough to hold their peace, and heare what they will say. Then began Mithridates to excuse him selfe, and so lay the reason of the warre, partly vpon the ordinance of the goddes that so had appointed it, & partly Mithridates excuseth him selfe to Sylla.

A also vpon the ROMAINES them selues. Whereunto Sylla replied, that he had heard of long time that Mithridates was an eloquent Prince, and that he knew it now by experience, seeing that he lacked no comely words, to cloke his fowle and shamefull dedes: but withall he sharply reproofed him, and draue him to confesse the cruelties he had committed. And afterwards asked him againe, if he did confirme that which Archelaus had done. Mithridates made answer that he did. Then Sylla saluted, embraced, and kissed him: and calling for the kinges Nicomedes, and Ariobarzanes, reconciled them together, and made Mithridates their frende againe. In conclusion, after Mithridates had deliuered Sylla three score and tenne galleies, and five hundred bow men, he returned by sea into his realme of Pontus. But Sylla hearing that his souldiers were angry with this peace made with Mithridates, because they could not abide to behold that king, whom they accounted for their most cruell and mortall enemy, (hauing in one selfe day caused a hundred and fifty thousand ROMAINE citizens to be slaine, that were dispersed abroad in diuers places of ASIA) so to departe, and go his way safe, with the riches and spoyles of the contry, which he had bereft them of, and vied at his pleasure, the space of forty yeares together: answered them in excuse of him selfe, that he was not able to make warre with Mithridates, & Fimbria both, if once they were ioyned together against him. And so Sylla departing thence, went against Fimbria, who then was encamped neere to the city of Thyatira, and lodged him selfe as neere vnto him as he conveniently might. Nowe whilest he was compassing in his lodging with a trench, Fimbrias souldiers came out of their campe in their coates without any armor or weapon, to salute Syllas souldiers, and holpe them very friendly to make vp their trench. Which Fimbria seeing, and perceiving his souldiers mindes to be changed, of an extreme feare which he had of Sylla, at whose handes he looked for no mercy: killed him selfe in his owne campe. Sylla hereupon condemned the whole contry of ASIA the lesse, to pay the summe of twenty thousand talentes amongst them, and presently also he vndid many poore householders through his insolent souldiers, lying long vpon their charge, which he left in garison there. For he ordained that euery householder should geue the souldier that lodged in his house, foure Tetradrachmas a day, & should be bound to geue him and his frendes (as many as he would bring with him) their supper also: and that euery Capitaine should haue fifty Drachmas a day, a night gowne for the house, and a garment to goe abroad into the city when he thought good. When he had geuen this order, he departed from the city of Ephesus with all his flecte, and in three dayes sayling arriued in the haue of Piræa at Athens, where he was receiued into the fraternity of the mysteries, and reserved for him selfe the librarie of Apellicon Teian: in the which were the most parte of Aristotle and Theophrastus workes, nor then thought meete to come in euery mans handes. And they say, that this librarie being brought to Rome, Tyrannion the grammarian founde the meanes to extract a great parte of them: and that Andronicus the Rhodian hauing recouered the originals into his hands, put them in print, and wrote the summaries which we haue at this present. For the ancient Peripateticke Philosophers were of them selues very wise and learned men, but they had not all Aristotles workes, nor Theophrastus amongst them, and yet those fewe they had, were not by them seene all whole and perfect together: because that the goodes of Neleus Scepsian (to whom Theophrastus left all his bookes by will) came to fall into the hands of meane ignorant men, who knew not the vertue and estimation of them. And furthermore, Sylla being at Athens had such a paine and numefesse in his legges, and was so heauy withall, that Strabo calleth it a spice of the gowte, that is to say, a feeling or entring therinto, which then beganne to roote and take hold of him. Vpon which occasion he tooke the seas, & went vnto a place called Adipsym, where there are naturall hotte bathes: and there remained a while solacing him selfe all the day long with musick, seeing of playes, and entertaining such kinde of people. Vpon a day as he was walking by the sea side, certaine fisher men made him a present of fish, which pleased him maruelously well, & demanding of the whence they were: they answered him againe, that they were of the city of Ales. What? of Ales? Sylla sayd he: is there any of them yet left aliue? speaking it, because that after the battell of Orchomene when he followed the chafe of his enemies, he had taken and destroyed three cities of Borotia all at one selfe time, to wit Anthedon, Larymna, and Ales. fifther men were so amazed with his wordes, that they stood still, and could not tell what to say. Sylla fell a laughing thereat, & bad them go their wayes a gods name, and be not affrayed, for they brought no small intercessors with them, which were worth the reckening of. When Sylla had geuen them these wordes, the ALLEIANS went home with a merry harte, to gather them selues together againe in their city. Sylla so passing through T HESSALIA & MACEDON, came to the sea side, intending to go from the city of D Y R R A C H I V M vnto B V R V N D V S I V M, with twelve hundred sayle. The city of A P O L L O N I A is hard by D Y R R A C H I V M, and thereabout is a parke consecrated vnto the nymphes, where in a fayer goodly Greene meadow in many places there commeth out great bubbles of fire that flame continually: and it is sayd that there was a Satyre taken sleeping, even in the very selfe same forme the painters and image grauers haue set him out. He was brought vnto Sylla, and being asked by all sortes of interpreters what he was, he made no aunswere that a man could vnderstand: but only put forth a sharpe voyce like the neying of a horse, or whynnnyng of a goat. Sylla wondering at it, abhorred him, and made him to be caried from him as a monstrous thing. Furthermore, when Sylla had imbar- ked his men, to passe the sea, he was affrayed that so soone as they were landed in I T A L I E, they would shrinke from him, and euery man go home to his owne. But they sware and promised first of them selues, that they would tary and keepe together, and by their willes would doe no hurt in I T A L I E. Moreouer, perceiuing that he stood in neede of money, they offered him of theirs, & euery man to lend him as his ability ferued. But Sylla would none, yet thanked them for their goodwill: and after he had exhorted them to fight like valliant fouldiers, he went a- gainst fifteen generalls of armies of his enemies, who had foure hundred and fiftie ensignes of footemen well armed, as he him selfe wryteth in his commentaries. But the goddes promised him good fortune in his warres, by many sundry apparant signes. For in a sacrifice he made by T A R E N T V M, after he was come a lande, the luer of a certaine beaſt sacrificed, was alto- gether facioned after the manner of a crowne or garland of laurell, out of the which did hang two bandes or rolles. And a litle before he went into C A M P A N I A, nere vnto the mountaine E- pheum, there appeared two great goates in the day time fighting together, euen as two men do when they fight: which neuerthelesse was no matter of truth, but a vision onely that ap- peared, and rising from the earth disperſed it selfe by litle and litle here and there in the aye, and in thende vanished quite away, as cloudes which come to nothing. Shortly after, in the selfe same place, Marius the younger, and Norbanus the Consull, who brought two great ar- mies against him, were overthrowen by him, before he had set his men in battell, or had ap- pointed any man his place where he should fight: and this proceeded onely vpon the corage and life of his fouldiers, whose goodwill to serue against them was such, as following this vi- ctory, he compelled the Consull Norbanus after he had slaine fixe thousande of his men, to take the city of C A P V A for his refuge. This noble exployte, (as him selfe reported) was the cause that his men kept so well together, that they neither went home to their houses, nor made any reckening of their enemies, although they were many against one. And he sayth furthermore, that in the city of S Y L V I V M, there was a flauie of one Pontius a citizen, who be- ing inspired with a prophetically spirite, came to tell him from the goddesse Bellona, that he should grow in strength, & carry away the victory of these wars: howbeit that if he did not hie him the sooner, the Capitoll at R O M E should be burnt. And so it fell out the same day ac- cording to his wordes, being the sixteenth day of the moneth called Quintilis, and now Iuly. And furthermore also, Lucullus (one of Syllas Captaines) being nere vnto the city of F I D E N T I A with sixteen ensignes only, against fifty ensignes of his enemies, knowing his men to be ve- ry well affected to serue, because the most parte of them were naked & vnarmed, was affrayed to hazard the battell and as he was euen be thinking him selfe what was best to determine ther- of, there rose a litle winde out of a goodly meadow that blew a wonderfull sorte of flowers vpon the fouldiers on euery parte of them. These flowers stayed of them selues as they fell, some apon their targets, and others apon their moryans, without falling to the ground: so that it seemed to their enemies a farre of, as if they had bene garlandes of flowers vpon their heads. This made Lucullus fouldiers more lusty a great deale, then they were before, and with this good will they determined to geue a charge vpon their enemies: whom they overthrow,

A flue eightene thousand of them in the field, & tooke their campe. This Lucullus was brother vnto the other Lucullus, that afterwards ouerthrew the kings Mithridates, & Tigranes. Neuer- theles, Sylla perceiuing that his enemies lay round about him with many great puissant armies, thought good to vie policy with force: & therefore practised with Scipio, one of the Consulls, to make peace with him. Scipio was willing to it: & thereupon were oft meetings & assemblies of both sides. Now Sylla draue of the conclusion of the peace as long as he could, still seeking occasion of delay, to thend that his fouldiers which were thoroughly acquainted with craft and subtilty as well as him selfe, might in the meane time corrupt Scipios fouldiers by repaire in- to his campe: for they coming into Scipios campe, being very conuersant with the straight corrupted some of them with ready money, other with promises, & other with fayer flattering words, & many goodly tales they told them. At the length, after this practise had continued a while, Sylla comming nere vnto Scipios campe with twenty ensignes only: all his men saluted Scipios fouldiers, & they relating them, againe, yielded them selues vnto Sylla, so as Scipio was left poste alone in his tente where he was taken, but they afterwards let him goe. So Sylla with his twenty ensignes, like vnto the fowlers, that by their itales draw other birds into their nettes, hauing gotten forty ensignes from his enemies by his craft, brought them away with him into his campe. There it was that Carbo layd of Sylla, that he had to fight with a foxe & a lyon both: but that the foxe did him more hurte & mischief, then the lyon. After this, Marius the youn- ger hauing foure score and fife ensignes in his campe nere vnto the cite of S I G N I V M, pre- sented battell vnto Sylla: who hauing very good desire to fight, and specially on that day, bi- cause the night before he had seene this vision in his dreame, that he thought he saw Marius the father (who was deceased long before) warning his sonne that he should come to him. Sylla for this respect desired maruelously to fight that day: and thereupon caused Dolabella to come vnto him, that was before lodged farre from him. But the enemies steep betweene him and home, and stopped his passage to keepe him from ioyning with Sylla. Syllas fouldiers to the contrary, fought to keepe the way open for him, with so great labor and paine, that they were all wearie and ouerharried. And furthermore, there fell a maruelous great shower of raine vpon them as they were busie, opening the way, that troubled them more, then the la- bor they had in hande. Whereupon the priuate Captaines of the bandes went to make Sylla vnderstande it, and to pray him to deferre the battell vntill an other day: showing him howe the fouldiers wearied with labor, lay downe vpon their targettes on the grounde to take their ease. Sylla perceiuing this, was contented withall, though greatly in deede against his will. But when he had geuen the signall to lodge, and that they beganne to trenche and fortifie their campe: Marius the younger commeth a horse backe marching brauely before all his companie, hoping to haue surprised his enemies in disorder, and by that means to haue ouerthro- wen them easily. But farre otherwise did fortune then performe the reuelation which Sylla had in his fore sayd dreame: for his men fallinge in a rage withall, left their worke in the trenche where they wrought, stucke their dartes vpon the bancke, ranne vpon their enemies with their swordes drawn, and with a maruelous crie set apon them so valiantly, that they were not able to resist their furie, but sodainly turned their backs and fled, where there was a great and notable slaughter made of them. Marius their Captaine fled to the cite of P E N E S T E, where he found the gates shut: but they threw him downe a rope from the wall, which he tied about his middle, and so was triced vpon by it. Yet some wryters say, and Feneſtella among other, that Marius neuer sawe the battell: for being wearied with labor, and verie sleepe, he laye vnder some tree in the shadowe to rest a litle, after he had geuen the signall and word of the battell, and slept so soundly, that he could scarce awake with the noyle and fleeing of his men. Sylla him selfe wryteth, that he lost at this battell but three and twentie men, slewe twentiethousand of his enemies, and tooke eight thousande prisoners. His Lieutenantes also had the like good successe in other places, Pompeius, Crassus, Metellus, and Seruilius: which without any losse of their men, or but with a verie small, overthrowe many great mightie armies of their enemies: Inſomuch as Carbo, the heade and chiefe of all the contrary faction, and he that most maintained it, fled one night out of his campe, and went beyonde the seas into A F R I C K E. The last battell that Sylla had, was against Theſſianus

the Samnyte put Sylla in great danger.

SAMNYTE, who coming like a fresh champion to set upon him, when he was already wounded, and had fought many battels, had almost slain him euen at ROME gates. For Theſſimus hauing gathered together a great number of souldiers with one Lampontius LYCANIUS, marched with all speede towards the city of PRÆNESTĒ, to deliuer Marius the younger that was besieged there. But vnderstanding that Sylla on the one side, came in great haste also to meete him, and that Pomponius came behinde him on the other side, & perceiuing, moreover, that the way was so shut vp, that he could neither go forward nor backward being a valiant souldier, and one that had bene in many great foughten fieldes, most daungerously ventured to go straight to ROME. And so stole away by night with all his whole power, and marching to ROME ward, had almost taken it at his first coming, for that there was neither watch nor ward kept: but he stayed happely tenne furlonges from the gate Collina, bragging with himselfe, and beleuing that he should doe wonders, for that he had mocked so many great Capitaines. The next morning betimes came diuerſe young noble men and gentlemen out of the citie to skirmish with Theſſimus: who slue a great number of them, and among others one Appius Claudius a young gentleman of a noble house, and very honest. Whereupon (as you may easily imagine) the city trembled for feare, and specially the women, who fell a shrieking, and running vp and downe, as if they had bene all taken. But in this great feare and trouble, Balbus (whom Sylla had sent) came first with seuen hundred horse vpon the spur, and staying but a litle to coole and geue them breath, bridled straight againe, and went to set upon the enemies thereby to stay them. Soone after him came Sylla also, who commaunded his men that came first, quickly to eate somewhat, and that done, put them straight in battell ray: notwithstanding that Dolobello and Torquatus perswaded him to the contrary, and besought him not to put his souldiers wearied with their iorney, to so great and manifest a danger, and rather, because they had not to fight with Carbo and Marius, but with the SAMNYTES and LYCANES, who were (both) warlike nations & good souldiers, and those besides that most deadly hated the ROMANS. But for all that, Sylla draue them backe, and commaunded his trumpets to founde the alarme, being almost within foure houres of night: and this battell was sharper and more cruell, then any other that euer he fought before. The right wing where Crassus was, had the better much: but the left wing was very fore distressed, & stoode in great perill. Sylla hearing thereof, and thinking to helpe it, got vp vpon a white couler that was both swift, and very strong. The enemies knewe him, and there were two that lifted vp their armes to throw their darts at him, whom he saw not: but his page gaue his horse such a lash with his whippe, that he made him so to gird forward, as the very pointes of the darts came hard by the horse tayle, and stucke fast in the grounde. Some say that Sylla had a litle golden image of Apollo, which he brought from the city of DELPHES, and in time of warres ware it alwayes in his bosome, which he then tooke in his hand, and kissing it, sayd: O Apollo Pythia, haſt thou so highly exalted Cornelius Sylla, so fortunate hitherto through so many famous victories, and wilt thou now with shame ouerwhelme him wholly, euen at the very gates of his owne naturall citie among his contry men? And so crying out to Apollo for helpe, thrust into the prease among his men, intreating some, threatening others, and layinge apon the rest to stay them. But for all he could doe, all the left winge of his army was broken and ouerthrowen by his enemies: and him selfe amongst them that fled, was compelled to recouer his campe with speede, hauing lost many of his frendes and familiars. There were moreover many citizens slaine and troden vnder feete (both with horse and men) that came only to see the battell fought: so that they within the city thought them selues vtterly vndone. Lucretius of fella furthermore (he that besieged Marius in the citie of PRÆNESTĒ) had almost raised his siege, vpon the wordes of them that fled and came thither from the battell, who wished him to remoue with all speede possible, for Sylla was slaine, and Theſſimus had taken ROME. Now about midnight came certaine souldiers from Crassus to Syllas campe, & asked for meate for Crassus supper, and his mens, who hauing chased his flying enemies whom he had ouerthrowen, vnto the city of ANTENNA (which they tooke for refuge) had lodged his campe there. Sylla vnderſtanding that, & being aduertised that the most parte of his enemies were ouerthrowen at this battell: went him selfe the next morning betimes vnto ANTENNA, where three thousand conuincit, that Sylla besieged Marius the

Perusia, and

A thousand of his enemies sent to know if he would receiue them to mercy, if they yielded them selues vnto him. His answer was, that he would pardon their liues, so as they would do some mischief to their fellows before they came to him. These three thousand hereupon trusting to his promise, fell apon their companions: and for the most parte one of them killed an other. Notwithstanding, Sylla hauing gathered all those together that remained of his enemies, as well the three thousand, as the rest, amounting in all to the number of six thousand men, within the shew place where they vied to run their horses whilst he him self held a counsell in the temple of the goddess Bellona, & was making his oratio there, he had appointed certē to set vpō those six thousand, & put them to the sword euery man. Great and terrible were the cries of such a number of men slaine in so small a roome, as many may easily coniecture in such as the Senators sitting in counsell heard them very easily, and marueled what the matter was. But Sylla continuing on his oration which he had begun with a set steady countenance, without chainging of colour, willed the only to hearken what he sayd, & not to trouble them selues with any thing done abroad: for they were but certen offenders & lewd persons that were punished by his commaundemēt. This was enough to shew the simplest ROMANE in ROME, that they had but only chaunged the tyrant, but not the tyranny. Now for Marius, that had bene euer of a churlish & seuer nature euen from his childhood, he neuer chaiged for any authority, but did rather hardē his natural stubbornnes. Where Sylla contrary in the beginning, was very modest & ciuill in all his prosperity, & gaue great good hope that if he came to the authority of a prince, he would fauor nobility wel, & yet loue notwithstanding the benefit of the people. And being moreover a man in his youth geue all to pleasure, delighting to laugh, ready to pity, & weep for tender hart: in that he became after so cruell & bloody, the great alteration gaue manifest cause to condemne the increase of honor & authority, as thonly meanes whereby mens manners continue not such as they were at the first, but still do chaunge & vary, making some fooles, others vaine & fantasticall, & others extreame cruel & vnatural. But whether that alteration of nature came by chaunging his state & condition, or that it was otherwise a violent breaking out of hidden malice, which then came to shewe it selfe, when the way of liberty was layed open: this matter is to be decided in some other treatise. So it came to passe, that Sylla fell to heading of blood, & filled all ROME with infinite & vnſpeakeable murders: for diuerſe were killed for priuate quarrels, that had nothing to do with Sylla at any time, who suffered his frends & thole about him to worke their wicked wills. Vntil at the length there was a young man called Caius Metellus, that was so bold to aske Sylla in open Senate, when all these miseries should end, and when they should know that all the mischieues were finished, the which they dayly sawe. For said he, we will not intreat you to pardon life, where you haue threatned death: but only to put the out of doubt, whom you haue determined to saue. Whereunto Sylla made answer, that he was not resoluēd whom he would saue. Metellus replied, the tell vs quod he, who they are that shall dye. Sylla answered he would. Howbeit some say it was not Metellus, but Aufidius one of his flatterers, that spake this last word vnto him. Wherefore Sylla immediately without making any of the magistrats priuy, caused foure score mens names to be set vp vpon postes, whom he would put to death. Euery mā being offered death, the next day following he set vp two hundred & twenty mens names more: & likewise the third day as many more. Herupon, making an oration to the people, he told the openly that he had appointed all them to dye, that he could call to remembrance: howbeit that hereafter he would appoint them that should dye by daies, as he did call them to minde. Whosoever saued an outlaw in his house, for reward of his kindness, he him selfe was condēned to dye: not excepting the that had receiued their brothers, their sonnes, their fathers, nor mothers: And the reward of euery homicide & murderer that killed one of the outlawes, was two talentes: though it were a slave that had killed his master, or the some that had slaine the father. But the most wicked & vniust act of all was, that he depriued the sonnes, & sonnes sonnes of them whom he had killed, of all credit & good name, & besides that, had takē all their goods as confiscate. And this was not only done in ROME, but also in the cities of ITALIE through out: & there was no temple of any god whosoever, nor altar in any bodie house, nor liberty of hospital, nor fathers house, that was not emburied with blood & horrible murder. For the husbands were slaine in their wives armes, & the childre in their mothers laps.

and yet they which were flaine for private hatred & malice, were nothing in respect of those that were murdered only for their goods. And they that killed them might well say, his goodly great house made that man dye, his goodly fayer garden the other: and his hoste barrowe other. As amongst others, Quintus Aurelius, a man that neuer medled with any thinge, and least looked that these euills should light vpon him, and that only pitied those which he flauely miserably murdered: went one day into the market place, and reading the bill set vp of the outlawes names, found his owne name amongst the rest, and cried out aloude: was the day that euer I was borne, my house of Alba maketh me to be put to death. He went not farre from the market place, but met with one that killed him presently. In the meane time, Marius the younger seeing he could by no meanes escape if he were taken, flue him selfe. And Sylla comming to Preneste, did first execute them by one and by one, keeping a certaine forme of iustice in putting them to death: but afterwards as if he had no lenger leasure to remaine there, he caused them all to be put in a place together, to the number of twelue thousand men, whom he caused to be put to the sword every man, sauing his host only, vnto whom he sayd, that he shewed him specially fauor to saue his life. But his host answered him flowly, gaine, that he would not be beholding vnto him for his life, seeing he had flaine all the rest of his contry men: and so thrusting in amongst the citizens, was willingly flaine with them. They thought the act of Lucius Catiline also very straunge, who had flaine his owne brother before the ciuill warre was ended: and then prayed Sylla to put him in the number of the outlawes, as if his brother had bene aliue. Sylla performed his desire. Catiline thereupon shewe his thankfulness for the pleasure Sylla had done him, went presently, and flue Marius the younger, who was of the contrary faction: and brought him his head for a present before all the people, in the middle of the market place where he was sitting. When he had so done, he went and washed his hands all bloodied in the hallowed font of the temple of Apollo, that was hard by. But besides so many murders committed, yet were there other things also that grieved the people maruelously. For he proclaimed him selfe Dictator, which office had not bene of sixe yeares before in vife, and made the Senate discharge him of all that was past, geuing him free liberty afterwards to kill whom he would, and to confiscate their goodes: to destroy cities, and to build vp new as he listed: to take away kingdomes, and to geue them where he thought good. And furthermore, he openly sold the goodes confiscate, by the crier, sitting proudly and stately in his chayer of state, that it grieved the people more to see those goodes packt vp by them, to whom he gaue and disposed them: then to see them taken from those that had forfeited them. For sometimes he would geue a whole contry, or the whole reuenues of certaine cities, vnto women for their beawty, or vnto pleasaunt iesters, minstrells, or wicked slaues made free: and vnto some, he would geue other mens wiues by force, and make them to be married against their willes. For he desiring (howsoever it happened) to make alliance with Pompey the great, commaunded him to put away his wife he had married: and taking Aemylia (the daughter of Aemylus Scaurus, & of Metella his wife) from the great Glabrio, caused him to marry her great with childe as she was by Glabrio: but the dyed in childbed, in Pompey house. Lucretius Offella also that had brought Marius the younger to that distresse at the city of Preneste: suing to be Consul, Sylla commaunded him to cease his sute. But he notwithstanding that expresse commaundement, went one day into the market place, with a great traine of men following him that fauored his cause. Whither Sylla sent one of his Centurions that flue Offella before all the people: him selfe sitting in a chayer of estate in the temple of Castor and Pollux, and seeing from aboue the murder done. The people that were about Offella, layd hold of the murderer straight & brought him before Sylla. But Sylla had them quiet, that brought the Centurion with tumult, and that they should let him goe, because he commaunded him to do it. Furthermore as touching his triumphe, it was a sumptuous fight to behold, for the rarenes of the riches, and princely spoyle which were shewed at the same. But yet was it so much the better set out, and worth the sight, to see the banished ROMANS, who were the chiefeft noble men of all the city of ROME, following his chaire triumphantly wearing garlandes of flowers on their heades, calling Sylla their father, and fauor: because that by his meanes they returned to their contry, and recouered their goods, wiues, and children.

And in the end of his triumphe, he made an oration in open assembly of the people of ROME, in the which he did not only declare vnto the (according to the custome) what thinges he had done, but did as carefully tell them also as well of his good fortune and iugesse, as of his valiant deedes besides: and to conclude his oration, told them that by reason of the great fauor fortune had shewed him, he would from thenceforth be called by the name, Felix, to say, happy, or fortunate. And he him selfe when he wrote vnto the GREECIANS, or that he had any thing to do with them: furnished him selfe Epaphroditus, as who would say, a pleasaunt man, beloved and fauored of Venus. His tokens of triumphe which are yet in our contry, haue this supercription. Lucius Cornelius Sylla Epaphroditus. And when his wife Metella had brought him two twinnes, a sonne and a daughter: he named his sonne Faustus, signifying fortunate, and his daughter Fausia: because the ROMANS call Faustum that, which falleth out prosperously, and happily. To be short, he trusted so much vnto his good fortune and doings, that notwithstanding he had killed and put so many men to death, and had made so great a change and innouation in the common wealth, yet of him selfe he lelt of his office of Dictator, and restored the people to the authority of election of Consuls againe, without his presence at the election: and frequented the market place as a priuate man, among the citizens, offering him selfe to euery man that would aske him accompt of his doings past. It happened that a stow and rash enemy of his was Chosen Consul against his will, called Marcus Lepidus, not for a deuotion the people had to Lepidus, but only to graue Pompey, who gaue countenance and fauor vnto him. Sylla seeing Pompey come many homewards from the election, and joyfull that he had obtained his frendes sute from all other suters: tooke him a side, & told him. In deede thou hast great cause to reioyce, young man my frende, for thou hast done a goodly acte: to choose Marcus Lepidus Consul, the veriest asse in all ROME, before Catiline the honestest man. But I tell thee one thing, thou haddest not neede to deeeper for thou hast strengthened an enemy, that will be thine owne destruction. And Sylla proued a true prophet: for Lepidus being bent to all cruelty immediately after, flayt flyt at defiance with Pompey. Now Sylla confecting the dishes of all his goodes vnto Herulus, made exceeding sumptuous feastes vnto the ROMANS, the prouision whereof was so vnreasonable great, that euery day they threw a great deale of meate into the riuer, and they dranke wine of forty yeares olde and aboue. During these feastes which continued many dayes, his wife Metella sickened, and dyed, and in her sickenes the Priestes and Soothsayers willed Sylla he should not come neere her, nor suffer his house to be polluted and defiled with mourning for the dead. Whereupon Sylla was diuorced from her in her sickenes, and caused her to be caried into an other house, whilst she liued. And thus did Sylla curiously obserue the superstition and ordinance of the Soothsayers: but yet he brake the law which he made him selfe, touching the order of funeralles, spending no coist at Metellaes buriall. So did he also breake an other order him selfe had made, touching the reformation of banketts: comforting his sorrow with ordinary feastes, full of all vanity and lasciuiousnes. Within a fewe monethes after, he had fensiers games at the Theater: and the roomes of the Theater being open and vnseuered, men and women sitting together, it happened that there was a fayer Lady, and of a noble house, that sat hard by Sylla, called Valeria: she was the daughter of Metella, and sister of Horatius the orator, and had bene diuorced not long before from her husbande. This Lady passing by Sylla behinde him did softly put her hand on his shoulder, and tooke a heare from of his gowne, and so went on to her place, and sat her downe. Sylla marueling at this familiarity, looked earnestly vpon her: it is nothing my Lord, (quod she) but that I desire with others to be partaker a litle of your happines. Her words misliked not Sylla, but contrarily he shewed that he had tickled him with them: for he sent straight to aske her name, and enquired of what house she was, and how she had liued. But after many flye looks betwene them, they turned their faces one to an other vpon euery occasion, with pretty smyling countenances: so that in the end, they came to promise & contract marriage together, for the which Valeria was not to be blamed. For though she was as wife, as honest, and as vertuous a Lady as could be possible, yet the occasion that made Sylla marry her, was neither good nor commendable, because he was taken straight with a looke and a fine tongue, as if he had bene but a young boy: which commonly shew forth the filthiest passion.

fions of the minde, to be so caried, and with such motions. Now, notwithstanding he had this fayer young Lady in his house, he left not the company of women minstrells & tumblers, and to haue pleasant iesters and musicians about him, with whome he would lye wallowing and drinking all the day long, vpon little cowches made for the none. For, his companions that were in greatest estimation with him at that time, were these three: Roscus a maker of common plays, Sorex a prince of scoffers, and one Metrobis a singing man, whom he was in love withall while he liued, & yet did not dissemble his loue, though he was past age to be beloved. This wicked life of his was cause of increasing his disease, the original cause whereof had a light foundation at the first. For he liued a great time before he perceived that he had an impostume in his body, the which by proceesse of time came to corrupt his flesh in such sorte, that it turned all to lice: so that notwithstanding he had many men about him, to shift him continually night and day, yet the lice they wiped away were nothing, in respect of them that multiplied still vpon him. And there was neither apparell, linnen, bathes, washing, nor meate it selfe, but was presently filled with swarmes of this vile vermine. For he went many times in the day into the bathe to washe and cleanse him selfe of them, but all would not serue: for the changing of his flesh into this putrified wannet straight againe, that there was no cleansing, nor shifting of him, that could kepe such a number of lice from him. Some say, that in old time (amongest the most auncientest men, whereof there is any memory) Acastus the sonne of Pelias, dyed of the lowse euill: and long time after also, the Poet Alcman, and Pherecidas the deuine: and so did Callisthenes OLYMPIAN in prison, and Mutius a wise lawyer. And if we shall make mention of those that are famous men, although it be not in any good matter: we finde that a bonde man called Ennius, he that was the first procurer of the warres of the bondmen in SICILIA, being taken and caried to ROME, dyed also of the same disease. Furthermore, Sylla did not only foresee his death, but he wrote some thing of it also: for he made an end of writing the two and twenty booke of his commentaries, two dayes before he dyed. In that booke he sayth, that the wife men of CHALDEA had told him long before, that after he had liued honorably, he should ende his dayes in the flower of all his prosperity. And there he sayth also, that his sonne (who departed a litle before his mother Metella) appeared to him in his sleepe, apparelled in an ill fauored gowne, and that comminge vnto him, he prayed him he would go with him vnto Metella his mother, thenceforth to liue in peace and rest with her. But for all his disease, he would not geue ouer to deale in matters of state. For tenne dayes before his death he pacified a fedition, and tumult, risen among the inhabitantes of the city of PVRGILANVM (in Italian called POZZOLO) and there he gaue them lawes and ordinaunces, whereby they should gouerne them selues. And the day before he dyed, hearing that Granius who was in debt to the common wealth deferred payment of his money looking for his death: he sent for him, and made him come into his chamber, and there caused his men to compass him about, and commaunded them to strangle him in his sight. The passion of his anger was so vehement against him, that by the extreame straining of him selfe, he brake the impostume in his body, so as there gushed out a wonderfull deale of blood: by reason whereof his strength failing him, he was full of paine and panges that night, and so dyed, leauing the two litle children he had by Metella. For Valeria, was brought to bed of a daughter after his death, which was called Posthumia, because the ROMANES call those children that are borne after the death of their fathers, Posthumi. Now when Sylla was dead, many gathered about the Consul Lepidus to let that his body should not be honorably buried, as they were accustomed to bury noble men & men of quality. But Pompey, though he was angry with Sylla, because he had geuen him nothing in his will, and had remembered all his other frendes: yet he made some for loue, some by intreaty, and others with threatening to let it alone, and accompanying the corpse to ROME, gaue both safety and honor vnto the performance of his funeralls. And it is sayd also, that the ROMANES Ladies, amongst other things, bestowed such a quantity of perfumes & odoriferous matter towards the same: that besides those which were brought in two hundred and tenne great baskets, they made a great image to the likenes of Sylla him selfe, and another of a sergeaut carrying the axes before him, all of excellent incense & synnagon. When the day of the funeralls came, fearing least it would raine in the forenone, all the element

ing so clowdy: they deferred to cary forth the body to be burnt, vntill past three of the clocke in the afternone. And then rose there such a sodaine boytiferous winde, that it set all the stake of woodde straight afire, that the body was burnt at a tryce, and the fire going out, fell a great shower of raine that held on till night: so that it seemed good fortune following him euen to his ende, did also helpe his obsequies after his death. His tombe is to be seene in the field of Mars, and they say that he him selfe made his owne epitaphe that is wrytten vpon it, which was: that no man did euer passe him, neither in doing good to his frendes, nor in doing mischief to his enemies.

THE COMPARISON OF Sylla with Lysander.

Now that we haue at large also set forth the life of the ROMANES, let vs come to compare them both together. In this they are both a like, that both of them grew to be great men, rising of the selues through their owne vertue: but this only is proper to Lysander, that all the offices & dignities which he attained vnto in the common wealth, were layed apou him through the peoples good wills and consents. For he compelled them to nothing, neither vsurped he any extraordinarie authoritie vpon them, contrarie to lawe: for, as the common saying is:

Where partialitie, and discorde once doe raigne:

There wicked men are most esteemed, and rule with greatest gaine.

As at that time in ROME, the people being corrupted, and the state of government vtterly subuerted and brought to nought: to day there rose vpon one tyrannic, to morow an other. And therefore we may not wonder if Sylla vsurped and ruled all, when such fellows as Glaucia and Saturninus, did both banish and driue out of ROME such men as Metellus was; and where also in open assembly they slue Consuls somes in the market place, and where force of armes was bought & sold for gold and siluer, with the which the souldiers were corrupted, & where they made new lawes with fire and sword, and forced men to obey the same. Yet I speake not this in reproache of him that in such troublesome times founde meanes to make him selfe the greatest man: but to shew that I measure not his honesty by the dignity he grew vnto in so unfortunate a city, although he became the chiefe. And as touching him that came from SPAIN (at what time it flourished most, and was the best gouerned common weale) he in all great cause, and in most honorable offices, was reputed for the best of all bests, and the chiefe of all chieffes. Wherefore it happened, that the one resigned vp the authority to his contry men, the citizens, which they had geuen him, who also restored it to him againe many and sundry times: for the honor of his vertue did alwayes remaine, and made him iustly accompted the worthiest man. Where the other being once only chosen generall of an army, remained tenne yeares continually in warres and hostilitie, making him selfe by force, sometime full, sometime vice Confull, and sometime Dictator, but alwayes continued a tyranne. In dede Lysander attempted to chaunge, and alter the state of gouernment in his contrie, howbeit was with greater lenity, and more lawfully then Sylla did. For he sought it by reason, and good perswasion, not by the sword: neither would he make a chaunge of the whole at one selfe time as Sylla did, but sought only to reforme the election of kinges. The which thing according to nature, doubtlesse seemed very iust: that he which was the best amongst good men, should be chosen king of that citie, which was the chiefe ouer all Greece, not for her nobility, but for her vertue only. For like as a good hunter doth not seeke for the welthe of a good dogge, but for the good dogge him selfe: nor a wise man of armes also, the colte that commeth of a good horse, but the good horse him selfe. Euen so, he that taketh vpon him to stablish a ciuill gouernment, committeth a fowle fault: if he looke of whom his Prince should be borne, and not what the Prince him selfe should be, considering that the Lacedæmonians them selues haue deprived diuerse of their kinges from their crowne and realme, because they were not Princely, but vnprofitable, and good for nothing. Vice, although it be in a noble man, yet is it alwayes ill of it selfe: but vertue is honored for her selfe alone, and not because it is placed with nobility. Now for the wronges and injuries they both committed, the one did worke only to pleasure his frendes, and the other to offend them to whom he was bounden. For it is certaine, that Lysander did great wronges to gratifie his familiars: and the most part of them whom he put to death, was to establish the tyrannicall power of certaine his frendes. Where Sylla fought for spite to take away his army from Pompey, and the Admiralty from Dolabella, which he him selfe had geuen, & caused Lucretius Offella to be slaine openly in his owne fight, because he sought to be Confull, for recompence of the good seruice he had done: for which cruelty of his, causinge his own frendes to be slaine in such sorte, he made euery man afraid of him. Furthermore, their behauiours touching couetousnes and pleasure doth shew, that the intent of the one was the desire of a good Prince, and the other, that of a tyranne. For we doe not finde that Lysander, for all his great Princely authority, did euer vse any insolency or lasciuiousnes in his deedes, but alwayes auoyded as much as a man might, the reproache of this common prouerbe: Lyons at home, and Foxes abroad: He led such a true LACONIAN life, straightly reformed in all poyntes. Where Sylla could neuer moderate his vnlawfull lustes, neither for pouerty when he was young, nor yet for age, when it came vpon him. But while he gaue lawes to the ROMANES touching matrimoniall honestie and chastitie: him selfe in the meane time did nothing but follow loue, and commit adultries, as Salust wryteth. By meanes whereof he so much impouerished ROME, and left it so voyde of gold and siluer: that for ready money he sold absolute freedome vnto the cities their confederates, yet was it his daily study to confiscate and take for forfeit, the richest and most wealthiest houses in all the whole citie of ROME. But all this spoyle and hauoke was nothing in comparison of that which he daily cast away vpon his iealeters & flatterers. What sparing, or measure may we thinke he kept, in his gifts at priuate banckets: when openly in the day time (all the people of ROME being present to see him sell the goodes which he had caused to be confiscated) he made one of his frendes and familiars, to trusse vp a great deale of household stufte, for a very little price. And when any other had outbidden his price, & that the crier had cried it out aloud: then was he angry, and sayd: My frendes, I haue great wrong done me here, not to suffer me sell the spoile I haue gotten at mine owne pleasure, and dispose it as I list my selfe. Where Lysander contrariely sent to the common wealth of SPARTA, with other money, the very presents that were geuen to him selfe. And yet I do not commend him in that deede. For, peraduenture he did more hurt to SPARTA, bringing thither that gold & siluer: then Sylla did to ROME, in wasting and consuming that he consumed. Howbeit I alleage this onely, for prooofe and declaration that Lysander was nothing couetous. They both haue done that vnto their citie, which neither any other but them selues did. For Sylla being a riorous and licentious man, brought his citizens notwithstanding to good order and gouernment: and Lysander contrarily filled his citie with

Lysander temperance and moderate life. Sylla: licentious and prodigall life.

Sylla: tyrannical saying.

A with vice, yet not infected withall him selfe. Thus were they both offenders, the one for breaking the law he commaunded to be kept, and the other in making the citizens worse then he was him selfe: for he taught the SPARTANS to desire those things, which he about all things had learned to despise. And thus much concerning peace and ciuill gouernment. Now for matters of warre and battells fought, there is no comparison to be made of Lysander to Sylla, neither in number of victories, nor in hazard of battell. For Lysander wanne only but two battells by sea, besides the taking of the citie of ATHENS: which though I graunt him being rightly considered, was no great exploit of warre, howbeit it was a noble act, considering the same he wan by it. And as for things which happened to him in BEOOTIA, hard by the citie of ALIAETE: a man might say peraduenture that he had ill lucke. But yet me thinkes also there was a fault in him, for that he stayed not for king Pausanias aide (the which came from PLATES immediately after his ouerthrow) and because he went in a geere in fury, and in a vaine ambition to runne his head against a wall: so that men of all sortes making a desperate false out of ALIAETE vpon him, slue him there to no purpose. Farre vnlike to Cleombrotus that died at the battell of LEUCTRES, resisting his enemies that distressed his men: nor yet like Cyrus, nor Epaminondas, who to keepe his men from flying, and to geue them assured victory, receiued his deadly wounde: for all these men dyed like noble kings, & valliant Captaines. Where Lysander rashly cast him selfe away, to his great dishonor, by too much venturing: prouing thereby, that the ancient SPARTANS did like wise men, to auoyde the fight with walles. For the noblest and valliantest man that is, or possible can be, may easily be so slaine, not only by the first fouldier that commeth, but by euery feely woman or childe. As they say that the worthy Achilles was killed by Paris within the very gates of TROIA. Now to the contrarie againe, the victories that Sylla wanne in set battells, and the thousandes of enemies which he slue, are not easily to be numbred, besides also that he tooke the city of ROME twise, and the haue of ATHENS: not by famine as Lysander did, but by force, after he had by many great battells driuen Archelaus out of firme land, into the maine sea. It is to be considered also, against what Captaines time made warres. For me thinkes it was but a pastime, as a mā might say, for Lysander to fight with Antiochus, a pylot of Alcibiades, or to surpriue and deceiue Philoteles, a common orator at ATHENS.

Much worse then vvord edged sword, his buse tongue did seeme: VVhich prattled still, and honestie did neuer once esteeme,

D And whom Mithridates (in my opinion) would not vouchefase to compare with his horse-keeper, nor Marius with one of his sergeantes or masebearers. But to leaue a side the particular names of all other Princes, Lordes, Confulls, Prætors, Captaines, and Gouernors that made warres with Sylla: what ROMANE Captaine was there more to be feared, then Marius? what king liuing was there of such power as king Mithridates? And of Generalls and Lieutenantes of armies in all ITALIE, were there any euer more valliant, then Lamponius and Thelephus: of the which Sylla draue the one away, and brought the other to obey him, and slue the last? But the greatest matter of all that we haue spoken of yet, in my opinion was, that Lysander did all his noble actes, with the aide of his whole contrie: where Sylla to the contrarie E did his, (being banished from his contry) by his enemies. And at the selfe same time that they draue Syllas wife out of ROME, that they ouerthrew his houses, and slue his frendes also in ROME: he notwithstanding made warres in the meane time with infinite thousandes of fighting men in BEOOTIA, and ventred his person in manifold daungers, so that in the end he conquered them all to the honor & benefit of his contry. Furthermore, Sylla would neuer stoupe to king Mithridates, for any particular allyance he offered him, neither yeelde vnto him for any aide of men, or money, to warre against his enemies: but a thing most chiefly to be noted above the rest, he would not vouchefase to speake to Mithridates, nor to take him by the hande onely, before he had spoken it with his owne mouth, and faithfully promised, that he would forgoe ASIA, deliuer him his gallies, and geue vp the realmes of BITHYNIA and CAPPADOCIA vnto their naturall kinges. This me thinkes was the goodliest act that euer Sylla did, and proceeded of the greatest magnanimity, to haue preferred the benefit of the common wealth in that sorte, before his priuate comodity. For therein he was like vnto a good greyhound that first pincheth the deare, and holdeth him fast, till he haue ouerthrowen him: and then afterwarde followeth the recouery of his owne priuate quarrell. And lastly, me thinkes it is easily iudged what difference there was betwene their two natures, in that they did both towards the cits of ATHENS. For Sylla hauing taken it, after the citizens had made fierce warres with him for the increase of king Matbridates greatnes: yet he left it free vnto them, enioying their owne lawes. Where Lysander to the contrary, seeing such a mighty state and Empire as that, ouerthrowen from the great rule it bare, had no pity of it at all, but tooke away the libertie of popular gouernment, whereby it had bene gouerned of long time before: and established there very cruell and wicked tyrans. And therefore in myne opinion, we shall not much swaue from troth, if we geue this iudgement: that Sylla did the greater acts: and Lysander committed the fewer faultes. And that we geue to the one the honor of a continent and modest man: and to the other, the commendacion of a valliant and skillfull fouldier.

Sylla for war to be preferred before Lysander.

Sylla fought with men of greatest power and couraige them.

Sylla's magnanimity.

his posterity.*

Peripolus as the Soothsayer, he that brought king Opheltas out of THESALIE into the contry of BOEOTIA, with the people which were vnder his obedience: left a posterity after him that long time flourished in that contry, the more parte of the which were euier resident in the city of CHERONEA, because it was the first city that was conquered from the barbarous people whom they expelled thence. All they that came of that race, were commonly men of great corage, and naturally geuen to the warres: who were so forward and aduenturous in all daungers thereof (in the inuasions of the MEDES into GREECE, & in the battells of the GAULES) that they were slaine all of them, but onely Damon (a litle childe left fatherlesse and motherlesse) furnished Peripolus that elcaped, who for goodly personage and noble corage excelled all the lusty youtthes of his time, though otherwise he was very rude, and of a seuer nature. Now it fortuneth, that when Damon was growen of full age, a ROMANE Captaine of an ensigne of footemen (lying in garrison for the winter season in the cite of

& liued parties of Damon Peripolus.*

A CHERONEA fell in great loue with Damon: and because he could not reape the frutes of his dishonest loue by no intreaty nor giftes, there appeared vehement presumptions that by force he went about to abuse him, for that CHERONEA at that time (being my naturall city where I was borne) was a small thing, and (being of no strength nor power) little regarded. Damon mistrusting the Capitaines villanie, and detesting his abominable desire watched him a shrewd tyme, and got certaine of his companions (not many in number, because he might the more secretly compasse his enterprife) to be a counsell with him, and take his parte against the Capitaine. Now there were a fixteene of them in comfort together, that one night blacked their faces all with soote, & the next morning after they had dronke together, by the breake of day set vpon this ROMANE Captaine, that was making sacrifice in the market place, and slue him with a good number of his men: and when they had done, fled out of the cite, which was straight in a great vpror for the murder committed. Thereupon they called a counsell, and in the market place condemned Damon and his confederates to suffer paines of death: hoping thereby to haue cleared their innocencie for the fact done to the ROMANES. But the selfe same night, as all the magistrats and officers of the city were at supper together in the towne house according to their custome: Damon & his followers stole vpon them sodainly, slue them all, & fled againe vpon it. It chauned about that time, that Lucius Lucullus being sent on some iorney, passed by the city of CHERONEA with his army: & because this murder was but newly done, he stayed there a few dayes to examine the troth & originall thereof. And found that the commons of the cite were in no fault, but that they them selues also had receiued hurt: whereupon he tooke the fouldiers of the ROMANES that remained of the garrison, & caried the away with him. In the meane time, Damon destroyed all the contry thereabout, and still houered neere to the cite, inso much as the inhabitantes of the same were driuen in the end to fend vnto him, and by gentle wordes and fauorable decrees handled him so, that they intysed him to come againe into the city: and when they had him amongst them, they chose him Gymnarchus, to say, a master of exercises of youth. But shortly after, as they were rubbing of him with oyle in his stooue or hotte house, starke naked as he was, they slue him by treason. And because that there appeared sprights of long time after in that place, & that there were heard groanings & sighings as our fathers tolde vs, they caused the dore of the hotte house to be walled vp: yet for all that, there are visions seene, and terrible voyces and cries heard in that selfe place vnto this present time, as the neighbours dwelling by doe testifie. Now they that were discended of this Damon (for there are yet of his race in the contrie of PHOCIDAS, neere vnto the cite of SYRIS, who do only of all other both keepe the language and maners of the ÆTOLIANS) are called ASBOLOMENT, signifyinge blacke, and besmured with soote: because that Damon and his fellows: did blacke their faces with soote, when they slue the ROMANE Captaine. But the ORCHOMENIANS being neere neighbors vnto the CHERONEIANS, and therefore their enemies, hyered an informer of ROME, a malicious accuser, to accuse the whole cite, (as if it had bene one priuate person alone) for the murder of the ROMANES, whome Damon and his companions had slaine. The inditement was drawen, and the case pleaded before the gouernor of MACEDON, for that the ROMANES did send no gouernors at that time into GREECE: and the counsellors that pleaded for the cite of CHERONEA, relied vpon the testimonie of Lucius Lucullus, referring them selues to his reporte, who knew the troth, & how it was. Thereupon the gouernor wrote vnto him, and Lucullus in his letter of answer aduertised the very troth: so was our city cleared of the accusation, which otherwise stood in daunger of viter destruction. The inhabitantes of the city of CHERONEA, for that they had escaped the daunger by testimonie of Lucius Lucullus, to honor him withall, they set vp his image in stone in the market place, next vnto the image of Bacchus. And we also that be liuing at this present, though many yeares be gone and passed hence, do notwithstanding reckon our selues partakers of his forepassed benefit. And because we are perfwaded, that the image and portraiture that maketh vs acquainted with mens manners and condicions, is farre more excellent, then the picture that representeth any mans person or shape only: we will comprehend his life and doings according to the troth, in this volume of noble mens liues, where we doe compare and sorte them one with an other. our felues thankfull for his benefit, and we thinke, that he himfelfe would milike for reward of his true testimonie, to be requited with a fauorable lye told in his behalfe. But like as when we will haue a paffing fayer face drawn, and liuely counterfeited, and that hath an excellent good grace withall, yet some manner of bleamie or imperfection in it: we will not allow the drawer to leaue it out altogether, nor yet too curiously to thewe it, becaufe the one would deforme the counterfeite, and the other make it very vnlieke. Euen fo, becaufe it is hard thing (or to fay better, peraduenture impossible) to describe a man, whose life should altogether be innocent, and perfect: we must first study to wryte his vertues at large, and then by leeke perfectly to represent the troth, euen as the life it selfe. But where by chaunce we finde certaine faultes and errors in their doings, proceeding either of passion of the minde, by necessity of the time or state of the common wealth: they are rather to be thought imperfections of vertue not altogether accomplished, then any purposed wickednes proceeding of vice, or certaine malice. Which we shall not neede too curiously to expresse in our history, but rather to passe them lightly ouer, of frequent shame to the meere frailty of mans nature, which can not bringe forth a man of such vertue and perfection, but there is euer some imperfection in him. And therefore, considering with my selfe vnto whom I might compare Lucullus, I thought it best to compare him with Cimon, becaufe they haue bene both valliant souldiers against their enemies, hauing both done notable exploitcs in warres against the barbarous people: and moreover, they haue both bene courteous & mercifull vnto their citizens, & were both the only men that pacified the ciuill warres and diffention in their contrie, and both the one & the other of them were notable victories of the barbarous people. For there was neuer GREEKIAN Captaine before Cimon, nor ROMANE Captaine before Lucullus, that had made warres so farre off from their contrie leauing a parte the deedes of Bacchus and of Hercules, and the deedes also of Persus, against the ÆTHIOPIANS, the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, and the deedes of Iafon also: if there remaine any monument extant since their time, worthe of credit in these our dayes. Furthermore, herein they are to be likened together: that they neuer ended their warres, they only ouerthrew their enemies, but neuer ouercame them altogether. Again, they may note in them a great resemblance of nature, for their honestie, curtesie and humanitie, which they shewed vnto straungers in their contrie: and for the magnificence and sumptuousnes of their life and ordinarie expence. It may be we doe leaue out some other similitudes betweene them: howbeit in the discourse of their liues they will easily appeare. Cimon was the sonne of Miltiades and of Hegesypple, a THRACIAN woman borne, and the daughter of king Olorus, as we finde wrytten in certaine poeticall verses which Melanthin and Archelaus haue wrytten of Cimon. The father of Thucydides the historiographer him selfe, who was of kinne also vnto Cimon, was called in like manner Olorus, shewing by the agreeing of the name, that this king Olorus was one of his auncesters, and did also possesse mines of gold in the contry of THRACIA. It is sayd moreover that he dyed in a certaine place called the ditchie forrest, where he was slaine: howbeit that his ashes and bones were caried into the contrie of ATTICA, where his tombe appeareth yet to this day, amongst the tombes of them of the house and family of Cimon, neere vnto the tombe of Cimon owne sister called Elpinice. Notwithstanding, Thucydides was of the village of ALIMVS, and Miltiades of the village of LACIA. This Miltiades Cimon's father, being condemned by the state to pay the summe of fifty talentes, was for non payment cast into prison, and there dyed: and left Cimon and his sister Elpinice aloue, both Orphanes, and very young. Now, Cimon in his first young years had a very ill name and reporte in the city, being counted a riotous young man, & a great drinker, following his grandfather Cimon's facions vp and downe, as he had also his name: fauing that his grandfather for his beastlines was surnamed Coalemos, as much to say as foole. Stesimbrotus THASIAN, who was about Cimon's time, wryteth, that Cimon neuer learned musike, nor any other of the liberal sciences accountably taught to young noble mens sonnes of GREECE, & that he had no sharpe wit, nor good grace of speaking, a vertue proper vnto children born in the contry of ATTICA: howbeit that he was of a noble minde, and plaine, without dissimulation, so that he rather liued PELOPONNESIAN like, then like an ATHENIAN. For he was euen such as the Poet Euripides described Hercules to be:

A simple man he was, and should not well disguise:

honest eke in things of weight, as wit could well desire.

Thus serued fely to be applied vnto Stesimbrotus words wrytten of him: but notwithstanding in his first young years he was suspected of inconciny with his sister, who in deede otherwise had no very good name. For she was very familiar with the painter Polygnotus, who painting the TROIAN Ladies prisoners, vpon the walls of the gallery, called the Plesianaction, and now Pasile: (to say, set out and beautified with diuers pictures) he drew (as they say) Laoertes face vpon Elpinice's picture. This painter Polygnotus was no common artificer nor hireling, that painted this gallery for moneys sake, but gaue his labor frankly to the common wealth, as all the historiographers that wrote in that time do witness: and as the Poet Melan-

thus also recited in these verses:

At his owne proper charge, great cost he hath bestowed:

In decking up our temples here, with gilted rooves embowed,

For honor of the goddess. And in our towne liue to use,

He hath aduor'd the common place, with many a fine devise.

Some say that Elpinice did not secretly companie with her brother Cimon, but lay with him openly as his lawfull married wife, becaufe she could not for her pouerty haue a husband of like nobilitie and parentage to her selfe. Howbeit, that a certaine man called Callias, being one of the richest men of the citie, did afterwards fall in fanfic with her, and desired to marry her, offering to pay her father Miltiades fine of fifty talentes, wherein he stood condemned a litle to the state, so that he might haue her to his wife. Cimon was contented, and vpon that condition married his sister Elpinice vnto Callias. This notwithstanding, it is certaine that Cimon was somewhat amorous, and geuen to loue women: For Melanthin the Poet in certaine of his elegies, maketh mention for his pleasure of one Asperia borne at SALAMINA; and of another called Amestras, as if Cimon had bene in loue with them. But vndoubtedly, he loued his lawfull wife Hodice maruelous well, the daughter of Eurypolemus, Metacalus sonne, and tooke her death very grieuouſly, as we may coniecture by the elegies that were wrytten vnto him, to comforte him in his sorowe. Panasius the Philosopher is of opi-

mon, that Archelaus the Phisician wrote those elegies: and sure it is not vnlike, considering the time in which they were wrytten. But furthermore, Cimon's nature and condicions deserued great commendation. For his valliantnesse he gaue no place vnto Miltiades, and for his wisdom and iudgement, he was not inferior vnto Themistocles: and it is out of all doubt that he was a iuster and honest man, then either of them both. For he was equal with the best of either of both in the discipline of warres, and for the valliantnesse of a noble Captaine: and he did much excell them both in the properties of a good gouernor, and in that administration of the affayres of a citie, when he was but a young man, and had no experience of warres. For when Themistocles at the comming in of the MEDES counselled the people of ATTICA to goe out of the citie, to leaue their landes and contrie, and to shippe into gallies; and fight with the barbarous people by sea in the straight of SALAMINA: as euerie man was wondering at his bolde and venturous counsell, Cimon was the first man that went with a life and iollie through the strette Cerameus, vnto the castell, accompanied with his younge familiars and companions, carrying a bitte of a bridle in his hand to conuolate vnto the goddesse Minerva, signifying thereby, that the citie had no neede of men at that time; but of iustiters and seamen. And after he had geuen vp his offering, he tooke one of the targettes that hong vpon the wall of the temple; and hauing made his prayer vnto Minerva, came downe to the haue, and was the first that made the most parte of the citizens to take a good harte to them, and coragiously to leaue the land, and take the sea. Besides all this, he was a man of a goodly stature, as Ion the Poet reſtifieth; and he had a fayer curled haire and eies, and fought so valliantly at the day of the battell, that he was immediately great reputations, with the loue and good will of euerie man. So that many were full about him to encourage him, to be liuely and valliant; and to thinke thence forth to doe some actes worthie of the glorie that his father had gotten at the battell of MARATHON. And afterwarde, so soone as he beganne to deale in matters of state, the people were maruelous glad of him, and were wearied with Themistocles; by meanes whereof Cimon was preiently aduanced and preferred, to the chiefe offices of honor in the citie, being very well thought on of the common people, because of his soft and plaine nature. Moreover, Aristides also did greatly further his aduancement, because he saw him of a good gentle nature, and for that he would vie him as a countereale to controul Themistocles craft and stownesse. Wherefore after the Medes were fled out of GREECE, Cimon being sent for by the ATHENIANS for their generall by sea, when the citie of ATHENS had then no manner of rule nor commandement, but followed kinge Paufanias and the LACEDÆMONIANS: he euer kept his contrie men and citizens in maruelous good order in all the viages he made, and they were readier to doe good seruice, then any other nation in the whole armie whatsoever. And when kinge Paufanias had practised with the barbarous people to betraye GREECE, had wrytten also to the kinge of PERSIA about it, and in the meane time delt very cruelly and straightly with the confederates of his contrie, and committed many insolent partes by reason of the great authority he had, & through his foolish pride whereof he was full: Cimon satte otherwise, gently entertained them whom Paufanias iniured, and was willing to heare them. So that by this his courteous manner, the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing no eye to his doings, he stale away the rule and commandement of all GREECE from them, & brought the ATHENIANS to be sole Lordes of all, not by force and cruelty, but by his sweete tongue, and gracious manner of vsing all men. For the most parte of the confederates being no longer able to away with Paufanias pride and cruelty, came willingly and submitted them selues vnder the protection of Cimon and Aristides; who did not only receive them, but wrote also to the counsell of the Ephores at LACEDÆMON, that they should call Paufanias home, for that he dishonored SPARTA, and put all GREECE to much trouble and wraue. And for prooffe hereof, they say that kinge Paufanias being on a time in the citie of BYZANTION sent for Cleonece, a young maiden of a noble house, to take his pleasure of her. Her parents durst not keepe her from him, by reason of his crueltie, but suffered him to cary her away. The young gentlewoman prayed the groomes of Paufanias chamber to take away the lightes and thinking in the darke to come to Paufanias bed that was a sleepe, groping for the bed softly as she could to make no noyse, she vnfortunatly hit against the lampe, and ouerthrew it. The falling of the lampe made such a noyse, that it waked him on the sodaine, and thought straight therewithall that some of his enemies had bene comen traitorically to kill him, when upon he tooke his dagger lying vnder his beddes head, and so stabbed it in the young virgins, that she dyed immediatly vpon it. Howbeit the neuer let Paufanias take rest after that, because her spirite came euery night and appeared vnto him, as he would sleepe haue sleept, and thus he angry to him in verie, as followeth:

Keepe thou thy selfe vpright, and iustice see thou feare, For vnoye and shame be vnto him, that iustice dequand doth beare.

This vile fact of his did so stirre vp all the confederates against him, that they came to besiege him in BIZANTIUM vnder the conduction of Cimon: from whom notwithstanding he escaped, and secretly saued him selfe. And because that this maidens spirite would neuer let him rest, but vexed him continually: he fled vnto the city of HABACIA, where there was a temple that conured dead spirites, & there was the spirite of Cleonece conured, to pray him to be conured. So he appeared vnto him, & told him that he should be deliuered of all his troubles so soone as he came to SPARTA: signifying thereby (in my opinion) the death which he should suffer there. Diuers wryters do thus report it. Cimon being accompanied with the confederates of the GREECIANS, which were come to him to take his parte: was aduerted that certaine great men of PERSIA, & allyed to the king himselfe, who kept the city of EIONE vpon the riuer of Strymon in the contrie of THRACIA, did great hurt and damage vnto the GREECIANS inhabiting thereabouts. Vpon which intelligence he tooke the sea, with his armie, and went thither: where at his first coming he vanquished and ouerthrew the barbarous people in battell: & hauinge ouerthrowen them, drave all the rest into the city of EIONE. That

A That done, he went to inuade the THRACIANS that dwelt on the other side of the riuer of Strymon, who did commonly vitell them of EIONE: and hauing driuen them to forsake the contrie, he kept it, and was Lord of the whole him selfe. Whereupon he held them that were besieged at EIONE so straightly from vitells, that Butes the king of PERSIANS Lieutenant, dispayning of the state of the citie, set fire on the same, and burnt him selfe, his frendes, and all the goodes in it. By reason whereof, the spoyle taken in that citie was but small, because the barbarous people burnt all the best thinges in it with them selues: howbeit he conquered the contrie thereabouts, and gaue it the ATHENIANS to inhabit, being a venie pleasaunte and fertile soyle. In memorie whereof, the people of ATHENS suffered him to consecrate and set vp openly three Hermes of stone, (which are foure square pillars) vpon the toppes of the which they set vp heades of Mercurye: vpon the first of the three pillars, this inscription is grauen.

And vpon the third an other.

D VVhen Mnestheus did lead forth of this citie here, An armie to the Troiane vvarres, (by Homere doth appeare) He was about the rest, that out of Gracia went:
A valliant knight, a vvorthy vvight, a Captaine excellent.
To take in hand the charge, an armie for to guide:
And eke to range them orderly, in battell to abide.

Since through the vvorld so vvide, the same and vvorthy praise,

E Now, though *Cimon*s name be not comprised in these inscriptions, yet they thought that this was a singular honor to him at that time: for neither Miliades nor Themistocles had euer thelike. For when Miliades requested the people one day that they would licence him to wear a garland of olyue boughes vpon his head: there was one Sochares, borne in the towne of DECELEA, that standing vp in open assembly spake against him, and sayd a thing that maruelously pleased the people, though in deede it was an vnthankfull recompence for the good seruice he had done to the common wealth. When you haue Miliades, (sayd he) ouercome the barbarous people alone in battell, then aske to be honored alone also. But howe was it then, that *Cimon*s seruice was so acceptable to the ATHENIANS? Yt was in myne opinion, because they had with other Captaines fought to defende them selues and their contrie only: and that vnder the conduction of Cimon, they had assailed and driuen their enemies home to their owne dores, where they conquered the cities of EIONE and of Amphipolis.

which afterwards they did inhabit with their owne citizens, and wanne there also the Ile of SCYROS, which Cimon tooke vpon this occasion. The DOLOPHANS did inhabit it, who were idle people, and liued without labor or tillage, and had bene rousers of the sea of a wonderfull long time, vsing pyracie altogether to maintaine them selues withall: so that in the end they spared not so much as the marchaunts & passengers that harbored in their hauens, but robbed certaine THESSALIANS that went thither to trafficke. And when they had taken their goodes from the, yet would they cast them in prison besides. Howbeit the prisoners found meanes to escape, & after they had saued them selues, repayed to the parliament of the AMPHICTYONS, which is a generall counsell of all the states and people of GREECE. The AMPHICTYON vnderstanding the matter, condemned the cite of the SCYRIANS to pay a great summe of money. The citizens refused to be contributaries to the payment of the fine, & bad them that they robbed the marchautes and had the goodes in their hands, pay it if they would. And therefore, bicause there was no other likely hood, but that the theues them selues should be driuen to answer the fine, they fearing it, wrote letters vnto Cimon, and willed him to come with his army, and they would deliuer their city into his hands: the which was performed. And thus Cimon hauing cōquered this Iland, draue out the DOLOPHANS thence, & ryd the sea ÆGEAN of all pirates therby. That done, remembering that the auncient Theseus, the sonne of Ægeus, flying from ATHENS came into that Iland of SCYROS, where king Lycomedes suspecting his coming had traiterously slaine him. Cimon was maruelous careful to seeke out his tombe, bicause the ATHENIANS had an oracle and prophecie, that commaunded him to bring his ashes and bones backe againe to ATHENS, and to honor him as a demy god. But they knewe not where he was buried, for that the inhabitantes of the Ilande would neuer before confesse where it was, nor suffer any man to seeke it out, till he at the last with much a doe founde the tombe, put his bones aboard the Admirall galley sumptuously decked and fet forth, and so brought them againe into his contry, four hundred years after Theseus death. For this the people thanked him maruelously, and thereby he wanne exceedingly the ATHENIANS good willes: and in memorie of him they celebrated the iudgement of the tragickall playes of the Poets. For when Sophocles the Poet, being a young man had played his first tragedy, Aphepion the president perceiuing there was great strife and contention amongst the lookers on, would not draw them by lottes that should be iudges of this play, to geue the victorie vnto that Poet that had best deserved: but when Cimon & the other Captaines were come into the Theater to see the same, (after they had made their accustomed oblatiōs vnto the god, in honor of whom these playes were celebrated) he stayed, and made them to minister an othe vnto tenne, (which were of every tribe of the people, one) and the othe being geuen, he caused the to sit as iudges to geue sentēce, which of the Poets should cary away the prize. This made all the Poetes strife and contend who best should doe, for the honor of the iudges: but Sophocles, by their sentence bare away the victory. But Æschylus (as they say) was so angry and grieved withall, that he taried not long after in ATHENS, and went for sight into SICILIA, where he dyed and was buried neere vnto the cite of GELA. Iow wryeth that he being but a young boy, newly come from CHIO vnto ATHENS, supped one night with Cimon at Laomedons house, and that after supper when they had geuen the goddes thanks, Cimon was intreated by the company to sing. And he did sing with so good a grace, that euery man praised him that heard him, & sayd he was more curious then Themistocles farre: who being in like company, and requested also to play vpon the citherne, answered them, he was neuer taught to sing nor play vpon the citherne, howbeit he could make a poore village to become a rich and mighty city. After that done, the company discoursing from one matter to an other, as it falleth out commonly in speeche, they entred in talke of Cimons doinges: and hauing rehearsed the chiefeft of them, he him selfe told one, which was the notablest and wisest parte of all the rest that euer he played. For the ATHENIANS and their confederates together, hauing taken a great number of barbarous people prisoners, in the cities of SESTOS and of BIZANTIUM the confederates to honor him withall, gaue him the preheminece to deuide the spoyle: & amongst them. Whereuppon he made the diuision, and set out the bodies of the barbarous people all naked by them selues, and layed the spoyles and their apparell by them selues. The

A confederates founde this distribution very vnequall: but neuerthelesse Cimon gaue them the choyce to choole which of the two they wouled, and that the ATHENIANS should be contented with that which they left. So there was a SAMIAN Captaine called Herophytus, that gaue the confederates counsell rather to take the spoiles of the PERSIANS, then the PERSIANS them selues, and so they did: for they tooke the spoile of the prisoners goodes and apparell, and left the men vnto the ATHENIANS. Whereupon Cimon was thought at that time of the common souldiers to be but an ill deuider of spoyle, bicause that the confederates caried away great store of chaines, karkanets, and braselets of gold, & goodly rich purple apparell after the PERSIAN facion: and the ATHENIANS brought away naked bodies of men, very tender and vnacquainted with paine and labor. But shortly after, the parentes and frendes of these prisoners, came out of PHRYGIA and LYDIA, and redeemed euery man of them at a great ranfome: so that Cimon gathered such a masse of readie money together by their ranfome, as he defrayed the whole charges of all his gallies with the same, for the space of foure monethes after, and left a great summe of money besides in the sparing treasure of ATHENS. Cimon by this meanes being nowe become riche, bestowed the goodes which he had thus honorably gotten from the barbarous people, more honorably againe, in relieuing his poore decayed citizens. For he brake vp all his hedges and inclosures, and layed them plaine and open, that trauellers passing by, and his owne poore citizens, might take as much frute thereof as they would, without any manner daunger. And furthermore, kept a continuall table in his house, not furnished with many dithes, but with meate sufficient for many persons, and where his poore contrie men were daily refreshed, that would come vnto that ordinary: so as they needed not other wise care to labor for their liuing, but might be the readier, & haue the more leasure to serue the common wealth. Yet Aristotle the Philosopher wryeth, that it was not for all the ATHENIANS indifferently, that he kept this ordinarie table: but for his poore townes men only in the village of LACIA, where he was borne. Furthermore, he had alwayes certaine young men waiting on him of his household seruantes well apparellled, & if he met by chance as he went vp and downe the cite, any olde citizen poorly arrayed, he made one of these young men strip him selfe, and chaunge apparell with the olde man: and that was very well thought of, and they all honored him for it. Moreouer, these young men caried euer good store of money about them: and when they met with any honest poore citizen in the market place, or else where, knowing his pouertie, they secretly gaue him money in his hande, and sayd neuer a worde. Which the Poet selfe Cratinus seemeth to speake of, in a comedie of his intituled the Archiloches.

Furthermore, Gorgias Leontine sayd, that Cimon got goodes to vse them, and that he vsed them to be honored by them. And Critias that was one of the thirty tyrannes of ATHENS, he willeth and desireth of the goddes in his elegies,

But the magnificence of Cimon, did farre exceede the auncient liberality, curtesie, and hospitality of the ATHENIANS: for they of all other were the first men that taught the GREECIANS through out all GREECE, how they should fow corne, and gather it to maintaine them selues withall, and also shewed them the vse of welles, and howe they should light and keepe fire. But Cimon makinge an hospitall of his owne house, where all his poore citizens were fed and relieued, and permittinge straungers that trauelled by his groundes to gather such furs there, as the time and season of the yeare yielded: he brought againe (as it were) into the world, the goodes to bein common amongst them, as the Poets say they were in the old time of Saturnes raigne. And now, where some accused this honest liberality of Cimon, obiecing that it was but to flatter the common people withall, and to winne their good willes by that meanes the manner of life he led, accompanying his liberality, did vterly confute and ouerthrow their opinions that way of him. For Cimon euer tooke parte with the nobilitie, and liued after the Lacedæmonians manner, as it well appeared, in that he was always against Themistocles, who without all compasse of reason encreased the authority and power of the people: and for this cause he ioyned with Aristides, and was against Ephialtes, who would for the peoples sake haue put downe and abolished Ariopagus court. And where all other gouernors in his time were extorcioners, and bribe-takers: (Aristides and Ephialtes only excepted) he to the contrary led an vncorrupt life in administration of iustice, & euer had cleane hands, whatsoever he spake or did, for the state and common wealth, and would therefore neuer take money of any man liuing. And for prooffe hereof, we finde it wrytten, that a noble man of Persia called Refaces, being a traitor to his master the king of Persia, fled on a time vnto Athens: where being continually bayted and wearied, with the common accusations of these tale bearers & picke thanks, that accused him to the people, he repayed at the length vnto Cimon, & brought him home to his owne dore two bowles, thone full of dariches of gold, and the other of dariches of siluer, which be peeces of money so called, because that the name of Darius was written vpon them. Cimon seeing this offer, fell a laughing, and asked him whether of the two he would rather chooseth: to haue him his frende, or his hirling. The barbarous noble man answered him, that he had rather haue him his frend. Then sayd Cimon to him againe, away with thy golde and siluer, and get thee hence: for if I be thy frend, that gold and siluer shall euer be at my commaundement, to take and dispose of as I haue neede. About that time beganne the confederates of the Athenians to be weary of the warres against the barbarous people, desiring thenceforth to liue quietly, and to haue leasure to manure and husband their groundes, and to traffike also, considering that they had driuen their enemies out of their contrie, and that now they did them no more hurte: by reason whereof they payed the money they were fessed at, but they would furnishe no more men nor shippes as they had done before. But the other Captaines of the Athenians compelled them to it by all the meanes they could, and prosecuted law against them that failed payment, condemning them in great fines, and that so cruelly, that they made the seignorie and dominion of the Athenians hateful vnto their confederates. Howbeit Cimon tooke a contrary course to them: for he compelled no man, but was content to take money and voyde ships of the that would not, or could not serue in their persons, being very glad to suffer them to become slothfull mongrells in their houses, by too much rest, and to transpore them selues from good souldiers which they had bene, to laborers, marchauntes, and farmers, altogether altered from armes and warres, through the beauly slothfull desire they had, to liue pleasantly at home. And contrarily, causing a great number of the Athenians one after an other to serue in gallies, he acquainted them with continuall paines in his viages: that he made them in thorte space become Lodes and masters ouer others, that gaue them pay, and entertainment. For they beganne by litle and litle to flatter and feare the Athenians, whom they saw trined continually in the warres, euer bearing armor, & carying their weapons in their hands, becoming expert souldiers at their charge, by reason of the pay they gaue them: so that in the end, they became subiects & contributaries as it were vnto the, where before they were their frendes & copanions. So as there neuer was Grecian Captaine that bridede more the crueltie and power of that mightie Persian king, then Cimon did. For, after he had driuen him out of all Greece, he left him not so, but following him foote horte, as we comonly say, before the barbarous people could take breath, or geue wile and direct order for their doings: he made so great speede, that he tooke some of their cities from them by force, and other some by practise, causing them to rebell against the king, and turne to the Grecian side. Inomuch as there was not a man of warre left for

A for the king of Persia, in all Asia, from the contrie of Ionie, directly downe to Pamphylia and furthermore, being aduertised that the kinges Captaines were vpon the coast of Pamphylia with a great armie by sea, because he would feare them in such sorte, that they should not braue any more to shewe them selues upon the sea, on this side of the Iles of the Chelidonians: he departed from the Ile of Gindos, and from the citie of Triopium, with two hundred gallies, the which at the first had bene excellently well made and deuised by Themistocles, as well for swift sayling, as for easie turning. Howbeit Cimon made them to be enlarged, to the end they might carie the greater number of men of warre in battell, to assault the enemies. And so went first against the Phaselites, who were Grecians borne, and yet notwithstanding would neuer take the Grecians parte, nor receiue their armie into their haues: landed there, destroyed all the contrie, and then came and camped with his armie hard at their walles. But the men of Chio being auncient frendes of the Phaselites, and to Cimon's armie at that iorney: did somewhat pacifie his anger, and gaue aduertisement to them of the title of their doings by letters, which they tyed to their arrowes, and shotte ouer the walles. So as in the end they procured their peace with condition, that the Phaselites should pay ten talentes for a fine: and furthermore should also follow the armie of the Grecians, and from thenceforth fight with them, and for them, against the barbarous people. Now Ephorus sayth, that the Persian Captaine that had charge of the armie by sea, was called Tithraustes, and the Captaine of the armie by land, Phereclates. But Callisthenes wryteth, that Arimandes the sonne of Gobrias, was the kinges Lieutenaut, hauinge chiefe authority ouer the whole armie that lay at anker, before the riuier of Eurymedon, & had no desire to fight, because they looked for a new supply of fourescore sayle of the Phenicians, that should come to them from Cyprus. But Cimon contrarily, fought to fight before these gallies of the Phenicians came to ioyne with them, and put his gallies in order of battell, determining to geue a charge, and to compell them to fight, would they; or would they not. Which the barbarous people perceiuing, drew neerer into the mouth of the riuier Eurymedon, because they should not compasse them in beehinde, nor force them to come to battell against their willes. Which notwithstanding, when they saw the Athenians come to set upon them where they lay, they made out against them, a flecte of sixe hundred sayle, as Phereclates declareth: or as Ephorus wryteth, three hundred and fifty sayle only. But they did nothinge worthe of so great a power, at the least touchinge the fight by sea, but turned their prooes straight to the riuier: where such as could recouer the mouth thereof in time, saved them selues, flying to their armie by land, which was not farre from that place set also in order of battell. But the rest that were taken tardy by the way, they were slaine, and their gallies sonke or taken: whereby we may know that there were a great number of them, for many were slayed as it is likely, and many also were splitted to peeces, and yet the Athenians tooke two hundred of them prisoners. In the meane season, their armie by land came neerer to the sea side: which Cimon perceiuing, stood in some doubt whether he should lande his men or not: because it seemed a hard & daungerous thing vnto him, to land in spight of his enemies: and to put forth the Grecians already wearied with the first battell against the barbarous people, who were altogether whole, freshe, and lustie, and withall many in number against one. Neuerthelesse, perceiuing that his men trusted in their force; besides the corage which the first victorie gaue them, and that they desired none other thing but to fight with the enemies: he put them a land while they were whorpe yet with the first battell. And so with great furie and lowde cries they ranne immediatly against the barbarous people, who stood still & sturded not, & receiued their first charge very valliantly: by reason whereof, the battell grew sharpe and bloody inomuch as there were slaine all the greatest personages & men of best accompt of all the Athenians armie. But the other fought it out so valliantly, that in the ende they wanne the field, and with maruelous difficultie made the barbarous people flye, whereof they slue a great number in the place, and tooke the rest prisoners with all their tents & pauillions, which were full of all fortres of riches. Thus Cimon like a valliant champion of the holy games, hauing in one selfe day wonne two victories, and hauing excelled the battell by sea also, which the Grecians had wonne within the channell of Salamina, with that which he wanne then vpon the lande: and the battell which the GRÆCIANS wanne by lande before the they PLATEES, with that which he wanne the day before on the seay: he was not contented with all this. For, after two so famous victories obtained, he would once againe fight for the honor of the tokens of triumphe: and being aduertised that the foure score sayle of the PERSIANS (comming too late to be present at the first battell by sea) were arrived at the head of Hydra, he layed thither with all possible speede. Now the Captaines of this fleet, knowing the certainty of the ouerthrow of their chiefe armie, but stood in doubt of it, and would not be perswaded that it was ouerthrowen in that sorte: and therefore were they so much the more affrayed, when they descried a farre of the victorious armie of Cimon. To conclude, they had all their shippes, & the greatest parte of their men, which were either drowned or slaine. The victorie against the PERSIANS did so dawne and plucke downe the pride and losie mind of the barbarous PERSIAN king, as he made that condicon of peace so much spoken of in ancient histories, in the which he promised and sware, that his armiees thenceforth should come no neerer to the GRÆCIAN sea, then the carriere of a horse, and that he would fayle no further forward, then the Iles Chelidonians, and Cyaneans, with any gallies or other shippes of warre. Howbeit the historiographer Callisthenes wryteth, that it was no parte of any condicon copried within the condicon of peace, but that the king kept it for the feare he had of Cimon: great an ouerthrow: and that afterwarde he kept so farre from the GRÆCIAN sea, that Pericles with fiftie sayle, and Ephialtes with thirty onely, did sayle beyonde the Iles Chelidonians, and no barbarous fleet euer came against them. Yet notwithstanding all this, amongst the common actes of Athenes, which Craterus hath gathered together, the articles of this peace are found wrytten at large, as a thing that was true in deede. And it is sayd, that for this occasion the Athenians built an altar of peace, and that they did Callias great honor, for that he was sent Ambassador vnto the king of Persia to take his othe for confirmation of this peace. So whe all these spoiles of the enemies were sold to the that would geue most, there was such store of gold and siluer in the sparing cofers of their treasure, that there was enough to serue their turne for any seruice they would employ it to, & besides that, they had sufficient to build vp the side of the wall of the castell which looketh towards the south, this voyage and spoyle did so enrich them. And it is sayd moreover, that the building of the long walles that ioyned to the citie with the haven, which they call the legges, was built & finished afterwards: howbeit the first fundacions thereof were built with the money Cimon gaue towards it, so that the worke met with moorish and watery places, by meane whereof they were driuen to fill vp the marishes, with force of flyntes & great logges, which they threw vnto the bottom. It was he also that first did beautifie and set forth the citie of Athenes, with places of liberall exercise and honest pastime, which shortly after were much esteemed. For he caused plant trees to be set in the market place: and the Academic which before was very drye and naked, he made it now a pleasant groue, and full of goodly springes which he brought into it, and made fine covered arbors to walke in, and goodly long smooth allies to runne a good comely in. On a time he had newes brought him, that certaine PERSIANS dwelling in Cherronesvs, (to say a demy Ile of the contrie of Thracia) would not be gotten out, but sent to the people of high Thracia, to pray their aide to defend them selues against Cimon: of whom they made but litle accompt, because he was departed from Athenes with a very few shippes, who set vpon them only with foure gallies, and tooke thirtene of theirs. And so hauing driuen the PERSIANS out of Cherronesvs, and subdued the Thracians, he conquered all the contrie of Cherronesvs, from Thracia vnto his owne contrie. And departing from thence vnto the Ile of Thasos, that had rebelled against the Athenians, and hauing ouercome them in battell by sea, he wanne three and thirtie of their shippes, and besides that tooke their citie by siege, and wanne the mynes of golde lying beyonde the same to the Athenians, with all the lands that belonged vnto them. This conquest made his way open into Macedon, and gaue him great oportunitie to haue taken the best parte thereof at that present time. But because he let it alone, and followed not that oportunitie, he was suspected to haue taken money, and to haue bene bribed by presentes of king Alexander: whereupon, his secret enemies layed their heades together, and accused him. But Cimon to clear him Cimon brought the king of Persia to condicon of peace.

Callias sent Ambassador to take the othe of the king of Persia.

Cimon was at the charge of certaine common buildings.

Cimon drove the Persians out of Thracia.

Cimon accused and discharged.

A him selfe before the iudges of this accusation, sayd vnto them: I haue practised frendshippe neither with the Ionians, nor yet with the Thessalians, both which are very niche and wealthie people: neither haue I taken their matters in hand, as some other haue done, to reueille both honor and profit by them. But in deede I am a frende to the Lacedæmonians, for I confesse I loue them, and desire to followe their sobrietie, and temperance of life, the which I preferre and esteeme aboue any riches or treasure: although I am very glad howwithstanding to enrich our state and common wealth with the spoyles of our enemies. Steimbrotus reporteth this accusation, and sayth: that his sister Elpinice went to Pericles house. (who was the sharpest and straightest accuser of his) to pray him not to deale so extremely with her brother: and that Pericles laughing on her, sayd, alas, thou art too old, Elpinice, thou now tooeuer come these matters. Yet for all that, when Cimon's cause came to hearinge, he was a more gentle aduersarie, then any other of his accusers, and rose vp but once to speake against him, and that for manners sake only: so that Cimon thereby escaped, and was cleared of this accusation. And furthermore, so long as he was present in Athenes, he alwayes kept the seditious people in obedience, who would euer crosse and thwart the authoritie of the nobilitie, because they would haue all the sway and rule in their owne handes. But when Cimon was sent abroade any whither to the warres, then the common people hauing no bodie to gainsay them, turned, and altered the gouernment of the citie tople turuey, and confounded all the ancient lawes and customes which they had obserued of long time, and that by the procurement and setting on of Ephialtes. For they tooke away all hearing of causes in maner from the court of Areopagus, & put all authoritie of matters iudicial into the handes of the people, and brought the state of the citie into a pure Democraie, to say: a common weale ruled by the sole and absolute power of the people, Pericles being then in great credit, who altogether fauored the peoples faction. Wherefore Cimon at his returne, finding that authoritie of the Senate and counsell so shamefully defaced and troden vnder foote, was maruelously offended withall, and sought to restore thaucient state of iudgement againe as it was before, and set vp the gouernment of the nobility (called Optimacie) that was established in the time of Cleisthenes. But then beganne his enemies againe with open mouth to crye out vpon him, reuiuing the olde former naughty rumor that ranne of him before, that he kept his owne sister: & furthermore accusing him, that he did fauor the Lacedæmonians. And amongst other things there ranne in the peoples mouthes the verses of the Poet Esopis, which were made against Cimon.

*No wicked man he was, but very negligent,
And there withall to wyne much more, then vnto money bent.
He stalle sometimes awry, at Sparta for to sleepe:

And if it be so, that being thus negligent & geuen to wyne, he haue gotten so many cities, and wonne such sundry great battells: it is out of doubt then that if he had bene sober & careful, there had neuer bene before him nor since any GRÆCIAN Captaine, that had passed him in glorie of the warres. In deede it is true, that from the beginning he euer loued the manner of the Lacedæmonians: for of two twynnes which he had by his wife Clitoria, he named thone of them Lacedæmonius, and thother Eleus, as Steimbrotus wryteth, saying that for that cause Pericles did euer twit them in the teeth with their mothers stocke. Howbeit Diodorus the Geographer wryteth, that both those two, and an other third called Thestalus, were borne of Isodice, the daughter of Euryptolemus, the sonne of Megacles. Howsoeuer it was, it is certaine that Cimon's credit grew the greater, by the fauor and countenance which the Lacedæmonians gaue him, who had hated Themistocles of long time, and for the malice they bare him, were glad that Cimon being but a youg man, did beare more sway in Athenes then he. Which the Athenians perceiued well enough, and were not offended withall at the beginning: because the goodwill of the Lacedæmonians towards him, did bring them great commodity. For when the Athenians beganne to growe of great power, and to practise secretly that the confederats of the GRÆCIANS should forsake the Lacedæmonians to ioine with them: the Lacedæmonians were not angrie withall, for the honor and loue they bare vn-

to Cimon, who did alone in maner manedge all thaffayres of Greece at that time, bicause he was very curteous vnto the confederates, and also thankfull vnto the Lacedæmonians. But afterwarde when the Athenians were aloft and of great power, and that they saw Cimon stucke not for a litle matter with the Lacedæmonians, but loued them more then they would haue had him: they beganne then to enuy him, bicause in all his matters he had to do, he euer highly praised and extolled the Lacedæmonians before them. But specially, when he would reprove them of any fault they had committed, or that he would perswade them to do any thing: the Lacedæmonians, sayd he, I warrant ye do not so. That, as Strabo layth, made him maruelously to be maliced of the people. But the chiefest thing they accused him of, and that most did hurt him, fell out vpon this occasion. The fourth yeare of the reaigne of Archidamus, the sonne of Zeuxidamus king of Sparta, there fortuned the wonderfulllest and most fearefull earthquake in the cite of Lacedæmon, and thereabouts, that euer was heard of. For the earth in many places of the contrie opened, and fell as into a bottomlesse pit. The mountaine Taygetum shooke so terribly, that points of rockes fell downe from it. All the cite was layed on the ground and ouerthrowen, fise houses only excepted, the rest being wholly destroyed. And it is said also, that a lile before this earthquake came, the young men of that cite were playing with the young boyes exercising the selues starke naked vnder a great gallery couered ouer: & as they were sporting together, there started vp a hare hard by them. The young men spying her, ranne after the hare starke naked and oyled as they were, with great laughter. They were no sooner gone thence, but the top of the gallery fell downe upon the boyes that were left, and squashed them all to death. And in memorie of the same, the tombe where they were afterwarde buried, is called vnto this day Sismarias, as much to say, as the tombe of those which the earthquake had slaine. But king Archidamus foreseeing straight vpon the fodaine the danger that was to come, by that he law present, perceiving his citizens busie in sauing their householde stuffe, and that they were running out of their houses: made the trompetters to sound a hotte alarome vpon it, as if their enemies had come stealingly vpon them to take the cite, to thende that all the inhabitants should presently repayre vnto him (settinge all busines aparte) with armor and weapon. That fodaine alarome doublelesse saued the cite of Sparta at that time: for the Ilotes, which are their slaues and bondmen in the contrie of Laconia, and the contrie clownes of litle villages thereabouts, came running armed out of all partes, to spoyle and robbe them vpon the fodaine, that were escaped from this earthquake. But when they found them well armed in order of battell, they returned backe againe as they came: and then beganne afterwarde to make open warres vpon them, when they had drawen certaine of their neighbors vnto their confederacie, & specially the Messenians, who made hotte warres vpon the Spartans. Whereuppon the Lacedæmonians sent Periclidus vnto Athens to demaunde ayde: whome Aristophanes the Poet mocking, sayed.

Against whom Ephialtes also spake very much, protesting that they should not ayde nor relieue a city that was an enemy vnto Athens, but rather suffer it to fall to the ground, and to spurne the pride and arrogancy of Sparta vnder their feete. But Cimon (as Crisias saith) being more carefull for the benefit of Sparta, then for thenlarging and encreasing of his country: brought it to passe by his perswasion, that the Athenians sent him thither with a great power to helpe them. And furthermore Ion rehearseth the very selfe wordes that Cimon spake to moue the people to graunt his request. For he besought them that they would not suffer Greece to halte, as if Lacedæmon had bene one of her feete, and Athens the other: not to suffer their cite to lose an other cite their friend, and subiect to the yoke and defence of Greece. Hauing therefore obtayned ayde, to leade vnto the Lacedæmonians, he went with his army through the Corinthians contry: wherewith Lachartus a Captaine of Corinth was maruelously offended, sayinge, that he should not haue entred into their contry with an armie, before he had asked licence of them of the cite. For sayd he, when one knocketh at a mans dore or gate, yet he commeth not in, before the master of the house commaundeth him.

A him. But ye Corinthians (sayed Cimon to him againe) haue not knocked at the gates of the Cleonians, nor of the Megarians, to come in, but haue broken them open, and entred by force of armes, thinkinge that all should be open vnto them that are the stronger. Thus did Cimon stoutly aunswere the Corinthian Captaine againe, bicause it stood him vpon, and so went on with his armie through the contrie of Corinth. Afterwarde the Lacedæmonians sent againe vnto the Athenians, to require ayde against the Messenians and the Ilotes, (which are their slaues) who had wonne the cite of Ithome. But when the Athenians were come, the Lacedæmonians were afayed of the great power they had brought, and of their boldnes besides: wherefore they sent them backe againe, and would not imploy them of all other their confederates that came to their succor, bicause they knew them to be men very tickle, desiring change and alteracions. The Athenians returned home, mistaking much that they were sent backe againe: inasmuch as euer after they hated them that fauored the Lacedæmonians in any thing. And for the Lacedæmonians sake therefore, taking a small occasion of offence against Cimon, they banished him out of their contrie for tenne yerres: which was the full terme appointed and limited vnto them that were banished with the Ostracism banishment. Now within the terme of these tenne yerres, the Lacedæmonians fortuned to undertake the deliuey of the cite of Delfes, from the seruitude and bondage of the Phocians, and to put them from the custodie and keeping of the temple of Apollo, which is in the sayd city. Wherefore, to obtaine their desire and purpose, they came to plante their campe neere vnto the cite of Tanagre in Phocide, where the Athenians went to fight with them. Cimon vnderstanding this, although he was in exile, came to the Athenians campe armed, with intent to do his duty to fight with his contrie men against the Lacedæmonians, and so went into the bandes of the tribe Oeneide, of the which he was him selfe. But his owne contrie enemies cried out against him, and sayd, that he was come to none other ende, but to trouble the order of their battell, of intent that he might afterwarde bring them to the city selfe of Athens. Whereuppon the great councill of the fise hundred men were afayed, and sent to the Captaines to commaunde them they should not receiue him into the battell: so that Cimon was compelled to departe the campe. But before he went, he prayed Euthippus Anaphlystian, and his other frendes that were suspected as him selfe was, to fauor the Lacedæmonians doings: that they should doe their best endeour to fight valliantly against their enemies, to thintent their good seruice at that battell might purge their innocencie towards their contry men: and so they did. For the Athenians keeping the souldiers Cimon had brought with him, which were a hundred in all, they set them aparte by them selues in a squadron, and fought it so valliantly and desperately, that they were slaine euery man of them in the field, leauing the Athenians maruelous fory for them, and repenting them that they had so vniustly mistrusted them as traitors to their contrie. Wherefore they kept not their malice long against Cimon, partly as I am perswaded, bicause they called his former good seruice to minde which he had done to their contrie aforetime, and partly also, bicause the necessitie of the time so required it. For the Athenians hauing lost a great battell before Tanagre, looked for no other about the spring of the E year, but that the Peloponnesians would inuade them with a great power: wherefore, they reuoked Cimon's banishment by decree, whereof Pericles selfe was the only author & procurer. So ciuill and temperate were mens enimities at that time, regarding the common benefit of their publicke state and weale: and so much did their ambition (being the most vehement passion of all other, and that most troubleth mens mindes) geue place, and yeelde to the necessities and affayres of the common weale. Now when Cimon was againe returned to Athens, he straight pacified the warre, & reconciled both cities together. And when he saw that the Athenians could not liue in peace, but would be doing still, and enlarge their dominions by warre, for lukers sake: to prevent them that they should not fall out with any of the Grecians, nor by scowring and coasting vp and downe the contrie of Peloponnesus, and the Iles of Greece, with so great a naue, should moue occasion of ciuill warres amongst the Grecians, or of complaints vnto their confederates against them: he rigged & armed out two hundred gallies to go againe to make warre in Cyperus, & in Egypt.

bicaufe he would acquaint the ATHENIANS with the warres of the barbarous people, and thereby make them lawfull gainers by the spoyles of those their naturall borne enemies. But when all things were in readines to departe, and the armie prest to shippe and sayle away: Cimon dreaming in the night had this vision. It seemed vnto him that he saw a bitch argue with him, and barking earnestly at him, & that in the middest of her barking, she spake with a mans voyce, and sayd vnto him:

Come hardily, spare not: for if thou come by me,

My vnhelpes, and I which here do stand, will quickly welcome thee.

This vision being verie hard to interpret, Astrophilus borne in the cite of POSIDONIA, a man expert in such coniectures, and Cimons familiar frende, tolde him that this vision did betoken his death, expounding it in this sorte. The dogge commonly is an enemy to him he barketh at. Again, nothing gladdeth our enemy more, then to heare of our death. Furthermore, the mingling of a mans voyce with the barking of a bitch, signifieth nothing els, but an enemy of the MEDS: bicaufe the armie of the MEDS is mingled with the barbarous people and the GRÆCIANS together. Besides this vision, as he did sacrifice to the god Bacchus, the Priest opening the beast after it was sacrificed, about the blood that fell to the ground, there assembled a swarme of antes, which caried the congealed blood of from the ground by lide and lide, and layed it all about Cimons great toe, a great while together before any man marked it: Cimon at the last spied it by chance, and as he was looking of them to marke what they did, the minister of the sacrifice brought the beastes liuer that was sacrificed, to shew him, whereof the biggest end that they call the head was lacking, and this they iudged for a very ill token. Notwithstanding, hauing all things readie for preparation of this iorney, so as he could not well goe backe, he launched into the sea, and hoysed sayle, and sending three score of his gallies into EGYPT, sayled with the rest vpon the coast of PAMPHYLIA. Where he wanne a battell by sea of the king of PERSIA, ouercomming the gallies of the PHENICIANS and the CILICIANS, and conquered all the cities thereabouts, making the way very open to enter into EGYPT. For he had no small thoughtes in his minde, but reached to high enterprises, and determined vterly to destroy the whole Empire of the mighty kinge of PERSIA, and specially for that he vnderstoode Themistocles was in maruelous credit and reputation amongst the barbarous people, bicaufe he had promised the king of PERSIA to lead his armie for him, and to doe him notable seruice whensoever he shoulde haue occasion to warre with the GRÆCIANS. It is thought this was the chiefe cause that made Themistocles poison himselfe, bicaufe he dispaired that he could not performe that seruice against GRÆCI which he had promised: assuring him selfe that it was no easie matter to vanquish Cimons courage, and good fortune, who lay at that time with his armie all alongest the Ile of CYPRVS, promising him selfe great matters at that instant. But in the meane season, Cimon sent certaine of his men vnto the oracle of Iuppiter Ammon, to aske him some secret question: for no man euer knew neither then nor since, for what cause he had sent them thither, neither did they also bring backe any answer. For they were no sooner come thither, but the oracle commaunded them straight to returne: saying vnto them, that Cimon was then coming to him. So Cimons men receiuing this answer, left the oracle, and tooke their iorney backe to the seawardes. Now when they were commen againe to the GRÆCIANS campe, which at that present lay in EGYPT, they heard that Cimon was departed this worlde: and reckoning the dayes sence his death, with the instant of their answer receiued by the oracle, that Cimon was then coming vnto him: they knew straight that darkely he had signified his death vnto them, and that, at that very time he was with the goddess. He dyed at the siege of the cite of CITIVM in CYPVS, as some reporte, or else of a hurte he receiued at a skirmishe, as other holde opinion. When he dyed, he commaunded them that were vnder his charge, to returne into their contry againe, and in no case to publishe his death: which commaundement was so wisely and cunningly handlede, that they all came home safe, and not an enemy, nor any of their confederates that once vnderstoode any thing of it. So was the armie of the GRÆCIANS gouerned and led by Cimon, though him selfe was dead, the space of thirtie dayes, as Phanodemus wryteth: But after his death, there was no GRÆCIAN Cap-

Cimons death kept very secret.

A raine that did any notable thing worthe of fame against the barbarous people, bicaufe the Orators and gouernors of the chiefest cities of GRÆCE stirred them vp one against another, and there was no man that would once steppe in as a mediator to make peace betwene them. And thus the GRÆCIANS now did one destroy and spoyle another by ciuill warre amongst them selues: which happily gaue the king of PERSIA leaue and time to restore him selfe againe, and contrarily was cause of such viteruine and destruction of the whole power and force of GRÆCE, as no tongue can well expresse. In deede a long time after, kinge Agesslaus came with an armie of the GRÆCIANS into ASIA, and beganne a small warre against the Lieutenantes of the king of PERSIAES gouernors of the lower contries of ASIA. But before he could doe any notable exployte, he was called home againe by occasion of new troubles and ciuill warres risinge amongst the GRÆCIANS, and compelled to returne into his contrie, leauing the treasurers of the king of PERSIA, raising of subsidies and taxes vpon the cities of the GRÆCIANS in ASIA, although they were confederates of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereas in the time that Cimon gouerned, they neuer saw any of the kinges sergeauntes at armes, or commissioner, that brought any letters patenttes or commaundement from the king, or any souldier that durst come nere the sea, by fortie furlonges. The tombes which they call vnto this present day Cimonia, doe witness that his ashes and bones were brought vnto ATHENS. Neuerthelesse, they of the cite of CITIVM doe honor a certaine tombe, which they say is Cimons tombe: bicaufe that in a great dearth and barrennes of the earth, they had an oracle that commaunded them, not to neglect Cimon, as the Orator Nausiferates writeth it, but to honor and reuerence him as a god. Such was the life of this GRÆCIAN Captaine.

THE LIFE OF Lucius Lucullus.

The Romans

Lucullus eloquence.

AS for LUCULLUS, his grandfather was a Consul, and so was Metellus (surnamed Nuclidius, because of his conquest of NUMIDIA) his vnckle by the mothers side. His father notwithstanding was conuict of felony, for robbing the treasure of the state whilest he was officer: and Caelia his mother was reported to haue led an vnchaste life. But for Lucul-lus selfe, before he bare office, or rule in matters of state: the first thing he toucht and tooke in hande for the cause of his contrie was, the accusation of Seruilus the soothsayer (who before had accused his father) for that he also had delt falsly in his office, and deceiued the common wealth. And this the ROMANES thought very well handled of him, inso much as a pretie while after there was no other talke in ROME but of that matter, as though it had bene a notable valliant acte done by him. For otherwise, though priuately they had no iust occasion, yet they thought it a noble deede to accuse the wicked, and it pleased them as much to see the young men put lawe breakers in sute, as to see a notable good course of a dogge at a hare. Howebeit there followed such sturre and bandinge vpon this sute, that some were verie sore hurte, and other flaine in the market place: but in fyne, Seruilus was cleared and quite dismissed. Lucullus was verie eloquent, well spoken, and excellently well learned in the Greeke and Latin tongue: inso much as Sylla dedicated vnto him the commentaries of all his doings which himselfe had collected, as to one that could better frame a whole historie thereof, and cowche it more elo-quently together in wryting. For he had not only a ready tongue to vter that he would speake, and pleade his matters with great eloquence, as other be seene to doe, hauing matters of sute or open audience.

For Lucullus had studied humanitie from his youth, and was well learned in all the liberal sciences: but when he came to elder yeares, to refresh his witte (after great troubles)

he

As he fell to the studie of Philosophie, which quickened the contemplative parte of his soule, & mored, or at the least sometimes bridled the ambitious and active parte, especially after the dissension betwixt him and Pompey. But to acquaint you better with his learning yet, it is said, that when he was a young man, he layed a great wager with Hortensius the Orator, and Ser-fennus the historiographer (in iest as it were at the first, but afterwards it fell to good earnest) that he would write the breuiary of the warres of MARCEVM in verse or prose, in the Latin or Greeke tongue, which fouer fell to his lotte: and I thinke his happe was to doe it in prose in the Greeke tongue, because we finde a litle Greeke storie extant of the warres of the RO-MANES against the MARSIANS. He dearly loued his brother Marcus Lucullus, as appeared by many manifest proofes: but the chiefe and most noted prooffe among the ROMANES was this. Him selfe was elder then his brother Marcus, and yet for all that would neuer sue to beare office in the common wealth, nor accept any before his brother, but taried alwayes till he should be chosen, and let his owne time passe ouer. This great curtesie to his brother for wanne the peoples hartes, as Lucius being absent, they chose him Edilis, and his brother Marcus with him for his sake. He was in the flower of his youth in the time of the MARSIANS warres, wherein he did many wife and valliant deedes. The cause notwithstanding that moued Sylla to make choyce of him, was rather for his constancy, & good curteous nature, then for any other respect. For when Sylla had once wonne him, he euer after employed him continually in his most weightie causes: as in a commission specially, he gaue him to coyne money. For in deede parte of the money that Sylla spent in the warres against king Mithridates, was coyned by Lucullus commandement within the contrie of PELOPONNESVS: whereupon they were called Lucullian peeces, and were currant a longe time amongst the soldierys, to buy such things as they stood in nede of, and neuer refused by any. Sylla being afterwards at ATHENS, the stronger by land, but the weaker by sea, so as his enemies cut of his vittells from him: sent Lucullus into EGYPT and LIBYA to bring him such shippes as he found in those partes. It was in the deepe of winter, and yet he spared not to faye with three brigantines of GREECE, and as many galliots of the RHODIANS, putting himselfe not only to the danger of the sea in so long a voyage, but of his enemies in like maner: who knowing them selues to be the stronger, went faying euery where with a great naue. But for all these daungers, he first arrived in the Ile of CRUTA, and wanne their goodwilles. From thence went to the cite of CYRANE, where he found the inhabitants turmoyled with ciuil warres, and continuall oppressions of tyrans: from which troubles he deliuered them, and gaue them lawes to establishe gouernement amongst them, putting them in remembrance of Platoes wordes spoken to their auncesters in old time, in the spirite of a prophetic. For when they prayed Plato to write them lawes, and to appoint them some forme of gouernment for their common wealth, he made them aunswere: it was a hard thing to geue lawes to so riche and fortunate peoples as they were. For to say truly, as nothing is harder to be ruled, then a rich man: so contrarily, nothing readier to receiue counsell and gouernment, then a man in aduersity. This lesson framed the CYRANE-SIANS at that time to be more ciuill and obedient to the lawes Lucullus gaue them. When he departed thence, he coasted towards EGYPT, where he lost the more parte of his shippes by pyrates: but for his owne person, escaping their hands, he was very honorably receiued in the cite of ALEXANDRIA. For all the kinges armie came to meete him at sea, gallantly trimmed and appointed, as they were wont to welcome home the king when he returned from any voyage by sea: and king Protomye himselfe being very young at that time, gaue him as honorable entertainment as he possible could. For amongst other honors that he did him, he lodged him in his course, and defrayed his ordinarie dyet, where neuer strange Captaine was lodged before: and did not only spend the ordinary allowance in feasting of him which he vsed vnto others, but commaunded foure times as much prouision more to be made as he had before. Notwithstanding, Lucullus tooke no more then reasonable was for his person: not yet would he receiue any manner, gift although the king had sent him presents to the value of foure score talentes. And which more is, would not so much as go see the cite of MAMPIS, nor any other of the famous monuments and wonderfull sightes in EGYPT, saying: that it was for a man that trauelled vp and downe for his pleasure, and had leasure withall, to see such things, but not for him that had left his Capitaine in the field, at the siege of the walles of his enemies. To conclude, this young king Ptoleme would in no case fall in frendshippe with La, fearing least he should thereby put him selfe into warres: but gaue him men and shippes, bringing him into CYPRVS. And as he was ready to imbarke, the king bidding him farewell, and embracing him, gaue him a goodly rich emerald set in gold, which Lucullus at the first refused, vnill the king shewed him his picture grauen in it: and then accepted the gift, fearing least the vter refusal might cause the king thinke he went away discontented, and should perhaps therefore lay an ambushe by sea for him. Thus hauing gotten a certaine number of shippes together of the porte townes thereabouts, ouer and besides such as the pyrates and sea robbers had hidden, being parte of their spoyle, and bestowed with their reccitors: went on with them into CYPRVS, where he vnderstoode that his enemies lay close in certaine creeks vnder the foreland, watching to boulder him as he sayled by. Whereupon he vnrigged and bestowed his shippes in docks, and sent worde to all the porte townes thereabouts, that he was determined to winter there: and therefore willed them to prouide him vittells & other necessarie munition to be in readines against the spring. But in the meane while, when he saw time conuenient, he put his whole flecte againe to the sea with all possible speede, went him selfe away, and in the day time caried a lowe sayle, but in the night packt on all the cloth he could for life: so that by this craftie fetch, he wanne RHODES, and lost not one shippe. The ROMANS they also furnished him with shippes: & besides the, he so perswaded the GNIDIANS and the inhabitants of the Ile of Co, that they forsooke king Mithridates, and went to make warres with him against them of the Ile of SAMOS. But Lucullus him selfe alone draue kings C Mithridates men out of CHIO, restored the COLOPHONIANS againe to libertie: and tooke Epigonus the tyranne prisoner, who had kept them in bondage. Now about that time, Mithridates was compelled to forsake the citie of PERGAMVM, and to retire to the citie of PRITANE, within the which Fimbria kept him besieged very straightly by lande. Wherefore Mithridates hauing the sea open vpon him, sent for his force and nauy out of all partes, not daring to hazard battell against Fimbria, who was very valliant, of a venturous nature, & at that time moreouer was him selfe a conqueror. Fimbria perceiuing what Mithridates ment, and hauing no power by sea of his owne: sent straight to Lucullus to request him to come with his nauie into those partes to his ayde, for thouchcomming of this king, the greatest and most cruell enemy that euer the ROMANE people had. Bicause that so notable a praye, which they followed with such daunger and trouble, should not escape the ROMANS, while they had him in their handes, and was come him selfe within their daunger: and that therefore he should so much the more harken vnto it, bicause that if it fortun'd Mithridates to be taken, no man should winne more honor and glorie by his takinge, then he that had stopp'd his passage, and layed handes on him, euen as he thought to haue fled. And thereby should the praise of this noble victorie runne in equalitie betwene them both: the one that had driuen him from lande, and the other that had stopp'd his passage by sea. And furthermore, that the ROMANS would nothinge regard all the famous battells and victories of Sylla in Greece, which he had wonne before the cities of CHERONNEA and ORCHOMENE: in comparison of taking the king. This was the effect of Fimbrias message sent vnto Lucullus, wherein there was nothing, in the which there was not great likelyhood. For there is no man that can doubt of it, but if Lucullus would haue beleued him at that time (and haue gone thither with his ships to stoppe the hauens mouth of the citie, in the which Mithridates was besieged, considering also that he was so neere at hande) this warre had taken end there, and the worlde besides had then bene deliuered of infinite troubles which fell out afterwards. But, whether Lucullus preferred the consideration and respect he had vnto Sylla, whose Lieutenant he was, before all other due regard of priuate or common benefite: or that he detested and abhorred Fimbria as a cursed person, who not long before had through his wicked ambition imbrued his hands in the blood of his Capitaine: or else that it was through the secret prouidence and permission of the goddes that he spared Mithridates at that time, to the end he might be reserved as a worthie enemy, against whom he might afterwards shew his valoure: howsoever it was, it so fell out that hearken'd not vnto Fimbrias message, but gaue Mithridates time and

And leasure to flye, and finally to scorne all Fimbrias force and power. But Lucullus selfe alone afterwards ouercame the kings armie by sea, once neere vnto the head of Lezum, which is on the coast of TROAD: and an other time neere vnto the Ile of THADOS, where Neoptolemus, Mithridates Lieutenant by sea, lay in wayte for him with a farre greater number of shippes then he had. And yet so soone as Lucullus had discied him, he sayled before all his nauie being Admirall, in a galley of the RHODES, at five ores to a bancke, whereof one Demagoras was master, a man well affected to the seruice of the ROMANS, and very skillfull in battell by sea. And when Neoptolemus on the other side rowed against him with great force, commanding his pylot that he should fo order his galley, that he might stemme him right in the prow: Demagoras as fearing the full meetinge of the kings galley which was very strong and heauie, and furthermore well armed with poyntes and spures of brasse before, durst not encounter her with his prow, but nimbly made his gallie to winde about, & turned his poupe towards him. Whereby the galley being low at that end, receiued the blow without hurte, considering that they hit vpon the dead workes, and those partes which are alwayes about water. In the meane time Lucullus other shippes were come, who commanding his master to turne the beakehead of his gallie forward, did many famous actes: so that he made his enemies flye, and draue Neoptolemus away. And departing from thence, went to seeke out Sylla laeuen as he was ready to passe ouer the seas, about CHERONESVS: holpe him to waite his armie, and so passed him ouer with safety. Afterwards when peace was concluded, and that king Mithridates was come into his realme and contries againe, which lye vpon the sea Macedonia: Sylla condemned the prouince of ASIA to pay the summe of twenty thousand talentes for a syne, by reason of their rebellion. And for leauing of this syne, left Lucullus there with commission to coyne money: which was a great comforte and hartes ease vnto the cities of ASIA, considering the extremitie that Sylla had vsed towards them. For in so grieuous and odious a commission vnto them all, as that was: Lucullus did not only behaue him selfe vprightly and iustly, but also very fauorably and curteously. For, as touching the MITYLENIANS that were openly in armes against him, he was very willing they should know their fault, and that for satisfaction of thoffence they had committed takinge Marius parte, they should suffer some light punishment. And seeing that they were furiously bent to continue in their naughtines, he went against them: and hauing ouercome them in battell, compelled them to keepe within their walles, and layed siege vnto their citie, where he vsed this policy with them. At none dayes he launched into the sea, in the view of all the MITYLENIANS, and sayled towards the citie of ELBA: howbeit in the night time secretly returned backe, and making no noyse, layed an ambushe nere vnto the citie. The MITYLENIANS mistrusting nothinge, went out the next morning very rashly without order, & without any maner watche or ward, to spoyle the campe of the ROMANS, supposing euery man had bene gone: but Lucullus comming sodainly vpon them, tooke a great number prisoners, slue about fise hundred such as resisted, and wanne fixe thousande slaues, with an infinite quantitie of other spoyle. Now did the goddes happily preferre Lucullus, that he was no partaker at that time of the wonderfull miseries and troubles, which Sylla and Marius made poore ITALIE suffer, euen then when he was occupied in the warres of ASIA: and yet notwithstanding his absence, he was in as good credit and fauor with Sylla, as any of his frendes about him. For as we haue sayd before, he dedicated his commentaries vnto him, for the goodwill he bare him, and by his last will and testament appointed him Tutor vnto his sonne, leaving Pompey out: which seemeth to be the first occasion of the quarrell and grudge that fell out afterwards betwene them, bicause they were both young men, and vehemently desirous of honor. Shortly after the death of Sylla, Lucullus was chosen Consul with Marcus Cotta, about the threescore Olympiade: and then they began to reuiue the matter againe, that it was very needefull to make warres against Mithridates, and specially Marcus Cotta, who gaue out that it was not ended, but only slept for a while. Wherefore, when the Consuls came to draw lotes what prouinces they should take charge of, Lucullus was maruelous forie that the prouince of GAULE, lying betwene the Alpes and ITALIE, fell to his lotte: bicause he thought it no contrie wherein any great exploit was to be done; and againe, the glorie of Pompey grieved him greatly, whose honor dayly in-created by the famous battells he wan in SPAIN. So that it was most certaine, that so soone as Pompey had ended the warres there, they would haue chosen him generall in the warres gainst Mithridates. Wherefore, when Pompey sent to ROME in earnest maner, to require money to make pay to his souldiers, wryting to the Senate, that if they did not fend him money the sooner, he would leaue Sertorius there, SPAIN behinde him, and bring his army backe into ITALIE: Lucullus made all the meanes he could to haue it quickly sent him, fearing lest he should retorne into ITALIE vpon any occasion, while he was Consul. For he thought that if he returned againe to ROME with so great an armie, he would easily do what him list: and the rather, because that Cethegus and he could not agree, who at that time bare all the sway and rule at ROME, because he spake and did all that pleased the common people, being a witty liuer, and dissolutely geuen, for which cause Lucullus hated him. But there was another common Orator among the people called Lucius Quintus, and he would haue had all Syllas doings reuoked and broken: a matter to alter euen the whole state of the common wealth, and to turmoyle the cite of ROME againe with ciuill disfection, which then liued quietly and in good peace. This Lucius Quintus Lucullus talked withall a parte to perfwade him, and openly reproued him with such words, that he was dissuaded from his euell purpose, & by reason ruled his rath ambition, handling it both wisely and as cunningly as he could possible (for the safety of the common wealth) because it was the beginning of a disease, from whence infinite troubles were like to growe. While these things were thus in hande, newes came that Othanius the gouernour of CILICIA was dead. Straight whereuppon many put forward them selues to sue for this charge, & to court Cethegus, as the only man who about all other might make any man officer whom he thought good. Now for Lucullus, he made no great reckning of the gouernment of CILICIA in respect of the contry, but because CAPPADOCIA was hand adioyning to it, and perswading him selfe that if he could obtaine the gouernment thereof, they would geue none other (but him selfe) the authoritie to make warres with Mithridates. And hauing proued sundry wayes, was compelled in the ende, against his owne nature, to practise a meane neither comely nor honest, and yet the readiest way he could possibly deuise to obtaine his desire. There was a woman in ROME at that time called Præcia, very famous for her passing beauty, and also for her pleasure grace in talke and discourse, howbeit otherwise vnchast after curtilian manner. But because she employed the credit & fauor of them that frequented her companie, to the benefit and seruice of the common wealth, and of them that loued her: she wanne the repute (besides her other excellent commendable graces) to be a very louing woman, and ready to fauor and further any good enterpryse, and it wanne her great fame and reputation. But after she had once wonne Cethegus, (who ruled all the common wealth at his pleasure) and brought him to be so farre in fancie with her, that he could not be out of her sight: then had she all the whole power & authority of ROME in her hands, for the people did nothing but Cethegus preferred it, and Cethegus did what euer Præcia would will him to. Thus Lucullus sought to come in fauor with her, lending her many presentes, and vsing all other curtiesies he could offer vnto her: besides that it seemed a great reward for so proude & ambitious a woman as she, to be seduced vnto by such a man as Lucullus was, who by this meane came to haue Cethegus at his commaundement. For Cethegus did nothing but commend Lucullus in all assemblies of the people, to procure him the gouernment of CILICIA who after it was once graunted him, had then no neede of the helpe neither of Præcia, nor of Cethegus. For the people wholly of them selues with one consent did graunte him the charge to make warre with Mithridates, because he knew better how to ouercome him, than any other Capitaine, and because that Pompey was in the warres with Sertorius in SPAIN, and Mithridates also grown too olde, both which two were the onely men that could deseruedly haue contended for this office with him. Neuertheles, Marcus Cotta his fellow Consul, made such sute to the Senate, that they sent him also with an armie by sea, to keepe the coastes of PAPHLAGIA, and to defende the contrie of BITHYNIA. Thus, Lucullus hauing his commission, went into ASIA with one legion only, the which he leauied a new at ROME: & when he was come thither, he tooke the rest of the strength he founde there, which were men married and

A corrupted altogether of long time, through couetousnes and delicacie of the contry. For amongest others, were the bandes which they called the Fimbrian bandes, men geuen ouer to selfe will, and very ill to be ruled by marshall discipline, because they had liued a long time at their owne libertie, without all obedience to any man. They were those selue souldiers that together with Fimbria, slue their generall Flaccus, Consul of the ROMANE people, and that afterwards betrayed Fimbria him selfe, and forlooke him, leauing him vnto Sylla, being mutiners, traitors, and wicked people: howbeit otherwise very valiant, well trayned, and painefull souldiers. Notwithstanding, Lucullus in shorte time brided their boldnes meete well, and reformed the others also, who before had neuer proued (in my opinion) what the value of a good Capitaine and Generall ment, that knew how to commaund: but were vled to flattering leaders; that commaunded the souldiers no more then they them selues liked of. Now concerning the state of the enemies, thus it was with them. Mithridates that in the beginning was very braue and bolde (as these flourishing Sophisters commonly are) vnder taking warre against the ROMANS; with a vaine vnprofitable armie, but passing freshe and sumptuous to the eye: but after that he was once foyled and ouercome with no lesse shame then losse, when he came to make this second warre, he cut of all superfluous pompe, and brought his armie into a conuenient furniture to serue for warres at all assayes. For he put by the consufed multitude of sundrie nations, the fierce threatmings of the barbarous people in so many sundrie tongues, and clearly banisht also the riche grauen armors with golde mythes worke, and set with precious stones, as things that more enriched the enemies that wanne them, then gaue strength or corage to those that ware them. And contrariwise, caused long stiffe swords to be made after the ROMANE facion, and great heauy shields, and brought to the field a maruelous number of horse, more ready for seruice, then riche in furniture. Then he ioyned six score thousand footemen together, appointed & set in order like vnto the battell of the ROMANS, with sixteene thousand horse of seruice, besides those that drue his armed cottes with stiches about, which were in all to the number of a hundred. And besides all this land preparation, he brought also a great number of shippes and gallies together, which were not decked with goodly golden pavilions, as at the first, neither with shoues nor bathes, nor with chambers and cabbons, curiously hanged for Ladies and gentlewomen: but furnished full of armor, artilerie, and slinges, and with money also to pay the souldiers. With all this armie and preparation, he went first to inuade BITHYNIA, where the cities receiued him very gladly, & not those only, but all the other cities of ASIA wholly: the which were fallen againe into their former miseries and diseases, by the crueltie of the ROMANE farmers and vicerers, who raising taxes and imposts vpon them, made them abide vntolerable things. It is true that Lucullus draue them away afterwards, like the Harpie, which tooke the meate out of the poore mens mowthes: howbeit at that time he did no more, but brought them to be more reasonable by the perswasions he vsed vnto them, and qualified a litle the inclination of the people vnto rebellion, being euery one of them in manner willing to reuolt. Now Lucullus being busie about these matters, Marcus Cotta the other Consul (and his companion) supposing that the absence of Lucullus was a fit occasion offered him to doe notable seruice, prepared to fight with Mithridates. And although he had newes brought him from sundrie places, that Lucullus was with his armie in PHRYGIA, and coming towards him: yet notwithstanding, imagining that he had the honor of triumph assured already in his handes, and because Lucullus should be no partaker of it, he aduanced forwardes to geue battell. But Mithridates ouercame him both by sea and by lande: so that Cotta by sea lost three score of his shippes with all the men in them, foure thousand footemen by lande, and was after with shame thut vp and besieged in the cite of CHALCEDON, remaining there hopelesse to escape, but by Lucullus him only ayde and meane. Howbeit there were in Lucullus campe, that were very earnest with him to leaue Cotta, and to go further, assuring him that he should finde the realm of Mithridates both without men of warre, or any defence at all: so that he might easily be Lord of the F. While these were the wordes of the souldiers that spied Cotta, because his foolishnes and sonde imagination had not only brought those men to the shambles to be slaine and cast away, whom he had the leading of: but had lost them also, that they could not ouer-come him, and ende this warre without blowes, for that they were driuen to go to his helpe. A Howbeit Lucullus making an Oration vnto them, answered, that he had rather saue the life of one ROMANE citizen, then winne all that his enemies had in their power. And when Archelaus, (who had bene Mithridates Lieutenant in BORTIAIN the first warres against Sylla, and now in this seconde warre tooke parte with the ROMANES) assured him that so soone as they saue him in the realme of PONTVS, they would all rise against Mithridates, and yeeke them selues vnto him: Lucullus answered him thus, that he would not fiewe him selfe more fearefull, then the good hunters which neuer suffer the beast to recouer his denne. And when he had lo sayd, he marched with his armie towards Mithridates, hauing in all his campe thirtie thousand foote men, and two thousand fise hundred horse. When he came to neere vnto his enemies, that he might easly at eye discerne all their host, he wondered at the great multitude of souldiers that were in their campe, and was in minde to geue battell, supposing yet that the better way was to prolong time, and drawe these warres out in length. But one Marius a ROMANE Capitaine, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAYNE vnto Mithridates with a certaine number of souldiers: came forwardes, and prouoked him to battell. Lucullus for his parte did put his men also in a readinesse to fight. But euen as both battells were prepared to ioyne, the element opened vpon the sodaine, without any shewe of change of weather deerned before, and they plainly saw a great flake of fire fall betwene both armies, in forme and shape much like to a tonne, and of the colour of molten siluer. This celestiall signe put both tharmies in such a feare, as they both retired, and fought not a stroke: and this wonderful fight fortun'd (as it appeared) in a place of PHRYGIA, called OTRYES. Nowe Lucullus after wards considering with himselfe, that there was no riches nor prouision so great in the world, that could suffice to vittell so many thousandes of people as Mithridates had in his campe: any long time together, hauing his enemies campe so lying before him: willed that one of the prisoners should be brought into his tent, and first of all he enquired of him, how many of them lay together in a cabin, then what come he had left in their cabin. And when the prisoner had answered to all his demaundes, he returned him to prison, and sent for another: then for a third, and questioned with them all as he had done with the first. Then comparing the store of their come, and other proportion of vittells they had, with the number of men the same should maintaine: he founde that all would be spent in three or four days at the most. Whereupon he relied on his first determination, to delay time without hazard of battell. So he caused a maruelous deale of wheate to be brought into his campe out of euerie quarter, that the same being thoroughly vittelled, he might easly tary the occasion which his enemies necessitie should offer him. Mithridates in the meane time, sought which way he might take the cite of the CYZICENIANS, who had bene ouerthrowen before with Cotta at the battell of CHALCEDON, where they had lost three thousand men, and tenne of their shippes. And because that Lucullus should not vnderstand of his enterpryse, Mithridates staley way by night after supper, taking the opportunity of a darke rainy night, and marched thitherwards with such speede, that he was before the city of CYZICVS by breake of day, and pitched his campe, where the temple of the goddesse Adrastia standeth, which is the goddesse of fatall destinie. Lucullus receiuing intelligence of Mithridates departure from his campe, followed him straight wayes steppe by steppe, and being glad that he was not met withall of his enemies in disorder, lodged his armie in a village called THRACIA, in a place of great advantage for him, and commodiously seated also vpon the high wayes, and through fare of the neighbors therabouts, by the which they must come of necessity to vitell Mithridates campe. Wherefore Lucullus wisely foreseeing what would follow: would not keepe his purpose secret from his souldiers, but after he had well trenched and fortified his campe, called them to counsell, and there making an oration vnto them, tolde them openly by manifest demonstration of assured hope, that ere many dayes passed, he would geue victorie into their hands, and that without losse of one droppe of blood. In the meane season, Mithridates enuironed the GRECIANS round about by lande, hauing deuided his armie into tenne camps, & stoped vp the mouth of the arme of the sea, which deuideth the cite from firme lande, with his shippes from one side to an other. Now the CYZICENIANS were valliant men, and determin-

A ned to abide all extremitie for the ROMANES sakes: but one thing only troubled them much, that they knew not what was become of Lucullus, neither could they heare any newes of him, though his campe stode in such a place, where they might easly decerne it from the citie. But Mithridates souldiers deceiued them, for shewing them the ROMANES campe that lay about hard by them, sayd vnto them: doe ye see yonder campe there? They are the MEDES, and the ARMENIANS, whom Tigranes hath sent to the ayde of Mithridates. These wordes put the CYZICENIANS in a maruelous feare, seeing such a multitude of enemies dispersed round about them: that when Lucullus should come to their aide, he could not well tell which way to passe. Yet at the length they heard of Lucullus approach, by one called Demonax, whom Archelaus sent vnto them, but they would not beleue him at the first, taking it for a tale, only to make them be of good corage, and valliantly abide the furie of the siege: vntill such time as a litle boy of theirs, escaped from the enemies that before had takē him prisoner, was come againe vnto them. Of whome they inquired where Lucullus was: the boy laughed at them, thinking they teasted to aske that questiō of him. But when he saw they were in good earnest, he shewed them the ROMANES campe with his finger: then they beleued it in deede, and were coragious againe. There is a lake neere vnto the cite of CYZICVS called Dascylitide, and it is nauigable with conuenient bigge boates. Lucullus tooke one of the greatest of them, put it in a carre, and so caried it to the sea, and there put as many souldiers in her as she could well carry, who by night entred into the citie, the skowte of the enemies neuer discouying them. This small supply did maruelously comforte the besieged CYZICENIANS: and it seemeth that the C goddes, deliting to see their noble corage, would further increase and assure the same, by many manifest tokens which they sent from heauen, and specially by one which was this. The day of the feast of Proserpina was at hand, and the citizens had neuer a blacke cowe to offer in solemne sacrifice, as their auncest ceremonies required: so they made one of paste, & brought it hard vnto the altar. Now, the cowe that was vowed to this sacrifice, & which they reered vpon purpose to serue for that day, was feeding amongst the heard of the citie in the fieldes, on the other side of the arme of the sea. But that day the kept alone from all the rest of the heard, and swamme ouer the arme of the sea, and came into the citie: where she went of her selfe vnto the place of the sacrifice. Furthermore, the goddesse Proserpina her selfe appeared vnto Arifagoras in his dreame, secretary of the state and common wealth of the CYZICENIANS, and D sayd vnto him: I am come hither to bring the flute of LIBIA, against the tromper of PONT, and therefore tell the citizens from me, that I will them to be of good corage. The next morning when the secretarie had tolde them his vision, the CYZICENIANS maruelled much at the goddesse wordes, and could not imagine what they ment. Howbeit at the breake of day there rose a great whistling winde, that made the sea billowes rise very high: and the kings engines of batterie which were brought to the walles of the citie to plucke them downe (being wonderfull workes that one Niconides a THESSELIAN enginer had made and deuised) began to make such a noyse, and to breake in peeces by the roughnes of the winde, that a man might easly iudge what would follow vpon it. Then all at one instant, the southwinde was become so vehemēt bigge, that in a moment it burst all these engines a sunder, and specially a tower E of wodde of the height of a hundred cubites, which the winde shooke so vehemētly, that it ouerthrew it to the ground. And it is sayd furthermore, that in the citie of LIVM the goddesse Minerva appeared vnto diuerse in their sleepe, all in a sweate, and shewing parte of her vaile tiner, as if she had bene newly returned from giuing ayde vnto the CYZICENIANS: in confirmation whereof, the inhabitants of LIVM haue a pillar yet vnto this day, whereupon this matter is written for a perpetuall memorie. Now was Mithridates maruelous sory for the breaking & losse of his engines, by meanes whereof, the CYZICENIANS had escaped the danger of assaulte, & of the siege in like maner, vntill he truly vnderstood of the great famine that was in his campe, and the extreame dearth to be such, as the souldiers were compelled to care mans flesh, which (his Capitaines abusing him) had for a time kept secret from his knowledge. But when he was enformed of the troth in deede, he left of his vaine ambition obtinately to continue the siege: knowing well that Lucullus made not warres with threats and brauery, but (as the common prouerbe sayth) lept on his belly with both his feete, that is to say, he did what he could possible to cut of all the vitrells from him. And therefore one day when Lucullus was gone to assault a castell that troubled him very neere vnto his campe: Mithridates cause he would not lose that opportunity, sent the most parte of his horsemen to get victuall in BITHYNIA, with all his cartes, and beastes of cariage, and his most vnprofitable footemen. Lucullus hearing thereof, returned againe the selfe same night vnto his campe, and the next morninge betimes being in the winter season, followed them by the tracke with ten engines of footemen only and all his horsemen. But the snow was so deepe, the cold so terrible sharp, and the weather so rough, that many of his souldiers not being able to abide it, dyed by the way. For all that he marched on still, till he ouertooke his enemies about the riuer of RINDACUS, where he gaue them such an ouerthrowe, that the very women came out of the citie of APOLLONIA, and went to steale the vitrells they had loden, and strippe the dead, which were a maruelous great number, as a man may iudge in such a case: and neuerthelesse there were taken fixe thousande horse of seruice, an infinite number of beastes for cariage, and fifteene thousande men besides, all which spoyle he brought to his campe, and passed hard by the campe of his enemies. But I wonder much at the historiographer Salust, who wraying of this matter sayth, that here was the first time that euer the ROMANES saw any camells. Me thinks it straunge how he should thinke so, that they who long before had ouercome Antiochus the great vnder Scipio, and thothers that a litle before had fought against Archelaus, neere vnto the cities of ORCHOMENE and CHERONEA, should not haue scene camells. But to returne againe to our matter. Mithridates being feared with this ouerthrow, resolved with him selfe immediatly to flic, with all the speede he could possibly make: and to entertaine and stay Lucullus for a time behinde him, determined to sende Aristonicus his Admirall with his army by sea, into the sea of GRECE. But as Aristonicus was ready to hoysse sayle, his owne men betraied him, and deliuered him into the handes of Lucullus, with tenne thousand crownes which he caried with him, to corrupt if he could parte of the ROMANES army. Mithridates hearing of this, fled by sea, leauing the rest of his armie by lande in the handes of his Captaines, to be brought away by them as well as they could. Lucullus followed vnto the riuer of GRANICUS, where he set upon them, and after he had slaine twenty thousande of them, tooke an infinite number prisoners. And they say there dyed in that worthe, what souldiers, what slaues, what lackeis, and other stragglers that followed the campe, about the number of three hundred thousand people. This done, Lucullus returned to the citie of CYZICUS, where after he had spent some dayes, enjoying the glorie due vnto him, and receiued the honorable entertainment of the CYZICENIANS: he went to visite the coast of HELLESPONT, to get shippes together, and to prepare an armie by sea. And passing by TROADE, they prepared his lodging within the temple of Venus: where, as he slept in the night, it seemed to him he saw the goddesse appeare before him, which sayd these verses vnto him.

O Lyon fierce, and soveraine: why sleepest thou so sounde?

Since at thy hande so sayre a praye, is ready to be founde.

Herewith he rose incontinently out of his bed, being yet darke night, and calling his friends to him, tolde him the vision he had in his dreame: and about that very time also there came some vnto him from the citie of LIVM, that brought him newes of fifteene galleies of kinge Mithridates, hauing fise ores to euery bancke, that were scene in the haven of the ACHAIAIANS, and that sayled towards the Ile of LEMNOS. Whereupon Lucullus tooke shippe straight, went and tooke them euery one: for at his first comming he slue the Captaine called Isidorus, and went afterwards to the other mariners that lay at ancker on the coast side, who seeinge him come, drew towards land with their shippes, in purpose to runne them all a shore, and fighting aboute hatches, hurt many of Lucullus souldiers, because they could not compasse them in behinde, and for that also the place where they had layed their shippes was such, as there was no way to force them before, their galleies floating in the sea as they did, and the others being fastned to the land as they were. Lucullus with much a do all this notwithstanding, found meanes in the end to put a shore certaine of the best souldiers he had about him, in a place of the Ile where they might easily lande. These souldiers went straight and set vpon the enemies behinde, slue some of them euen at their first comming, & compelled the rest to cut a funder the

A the cables that fastned the galleies to the bankes. But when they thought to flic from lande, the galleies brused and brake one another: and that worst of all was, rannē vpon the poyntes and spures of Lucullus galleies. And so many of them that stood aboute hatches were slaine, the rest taken prisoners: amongst whom, Marius the ROMANE Captaine was brought vnto Lucullus, whom Sertorius had sent out of SPAIN vnto Mithridates. He had but one eye, and Lucullus had commaunded his men before they fought, not to kill any of his enemies that had but one eye: because Marius should not dye so happy a death, as to be slaine, but that he should dye some shamefull death, and be condemned by order of lawe. That done, Lucullus went in person with all the speede he could possible to follow Mithridates, hoping to finde him yet vpon the coast of BITHYNIA, where Voonius should haue stayed him: for he had sent Voonius before with a certaine number of shippes vnto the citie of NICOMEDIA to stop him from flying. But he taried so long in the Ile of SAMOTHRAZIA sacrificing to the goddes of the same, and to be receiued into the fraternite of their religion, that he could neuer after come neere Mithridates to stoppe him from flying: hauing already made sayle with all the whole fleet, and halting with all possible speede to recouer the realme of PONTVS, before Lucullus could returne from whence he went. But in sayling thitherwardes, he met with such a terrible storme, that caried parte of his shippes to away, that they ranne stragling to seeke their fortune, and parte of them splitted and drowned outright: so that all the coastes and riues thereabouts, for many dayes after, were full of dead bodies and shippes wrackes cast a shore by waues of the sea. Nowe for Mithridates owne persone, he was in a shippe of great burden, the which for her greatnes could not sayle neere the shore, nor recouer land, he was also very euill to be guided by the pylots in so boylerous a storme: the mariners besides were put out of all their skill and knowledge, and the shippe her selfe moreouer tooke in such store of water, and was so heauely charged withall, that they durst no more put her out to the sea. By reason whereof Mithridates was compelled to goe aboard a litle pinace of pyrates, and to put him selfe and his life into their handes, by whose helpe in the ende, (beyond all expectation, but not without great daunger) he got to lande, and recouered the citie of HERACLEA in the realme of PONTVS. Now here is to be noted, that the great brauerie Lucullus shewed vnto the Senate of ROME, fell out according to his imagination by the fauor of the goddes. For when the Senate had appointed for ending of their warres to prepare a great naue of shippes, and therewithall had geuen order also for three thousande talentes: Lucullus stayed them by letters that they should not doe it, wraying brauely vnto them, that without all this charge and great preparation he would be strong enough to driue Mithridates from the sea, with the onely shippes he would borrowe of their frendes and confederates. And in deede, through the special fauor of the goddes, he brought it so to passe: for they say, that this terrible storme that destroyed the armie of Mithridates, was raised vp by Diana, being offended with the men of the realme of PONTVS, because they had destroyed her temple in the citie of PERIAPUS, and had caried away her image. Now there were diuers that counsellled Lucullus to deserre the rest of this warre, vntill an other season: but notwithstanding all their persuasions, he went through the contrie of GALATIA and BITHYNIA to invade the realme of Mithridates. In the which voyage, at the first beginning he lacked vitrells, so that there were thirty thousand men of GALATIA following his campe, that caried euery one of them a bushell of wheate on their shouldiers: howbeit entering further into the contrie, and conquering the whole, there was such exceeding plenty of all things, that an ox was sold in his campe but for a Drachma, & a slaue at foure times as much. And of all other spoyle there was such great store, that either they made no reckening of it, or else they made hauoke of it, because there was no man to sell it vnto, euery man hauing so much of his owne. For they ranne ouer all the contrie vnto the citie of THEMISCYRA, and to the vallies that lay upon the riuer of Thermodon, and stayed no where longer then they were a spoyleing. Thereupon the souldiers beganne to murmure at Lucullus, because he assured all the cities vpon composition, and neuer tooke any of them by force, nor gaue them any meanes to enrich themselves by spoyle: and yet sayd they, he would make vs now go further, and leaue AMISVS a great rich citie which we might easily take by force, if it were but a litle straightly besieged, and lead vs into the de-ferres of the TIBARENIANS and the CHALDEIANS to fight against Mithridates. Lucullus paid a fed over all these complaints, and made no reckoning of them, because he would never have thought that they would have fallen into such mutinie and furie, as afterwards they did: and contrarily excused him selfe the more carefully to them that blamed & reprovied him, for his long tarrying vpon townes and villages that were not worth the reckening, and suffering Mithridates in the meane time to gather a new force and armie together at his pleasure. For, said he, that is the mark I shotte at, and that maketh me linger time vp and downe as I doe, wishing nothing more, then that he might once againe make him selfe strong, and bring also cond armie to the field, that might embolden him to come eftsoones to the fight with vs, and runne away no more. Doe you not see, sayd he, that at his backe he hath an infinite number of desert contries, where it is vnpossible euer to follow him by the tracke: and hard by him also the mounte Caucasus, and many other vnpassable places, which are sufficient not only to hide him alone, but infinite number of other princes and kings besides that would flie battell, and not come to fight? Furthermore, it is but a litle way from the contrie of the CABIRENI-ANS vnto the realme of ARMENIA, where Tigranes the king of kings inhabiteth, whose power is so great, that he drieth the PARTHIANS out of ASIA, and carieth whole townes and cities of GREECE vnto the realme of MEDIA, who hath all SYRIA and PALESTINE in his handes, and hath slaine and rooted out the kinges and successors of the great Seleucus, and hath caried away their wiues and daughters prisoners by force. This great and mightie kinge is allyed vnto Mithridates, for he married Mithridates daughter: and it is not likely that when Mithridates shall come and intreate him to helpe him in his distresse, that Tigranes will refuse him, but rather we must thinke certainly that he will make warres vpon vs in his defence.

 And thus, in making hault to drue out Mithridates, we shall bring our selues into great danger, to prouoke a new enemy, euen Tigranes against vs, who of long time hath lurked for iust occasion to make warres with vs: and he can haue no honeste cause to take armes, then to defend and keepe a king his neighbour, and to neere a kinsman, from vtter destruction, and one that is compelled to seeke vpon him for succor. What neede we then to prouoke him to procure it, and teache Mithridates (which he purposeth not) to whom he should repaire for aide, to make warres against our selues, and pricke him forward, or to say better, put him with our owne handes into the way to go seeke aide of Tigranes: which of him selfe he will neuer doe, (thinking it a dishonor vnto him) onlesse we drue him to it for very necessitie. Is it not better for vs to geue him leasure and time, to gather a second force againe of him selfe, and his owne people, that we might rather fight with the COLCHIANS, TIBARENIANS, CAP-PADOCHIANS, and with such other people whome we haue so many times overcome: then with the MEDES and ARMENIANS? With this determination Lucullus taried a great while before the citie of AMISVS, continuing this siege of purpose, without distressing them at all.
 Afterwards when winter was past, he left Murena there to continue the siege, and him selfe with the rest of his armie went to meete Mithridates: who had planted his campe neere vnto the citie of CABIRA, determining to tarie the ROMANES coming, hauing gathered together againe a new armie of fortie thousand footemen, and foure thousand horsemen, in the which he put his most confidence and trust, so that he passed ouer the riuier of Lycus, & went and presented battell to the ROMANES in the plaine field. There the horsemen skirmished, & the ROMANES had the worfe: for there was one Pomponius a ROMANE taken, of great estim-cion, who was brought vnto king Mithridates hurt as he was. Mithridates asked him, if in using his life, and healing his woundes, he would become his seruauant and frend. Straightlyed Pomponius, with all my hart quod he, so that thou make peace with the ROMANES: if not, I will euer be thine enemy. The king esteemed his corage much, and would doe him no hurt. And as for Lucullus, he was affrayed to come into the plaine, because his enemy was the stronger of horsemen: and he doubted also on thother side to take his way by the mountaines, because it was very high, vneafie to clime, and full of woddes and forrestes. But as he stood thus doubtfull, they tooke certaine GREECIANS by chaunce that were fled, and hidden in cause hard by, among the which there was an old man called Artemidorus, who promised Lu-cullus if he would beleue and follow him, he would bring him into a sure strong place to lodge

A his campe, where was a castell about the citie of CABIRA: Lucullus beleued the olde mans wordes, wherefore so soone as night came, he raised great fires in his campe, and went his way: and after they had passed certaine straight and dangerous wayes of the mountaines, he came in the morning vnto the place which Artemidorus had promised to bring him. Now the enemies were maruelously amazed when day light came, to see him there ouer them; in a place where if he list to fight, he might come apon them with aduantage; and if he liked not to stirre, it was vnpossible to compell him. For he stood indifferent then to hazard battell or not. But in the meane season, they say certaine of the kinges campe by chaunce were a hunting the harte. The ROMANES perceiuing that, fell vpon them to cut them off by the way: and they began by this means one to charge another in such sorte, reliefe growing still from either side, as Mithridates men grew the stronger. But the ROMANES seeing their men flie from the trenches of their campe about, were in such a rage, that they all ranne in a choller to Lu-cullus to pray him he would leade them to battell, and geue them a signall to fight. Lucullus, because he would shew them by experience how much the presence & eye of a good wise Captaine in time of neede was worth: commaunded them they should not once stirre, and he him selfe in person went downe into the valley, where he commaunded the first of his men he met withall flying, to stay, and returne to the fight againe with him. Which they presently did, and all the other in like case: and thus gathering them together againe, did easily make their enemies returne, that before had them in chafe, and draue them backe, fighting with them euen hard to their owne forte. Afterwards vpon his returne againe to his campe, he C sette his souldiers that fled, vnto a certaine peece of worke to shame them withall, which the ROMANES are wont to vse in such a case: & that is, that he made them digge a ditch of twelue foote longe, being in their thirties, all vntrussed, and their other companions present seeinge them doe it. Now there was in king Mithridates campe, one Olthacus, prince of the DARD-DARIANS (which are certaine barbarous people dwelling vpon the marshes of Maotin) a noble gentleman of his persone, vallyant, and skilfull in warres, and a man of very good iudge-ment to doe any great enterprise as any that was in all the armie, and furthermore a prince of great good grace and entertainment in companie, knowing how to facion him selfe with all men. This prince, being alwayes at strife with other Lodes of his contrie, and contending who should haue the first place of honor and fauor about the king: went vnto Mithridates, & D promised him that he would do him notable seruice, and that was, that he would kill Lucullus.
 The king was very glad of this promise, and praised him maruelously in secret: howbeit openly of purpose he did him many iniuries, because he might haue some colour to counterfeate anger and displeasure, and to geue way for him to goe yelde him selfe vnto Lucullus as he did.
Lucullus was maruelous glad of him, because he was one of the chiefeest men of name in all his campe, and to proue him withall, gaue him charge immediatly in the which he behaued him selfe so well, that Lucullus greatly esteemed his wisdom, and commended his diligence; in such sorte that he did him this honor, to call him sometimes vnto the counsell, and make him sit at his borde. One day when this DARDARIAN prince Olthacus thought to haue found fit occasion to execute his enterprife, he commaunded his footemen to be ready with his horse E out of the trenches of the campe: and at none dayes when the souldiers tooke rest, and slept here and there in the campe, he went vnto Lucullus tent, thinking to haue found no body there to kepe him from coming in, considering the familiaritie Lucullus shewed him, saying also he had matters of great importance to talke with him of and sure he had gone in immediatly vnto him, if sleepe that casteth away so many other Capitaines, had not at that time preferred & saued Lucullus that slept. For one of the groomes of his chamber called Menedemus, who by good fortune kept the dore of the tent, told him that he came in very ill time, because Lucullus being wearied with trauell and lacke of sleepe, was but then newly layed downe to rest. Olthacus whatsoeuer the other sayd to him, would not be so answered, but tolde him he would come in whether he would or not, for he must nedes speake with him in a matter of great im-F portance. Menedemus answered him againe, that nothing could be of greater importance, nor more necessarie, then the preservation of his masters life and health, who had neede to take rest: and with these wordes, he thrust him backe with both his hands. Olthacus was affrayed then, and withdrew him self secretly out of the trenches of the campe,ooke his horse, and rode straight to Mithridates campe without his purpose he came for, which was to Lucullus. And thus it plainly appeareth, that occasion, and opportunity of time, euen in matters deliuereth meanes, to saue or destroy the life of man, like as drugges and medicines geuen vnto the sicke and diseased perſones. Shortly after, Lucullus sent one of his Captaines called Sornasius to get vittells, with tenne ensignes of footemen. Whereof Mithridates being aduertised, sent presently at his tayle one of his Capitaines also, called Menander, vnto whom Sornasius gaue battell, and flue him with great slaughter of his men beside. And afterwards Lucullus sent an other of his Lieutenantes called Adrianus with a great companie of souldiers, to get vittells into his campe more then he should neede. Mithridates did not let slippe this occasion, but sent after him two of his Capitaines also called Menemachus and Agrus, with a great number of men, as well footemen as horsemen: all which were slaine, two only excepted, that brought newes backe to Mithridates campe: the which he fought to saue as well as he could, saying that the losse was much lesse then it was thought for, and that it formed through the ignorance and rashnes of his Lieutenantes. But Adrianus at his returne, passed by Mithridates campe with great pompe and maiestie, carying a huge number of cam-loden with come and spoyle he had wonne: which draue Mithridates felle into so great despair, & all his people into such a feare and trouble, that he presently determined to remove thence. Whereupon, the nobility and such as had place of credit about him, beganne to fad before, and secretly to conuey their stuffe out of the campe, but vterly prohibiting others to doe the same. The rest of the souldiers seeing the stowtnes of the kinges minions, beganne to set vpon them with open force, not suffering them on the other side once to issue out of the campe. This mutinie grew to such a fury, that they ouerthrew their cariages and sumpter moyles, and flue them presently downe. Amongest others there was slaine Dorylaus, one of the chiefeſt Capitaines of all their campe, who had nothing about him but a purple gowne, for the which they killed him: & Hermus the Priest of the sacrifices was troden vnder foot, and smothered at the campe gate, by reason of the multitude of those that fled in so great disorder. The king him selfe amongst others fled, but hauing neuer a one of his garde about him, nor any of the quieries of his stable to bring him a horse: Ptolomy, one of the groomes of his chamber, perceiuing him in the company of them that fled, lighted of his owne horse, and gaue him the king, but euen in manner too late. For the ROMANES that followed him were then euen hard at his tayle: and it was not for lacke of speede they missed the taking of him, for they were very neere him: but the couetousnes of the souldiers was the losse of the praye they had so long fought for, with so great paine and hazard of battells, and deprived Lucullus of the honor and reward of all his victories. For they were so neere vnto him, that if they had but followed Mithridates neuer so litle further, they had out of doubt ouertaken him, and his horse that caried him away. But one of the moyles that caried his gold and siluer (whether by chance, or of pretended policie of Mithridates, as a matter purposely habandoned to them that pursued him) was found in the midst of the high way betwixt him that fled, & the ROMANES that followed: who stayed there to robbe the gold & siluer, fighting about it, that Mithridates by that meane wanne ground so farre before them, as they could neuer after come neere him againe. And this losse was not all which the couetousnes of the souldiers made Lucullus to lose. For, one of the chiefeſt secretaries of the king being taken, called Callistratus, whom Lucullus commaunded to be brought vnto him to his campe: they that had the charge of him, hearing tell that he had fide hundred crownes in a girdle about him, for greedines of them, flue him by the way, and yet notwithstanding Lucullus suffered them to spoyle and destroy the whole campe of their enemies. After Mithridates flight, Lucullus took the cite of CASIRA, and many other castles and strong places, where he founde great treasure, and the prisons full of poore prisoners of the GRECIANS, & many Princes a kinne vnto the king him selfe, which were thought to be dead long before: and then seeing them felues deliuered from this miserable bondage, by the grace and benefit of Lucullus, thought with them selves they were not only taken out of prison, but reuiued & turned againe vnto a second life. There was also taken one of king Mithridates sisters called Nissa, whose taking fell out profitable for her: because of Mithrida-

A because all Mithridates other wiues and sisters, whom they placed furthest of, as out of all danger (and sent into a contrie of great safety, neere vnto the cite of PANORACIA) dyed pitifully, and were miserably slaine. For Mithridates sent one of the groomes of his priue chamber vnto them called Bacchides, to bring them word that they must all dye. Amongest many other noble Ladies, there were two of the kinges sisters, called Roxane & Statira, which were forty yeres old a peece, & yet had neuer bene married: & two of his wiues also whom he had married, both of the contrie of IONIA, the one called Berenice, borne in the Ile of CNIO, and the other Monime, in the cite of MILETUM. Monime, she was very famous amongst the GRECIANS: for notwithstanding king Mithridates importunate dealing, being ſtate in loue with her, inſomuch as he sent her fiftene thousand crownes at one time, yet she would neuer geue eare vnto his sute, vntill such time as the mariage was agreed vpon betwene them, and that he had sent her his Diademe or royall bande, and called her by the name and tide of Queene. This poore Ladie after the mariage of this barbarous king, had long liued a wofull life, bewailing continually her accursed beauty, that in steade of a husband, had procured her a maſter: and in steade of the matrimoniall companie which a noble woman should enioy, had gotten her a gard and garriſon of barbarous men, that kept her as a prisoner, ſtate from the ſweete contrie of GRECE: in change whereof, she had but a dreame and ſhadow of the hoped goods she looked for, hauing vnfortunately left the within her owne contrie the happily enioyed before. Now when this Bacchides was come vnto them, & had commaunded them from the king to chooſe what maner of death they would, & which euery one of the thought most easieſt, and leaſt painefull: Monime pluckt of the royall bande from her head, and tying it on a knot about her necke, hung her selfe, but the band not being strong enough, brake incontinently. Whereupon she cried out: O cursed and wicked tiſſue, wilt thou not yet ſerue me to end my ſorrowfull dayes? And ſpeaking theſe wordes, caſt it on the ground, and spit apon it, and held out her throte to Bacchides to be cut a ſunder. The other, Berenice: she tooke a cuppe full of poyſon her mother being preſent, who prayed her to let her haue halfe, the which she did, and they dranke it of betwene them. The force of the poyſon was ſtronger enough to kill the old mother weake with age, but not ſo quickly to destroy the daughter: because she had not taken that proportion which would haue ſerued her turne, but drew out the paines of her death in length, vntill ſuch time as Bacchides haſting to diſpatch her, she in the end did ſtrangle her ſelfe. As for the kings two ſisters, Roxane & Statira, which were virgines yet vnmarried, they ſay, that one of them also dranke poiſon, curſing & deteſting the cruelty of her brother: howbeit Statira gaue neuer an euill word, nor was ſaime hated or ſorrowfull to dye, but contrarily did commend and thanke her brother highly, that ſeeing him ſelfe in danger, had not yet forgotten them, but was careful to cauſe them dye, before they ſhould ſell as ſlaues into the hands of their enemies, and before they could come to diſhonor them, or do them villany. Theſe pitiefull miſfortunes went to Lucullus heart, who was curious and gentle of nature: neuertheleſſe he went on further, till following Mithridates at the heeles vnto the city of TALAVRA. And there vnderſtanding that he was fled foure dayes before vnto Tigranes, in ARMENIA, returned backe againe, hauing firſt ſubdued the CHALDEANS, and the ISSA- RENIANS, taken ARMENIA the leſſe, and brought the cities, caſtells, and strong places vnto his obedience. That done, he ſent Appian Claudius vnto king Tigranes, to ſummon him to de-liuer Mithridates vnto him: & him ſelfe tooke his iorney towards the cite of ARMENIA, which was yet beſieged. The cauſe why this ſiege continued long, was the ſufficiencie and great experience of the Captaine that kept it for the king, called Callimachus: who vnderſtoode ſo well howe all ſortes of engines of batterie were to be vſed, and was ſo ſubill beſides in all inuentions that might ſerue to defende a place beſieged, as he troubled the ROMANES much in this attempt: but afterwards he was not only met withall, and payed home for all his labor, but alſo outreached by Lucullus for all his ſineleſſe. For where before he had alwayes fled to found the retreat at a certaine hower, & to call his men backe from the aſſaulte, to reſt them: Rome day he brake that order on the ſodaine, & commaigned to aſſaulte the walles, at the firſt charge wanne a peece of it, before thoſe within could come in time to reſiſt them. Callima-

But before his departing he set the cite a fire, either for the malice to the ROMANS, because he would not they should enriche them selues with the sacke of so great a cite: or els for policy of warre to haue the more leasure to saue him selfe, and sic. For no man gaue them that fled by sea, because the flame was so great, that it disperfed it selfe euen to the walles, and the ROMANS souldiers; they only prepared to spoyle. Lucullus seeing the fire went out, had compassion of the cite whichin, and would gladly haue holpen it, and for the purpose prayed the souldiers quickly to quench it: but not a man would hearken to him, every one plying after the spoyle, making great noyse with clashing of harnesse, and being very lowdly sides otherwise, till at the length enforced thereunto, he gaue the city wholly to spoyle, hoping thereby to saue the houses from fire, but it fell out cleane contrary. For the souldiers then selues in seeking all about with torches & linckes lighted, to see if any thing were hidden they set a number of houses a fire. So as Lucullus coming into the cite the next morning, and seeing the great defolation the fire had made, fell of weeping, saying vnto his familiar friends about him: he had oftentimes before thought Sylla happy, howbeit he neuer wondred at his good fortune, then that day he did. For, Sylla layd he, desiring to saue the cite of ATHENS, the goddess graunted him that fauor that he might do it: but I that would fauine follow him therein, and saue this cite, fortune thwarting my desire, hath brought me to the reputation of Mummius, that caused CORINTH to be burnt. Neuertheless he did his best endeour at that time to helpe the poore cite againe. For touching the fire, euen immediately after it was taken, by Gods prouidence there fell a shower of raine as it was newly kindled, that quenched it: and Lucullus selfe before he left the cite, made a great number of the houses which were spoiled by fire, to be built vp againe, and curteously receiued all the inhabitants that were fled, besides them he placed other GRÆCIANS there also, that were willing to dwell amongst them; and increased the boundes and confines of the cite which he gaue them, one hundred and twenty furlonges into the contrie. This cite was a colony of the ATHENIANS, who had built and founded it, in the time that their Empire flourishd, and that they ruled the seas by reason whereof, many flying the tyranny of Aristion, went to dwell there, and were made free of the city, as the naturall inhabitants of the same. This good happe fell vpon them, that forsaking their owne goodes, they went to possesse and enioy the goodes of other men but the very citizens of ATHENS it selfe that had escaped from this great defolation, Lucullus clothed them well, and gaue them two hundred Drachmas a peece, and sent them againe to their contrie. Tyrannion the grammarian was taken at that time, whom Murena begged of Lucullus; and Lucullus hauing graunted him vnto him, he made him free, wherein he deliuered him discourtously, and did much abuse Lucullus liberality and gift vnto him. For in bestowing this prisoner vpon him, who was a famous learned man, he did not meane Murena should take him for a bondeman, whereby he should neede afterwarde to make him free. For seeing to make him free, and restore him to libertie: was no more but to take that freedom and liberty from him, which he had from his birth. But in many other things, and not in this only, Murena layd him selfe open to the world, that he had not all the partes a worthy Captain should haue in him. When Lucullus departed from AMISUS, he went to visite the cite of ASIA, to thend that whilest he was not now occupied with warres, they might haue some refreshing of lawes and iustice. For, by reason that law was not executed of long tyme in ASIA, the poore contry was so afflicted, and oppressed with so many euils and miseries: that man liuing would feant beleue, nor any tongue can well declare. For, the extreme and horrible couetousnes of the farmers, custumers, and ROMAN vsurers did not only deuoure him also kept it in such bondage and thraldome, that particularly the poore fathers were driuen to sell their goodly young sonnes and daughters in marriage, to pay the interest and vley of the money which they had borrowed to discharge their fines withall: & publicly the tables dedicated vnto the temples, the statues of their goddesses, and other church iuells: and yet in the end they them selues were also iudged to be bondmen & slaues to their cruell creditors, to wend out their dayes in miserable seruitude. And yet the worst of all was, the payne they put them to before they were so condemned: for they imprisoned them, set them on the racke, tormented them vpon a litle brazen horse, sette them in the stocks, made them stande naked in the

A greatest heate of sommer, and on the less the deepest of winter, so as that bondmen seemed vnto them a reliefe of their miseries, and a reliefe of their tormentes. Lucullus found the cities of ASIA full of such oppressions, but in a thotte time after he deliuered them all what was wrongfully committed. For first he tooke order, they should account for the vley that was payed monthly, the hundred parte of the principall due onely, and no more. Secondly he cut off all vleys that passed the principall. Thirdly, which was the greatest matter of all, he ordained that the creditor & vsurer should enioy the fourth parte of the profites & reuenues of his dettor. And he that ioynd vley with the principall, that is to say, tooke vley vpon vley, should lose the whole. So that by this order, all dettes were payed in lesse then foure yeares; and the owners landes and reuenues set cleare of all maner payments. This furcharge of vleys, came of the twenty thousand talentes, wherein Sylla had condemned the contrie of ASIA: the which summe they had payed twice before vnto the farmers and collectors of the ROMANS, who had raised it, still heaping vley vpon vley, to the lumme of fixe score thousand talentes. Wherefore these collectors and farmers ranne to Rome, and cried out vpon Lucullus, saying, that he did them the greatest wrong that could be, and by meanes of money, they procured certaine of the common counsellors to speake against him: which they might easily doe, because they had diuerse of their names in their bookes that delt in traffaires of the common wealth at Rome. But Lucullus was not only beloued of those contries whom he did good vnto, but was wished for and desired also of others, who thought the contrie happy that might haue such a gouernor. Now for Appian Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent before from PHRYGIA vnto king Tigranes in ARMENIA, and whose sister at that time was Lucullus wife: he first tooke certaine of the kings men for guides, who of very malice guided him through the high contry, making him fetch a great compasse about, by many dayes iorneyes spent in vaine: vntill such time as one of his intractable bondmen that was borne in SYRIA, taught him the right way. Whereupon he discharged these barbarous guides, and leaving the wrong wayes they had led him, within fewe dayes past ouer the riuier of Euphrates, and arrived in the cite of ANTIOCH, surnamed EPHAPNE. Where he had commaundement to abide Tigranes returne, who was then in the contry of PHENICIA, where he subdued certaine cities, & had some other yet to conquer. Appian in the meane time wanne secretly diuers of the princes and noble men, that obeyed this ARMENIAN king but for feare, by force, and against their willes, & amongst whom was Zabdius, king of the prouince of GORDIENIA: & promised the aide of Lucullus also to many the cities that sent vnto him; (which had not long before bene subdued & brought into bondage) to whom neuertheles he gaue in expresse charge, that for the time they should not once stirre, nor alter any thing. For, the rule of these ARMENIANS was intollerable to the GRÆCIANS, and specially the pride and arrogancie of the king. Which by reason of his great prosperitie, was growen to such pride and presumption; that whatsoever he did comonly esteeme best, & make most reckoning of, he would not only haue it, and vse it as his owne, but also tooke it that all was made for him selfe whatsoeuer, and this great ouerweening grew, by reason of fortunes speciall grace and fauor towards him. For at the beginning he had but very litle, and yet with this litle (which few made reckoning of) he conquered many great nations; and plucked downe the power of the PARTHIANS as much as any man that euer was before him: He replenished the contry of MESOPOTAMIA with GRÆCIAN inhabitants, which he brought by force out of CALCEDON and CAPPADOCIA, compelling them to inhabit there: He made the ARABIANS change their maner of liuing, who are otherwise called the SCENITES, as much to say, as rent dwellers; because they are vagrant people that dwell in no other houses but tents; which they euer vie to carie with them, and brought them out of their naturall contrie; and made them followe him, viling them for his commodity in trade of marchandise. There were euer many kings in his contry that waited on him: but amongst others, he had foure kings that warred continually on his person, as his footemen: for when he rode abroad any whether, they ranne by his side on their shins: And when he was set in his chaire of state to geue audience, they stood on the sides about his chaire holding their handes together, which countenance shewed the most manly selfe confession and tokens of bondage that they could do vnto him: as if they had shewed thereby that they resigned all their libertie, and offered their bodies vnto their Lord and Master, more ready to suffer, then any thing to doe. Notwithstanding, Appius Clodius being a thing abashed nor feared with all this tragical pompe, when audience was geuen him toke king Tigranes boldly to his face, that he was come to carie king Mithridates away with him, who was due to the triumph of Lucullus: & therefore did summonne him to deliuer that king into his handes, or else that he proclaimed warres vpon him selfe. They that were present at this summonnes, knew well enough that Tigranes (although he set a good countenance of the matter openly with a faine counterfeit laughing) yet hearing these wordes so boldly & gallantly spoken out of this young mans mouth, was galled to the quicke, and hitte at the heart. For Tigranes hauing reigned, (or to say better tyrannically gouerned) fye and twenty years space, had neuer heard any bold or francke speache but that. Notwithstanding, he answered Appius, that he would not deliuer Mithridates: and if the ROMANES made warres with him, that he would defende him selfe. And being greatly offended that Lucullus in his letters gaue him nor the title, king of kinges, but only king simply: in the letters he wrote backe to Lucullus againe, he did not so much as vouchsafe to call him Captaine onely. But when Appius tooke his leaue, he sent him goodly riche presentes which he refused. Whereupon the king sent others againe vnto him, of the which Appius tooke a cuppe only, because the king should not thinke he refused ought of anger, or ill will: and so sending all the rest againe vnto him, made great hast to returne to his Captaine Lucullus. Nowe Tigranes before that time would nor once see king Mithridates his so neere kinsman, who by fortune of warres had lost his possant and great a kingdom, but proudly kept him vnder in fennie, marriage, and vnholme grounds, without any honor geuen vnto him, as if he had bene a very prisoner in deede: howbeit then he sent for him honorably, and receiued him with great curtesie. When they were neere together in the kinges palace, they talked secretly one with another, & excusing them selues, clearing all suspicions conceiued betwene them, to the great hurt of their seruantes and frendes, whom they burdened with all thocccasion of vnkindnes betwene them: amongst which number Metrodorus SCYPIAN was one, a man excellently well learned, eloquent in speache, and one whome Mithridates so much loued and esteemed, that they called him the kinges father. Mithridates at the beginning of his warres had sent him Ambassador vnto Tigranes, to pray ayde of him against the ROMANES. At which time Tigranes sayd vnto him what sayest thou to it Metrodorus: what aduise wilt thou geue me? Metrodorus either because he had regard vnto Tigranes profit, or else because he was loth Mithridates should escape, answered him againe. As Ambassador, O king, I would wish you should do it: but as a counsellor, that you should not do it. Tigranes now reported this speache vnto Mithridates, not thinke king he would haue hurt Metrodorus for it, though in deede he presently put him to death vpon it. Whereat Tigranes was hartely sorie, and repented him greatly to haue tolde him so much, although he was not altogether the occasion of his casting away, hauing but only requiued Mithridates euill will before conceiued against him. For he had borne him displeasure of a long time, as appeared amongst his secret papers and writings that were taken from him, where he had ordained that Metrodorus should be put to death: but in recompence thereof Tigranes buried his body honorably, sparing no cost at all vnto the dead body of him, whome he liuing he had betrayed. There dyed in king Tigranes court also, an Orator called Amphicrates, if he deserue that mention should be made of him, for the citie of ATHENS sake whereof he was borne: for it is sayd, that when he was banished out of his contrie, he fled into the citie of SALEUCIA, which standeth vpon the riuer of Tigris. When the inhabitants of the same prayd him to teache them the arte of eloquence in their contrie, he would not vouchsafe to, but answered them proudly: that a platter was too litle to holde a Dolphine in, meaning that their citie was too small a thing to containe it. From thence he went vnto Cleopatra, Mithridates daughter, and king Tigranes wife, where he was quickly suspected and accused, so that he was forbidden to frequent the GRECIANS company any more, which grieved him so much, that he famished him selfe to death, and would eate no meate. And that man was also very honorably buried by the Queene Cleopatra, nere vnto a place called Sapha, as they call it in that contrie. Now when Lucullus had quieted all thinges in ASIA, and had established good lawes

Among them, he was not careless also of games and pleasaunt pastimes, but while he was at leasure in the city of EPHESVS, he made many games, feastes, wrestlings and fence playes at the shape for ioy of his victory, delighting all the cities of ASIA with them, the which in recompence thereof did institute a solemne feast also in the honor of him, which they called Lucullus, and did celebrate it with great ioy, theewing a true and no faine friendship and good will towards him, which pleased him better, and was more to his contentation, then all the honors they could deuise to geue him. But after that Appius Clodius was returned from his Ambassage, and had tolde Lucullus that he must make warres with Tigranes: Lucullus went backe againe vnto the realme of PONTVS, where he tooke his armie which he had left in garison, and brought it before the city of SINOPE to lay siege vnto it, or rather to besiege certaine *CILICIAN*s that were gotten into the city in the behalfe of Mithridates. But when they sawe Lucullus come against them, they flue a great number of the citizens, and setting fire on the city, fled their way by night. Lucullus being aduertised of it, entred the citie, put eight thousand of the *CILICIAN*s to the sword which he found there, and restored the naturall citizens and inhabitants thereof to all that was theirs. But the original cause that made him to be carefull to persecute the city, was this vision he had. He thought in his nightes dreame, that one came to him, and sayd: goe a litle further Lucullus, for Autolyus commeth, who is desirous to speake with thee. This dreame awaked him, but being awake could not imagine what the vision ment. It was the selfesame day on the which he tooke the city of SINOPE, where following the *CILICIAN*s that escaped by flying, he found an image lying on the ground vpon the sea side, which the *CILICIAN*s would haue caried away: but they were taken and followed for neere, that they had no leasure to shipp it. This statue (as it is reported) was one of the goodliest and notablest workes of Sthenis the Image grauer. And some say that it was the image of Autolyus who founded the city of SINOPE. For Autolyus was one of the princes that went out of THESSALIE with Heracles to go against the AMAZONS, and he was the sonne of Demachus. And they report that at the returne from this voyage, the shippe in the which Autolyus was in barked, with Demoleon & Phlogius, made his shipwracke vpon a rocke on the coast of CHERRONESVS, where she was cast away: howbeit that he & his men escaping with all their furniture, came to the city of SINOPE, which he tooke from certaine SYRIANS, who came (as they say) of one Syrus the sonne of Apollo, and of the nimphe Sinope Astopus daughter. Lucullus vnderstanding this matter, called a saying of Sylla to minde, which he wrote in his commentaries: that nothing is more certaine, nor that we may geue more credit vnto, then that which is signified to vs by dreames. In the meane season he was aduertised, that Tigranes & Mithridates were ready to come downe into LYCAONIA, and CILICIA, because they might first enter ASIA. Lucullus marueled much at Tigranes counsell, that since he was minded to warre with the ROMANES, he did not vse Mithridates ayde in his warres at such time, as when he was in his best strength and force: and that he did not then ioyne his power with Mithridates, rather then suffer him to be destroyed and ouerthrowen, and afterwards with a cold hope go now to begin a new warre, hazarding him selfe with those, that could not helpe them selues. While these thinges passed in this sorte, Archares king Mithridates sonnie, that kept the Realme of BOSPHORVS, sent a crowne of gold vnto Lucullus, of the weight of a thousand crownes, praying him that he would name him a frende and confederate of the ROMANES. Whereupon Lucullus thought he was then at the very last ende of his first warre, and leaving Sornatius with sixe thousand men to keepe the realme of PONTVS, he departed with twelue thousand footemen, and lesse then three thousand horsemen to go to the second warres. And herein all the world condemned him, and thought it too rash and light a parte of him to goe with so small a company to fight with so many warlike nations, and to put him selfe vnto the hazard of so many thousandes of horsemen, in a maruelous large contrie, and of a wonderful length, enuironed round about with deepe riuers, and mountains, couered with snowe all the yeare through: so that his souldiers, which otherwise were no speciall well trained men, nor obedient to their Captaine, followed with an euill will, and did stubbornly disobey him. And on thother side, the common counsellers at ROME cried out on him continually, and openly protested before all the people, that out of one warre he sowed an other, which the common wealth had nothing to doe withall, and that he looked after none other thing, but still to raise new occasions of warres, to the ende he might alwayes haue armies at his commandement, & neuer leaue the warres, because he would make him selfe great with the wealth and perill of the common wealth. These crying counsellors in the end obtained their purpose, which was: to call home Lucullus againe, and to substitute Pompey in his place. But Lucullus all that, marched on with his army with all the possible speede he could, so that he came few dayes vnto the riuier of Euphrates, the which he found very high and rough by reason of the winter season: which troubled him maruelously at that present, doubting least it would hold him there a long time in finding out of boates, & making of postes and planckes to build a bridge to passe ouer his army. But towards night the water beganne to fall a litle, and in the night fell so much, that the next morning the riuier was come to her ordinary streame: and moreover, the contrie men there selues discerning certaine litle Ilandes that appeared vnto them in the midst of the water course, and the riuier very calme as a marrie the rounde about them, did honor Lucullus as a god, because it was a thing they had neuer seene chaunce before, as though at his comming the riuier had sodainly yeelded vnto him, and was become gentle to geue him safe and easie passage. And because he would not looke that opportunity, he passed ouer his army immediately: and was no sooner on thother side, but he met with a happy token of good lucke, which was this. On thother side of the riuier, there was a certaine number of kyne consecrated to Diana Persica, whom the barbarous people inhabiting beyonde the riuier of Euphrates, do reuerence and honor aboue all the other goddesses: and these kyne they employ to none other vse, but only to sacrifice them vnto this goddesse. They wander all about the contry where they will, without any maner of tying, or shackling otherwise, haueing only the make of the goddesse, which is a lampe printed vpon their bodies, and they are not easie to be taken when one would haue them, but with great a doe. One of these consecrated kyne, after that Lucullus army was passed ouer Euphrates, came to offer her selfe vpon a rock which they suppose is hallowed or dedicate vnto this goddesse, bowing downe her head, and stretching out her necke, like those that are tyed thorte, as if she had come enen of purpose to present her selfe to Lucullus, to be sacrificed as she was. And besides her, he sacrificed a bull also vnto the riuier Euphrates, in token of thanks for his safe passage ouer. Lucullus the first day did nothing but encampe him selfe only, on the other side of the riuier: but the next morning, and the other dayes following, he went further into the contry by the way of Sophene, hurting none that came and yeelded vnto him, or that willingly receiued his army. For when his men would haue had him to haue take a castell by force, where they said was great store of gold and siluer: he shewed them mownte Taurus a farr off, and told them it is that which we must rather go to take. As for the things which be in this Castell, they be kept for them that vanquish: and going on still with great iomeys, passed ouer the riuier of Tigris, and so entered the realme of Armenia with a maine armie. Now for Tigranes, the first man that ventured to bring him newes of Lucullus comming, had no ioy of it: for he cut of his head for his labor. And therefore from thenceforth there durst no man say any thing vnto him, vntill such time as he was at the last enuironned rounde with fire, which Lucullus army had raised about him, before he could heare any thing thereof. For he was sporting and gauding with his familiars, hearing their flattering tales, that Lucullus in deede were a noble Captaine, if he durst butray Tigranes comming downe in the citie of Ephesus only, and howe he would straightlie out of all Asia, so soone as he might but heare tell of his comming against him with so triumphing an army of so many thowland men. And thus may we see, that like as all bodies and braines, are not a like strong nor able to cary much wine: so in like case all wittes be not resolute and constant, neuer to doe amisse, nor to swarue from reasons bandes in great prosperity. Howbeit in the end, Mithrobarzanes, one of Tigranes familiars, was the next man that enterprised to tell him the troth: whose boldnes had litle better reward for his newes, then the first that was beheaded. For Tigranes sent him immediatly with three thowland horse, and a good number of footemen, commanding him that he should bring Lucullus aliae vnto him, and that furthermore, he should marche vpon the bellies of his men. Now was Lucullus already camped with parte of his army, & the other parte comming after, when his skowtes brought him

Tigranes sent the first messenger that brought the newes of Lucullus approach.

Tigranes sent Mithrobarzanes against Lucullus.

A him newes of the barbarous Captaines approach: which at the first put him in feare, that if the enemy should come and assaile them thus scattered in companies, & not ranged in battell, and ready to fight, he might ouerthrow them whiles they were in disorder. And therefore he remained within his campe to fortifie the same, and sent Sextilius one of his Lieutenants, with a thowland fixe hundred horse, and as many footemen (or a few more) as well naked as armed: commanding him to approach as neere to his enemy as he could without fighting, only to stay him there, vntill such time as he heard newes that all his army was come together into his campe. Sextilius went to doe his commandement, but he was compelled to fight, (though against his will) Mithrobarzanes came so brauely & lustely to assaile him. So was the battell stricken betwene them, in the which Mithrobarzanes was slaine valiantly fighting, & all his men either broken or killed, fewe excepted, that onely by flying saued them selues. After this ouerthrow, Tigranes forsooke his great royall citie of Tigranocerta that he built him selfe, & went to mownt Taurus, where he assembled a great number of men out of all partes. But Lucullus would geue him no leasure to prepare him selfe, but sent Murana on the one side to cut them by the way, and to ouerthrowe those that were assembled about him: and on the other side Sextilius to stoppe a great company of the Arabians that were comming to Tigranes, whom Sextilius set apon as they were ready to lodge, and ouerthrew them in maner euery man. And Murana following king Tigranes at the heeles, spied an occasion to geue the charge as he passed a long and narrow valley, in the bottom whereof the way was very ill, and specially for an armie of such a length: & taking the opportunity, set apon the reterward, which Tigranes perceiuing, fled straight vpon it, making all his cariage to be thrown downe in the way before the enemies to stay them. There were a great number of the Armenians slayne in this ouerthrow, and moe taken. Those things hauing thus successe, Lucullus went to the citie of Tigranocerta, the which he besiegeth round. In that citie were a maruelous number of Grecians that had bene brought thither by force out of Cilicia, and many of the barbarous people also whom they had vsed in the like forcible maner, as they had done the Adiabians, the Assyrians, the Gordienians, and the Cappadocians, whose townes and cities Tigranes had destroyed, and compelled them to come and inhabite there. By reason whereof, this city of Tigranocerta was full of golde and siluer, of mettels, statues, tables and pictures, because euery man (as well priuate, as Princes and Lords) studied to please the king, to enrich and beautifie this city, with all kindes of furniture and ornaments fit for the same. And hereupon Lucullus straightened the siege as much as he could, perswading him selfe that Tigranes would neuer suffer, that it should be taken, but (though he had otherwise determined) yet for very anger would present him battell, thereby to enforce him to raise his siege. And surely he guessed right, had it not bene that Mithridates had dissuaded him by expresse letters and messengers that he should in no case hazard battell, and perswaded him rather to cut of the vittells on all sides from the Romanes with his horsemen. The selfe same counsell and aduise did Taxiles (the Captaine whom Mithridates sent) geue him in his campe, and prayed him very earnestly, that he would not proue the inuincible force of the Romanes. Tigranes patientlie harkened to their reasons at the first. But when the Armenians were come, and all the force of the contry besides, and the Gordienians, and that the kinges of the Medes and of the Adiabians were come also with all their power, and that on thother side there came a maruelous great host of the Arabians that dwell apone the sea of Babylon, and a multitude of the Albanians from the Caspian sea, and of the Iberians their neighbors, besides a great company of free people liuing without a king, that dwell by the riuier of Araxes, some comming freely to doe him pleasure, other for their penions and pay which he gaue them: then was there none other talke neither at his table nor in counsell, but of assured hope of victorie, and of great braggies and barbarous threatmings, so that Taxiles was in great daiger of him selfe, because he was against the determination taken in counsell for geuing of the battell. Now was it thought that Mithridates did enuy the glory of king Tigranes, and therefore did thus dissuade him from battell. For which respect Tigranes would not so much as tary for him, and because also Mithridates should haue no parte of the honor of his victory: but went into the fild with all this great army, vauing amongst his famililiars as they reporte, that nothing grieved him but one, that he should fight with Lucullus alone, and not with all the other ROMANE Captaines. Now this brauery was not so fond, nor so farre out of square, but that there was great likelyhoode of it when he saw so many fundie nations about him, so many kinges that followed him, so many battells of armed footemen, and so many thousande of horsemen. For he had in his army of bowmen and slinges onely, twenty thousand: five and fifty thousand horsemen, whereof fuentene thousande men of armes, armed from toppe to toe, as Lucullus him selfe wrote vnto the Senate: and a hundred and fifty thousand armed footemen, deuied by ensignes and squadrons: of pyoners, carpenters, masons, and such other kinde of handy craftes men, to plaine wayes, to make bridges to passe ouer riuers, to stoppe streames, to cut wodde, and to make such kinde of workes, of this sorte of people, the number of five and thirty thousand, who followed in battell ray in the reward of the army, making their campe seme farre greater, & by so much the more stronger. When Tigranes shewed on the toppe of mownt Taurus, and that they might plainly see his whole army from the city, and that him selfe also might easily decerne Lucullus armie that besieged Tigranocerta: the barbarous people that were within the cite were so glad of this fight, that they made wonderfull shewes of ioy, and great clapping of handes, threatening the ROMANES from their walles, and shewing them the army of the ARMENIANS. Lucullus in the meane time fate in counsell to consider what was to be done: wherein some were of opinion that he should raise his siege, and goe with his whole armie vndeuided against Tigranes. But others liked not that he should leaue so great a number of enemies at his backe, neither that he should raise his siege. Lucullus made them aunswere, thar neither of them both did counsell him well, but both together did counsell him right. Whereuppon he deuied his armie, and left Murena at the siege of Tigranocerta with sixe thousand men: and he with foure and twenty cohorts (in the which were not aboute tenne thousand armed footemen) and all his horsemen, with a thousand bow men and slinges or thereabouts, went towards Tigranes, and camped in a goodly broad field by the riuers side. The ROMANES seemed but a handfull to Tigranes campe, so that for a while Tigranes parafysed but a may game of them to sporte withall. For some mocked them to scorne, other drewe lottes, and played away their parte of the spoyle, as if they had already wonne the fildie: and euery one of the kinges and Captaines came and offered them selues to Tigranes, and besought him euery man for him selfe, that he would geue him the honor alone to leade this battell, & that it would please him to sit by in some place to see the sporte. Tigranes then, because he would shewe that he could be as pleasaunt as the rest, spake a thing known to euery man. If they come as Ambassadors, quod he, they are very many: but if they come as enemies, they be but fewe. And thus they played vpon the ROMANES, and tooke their pleasure of them at that time: but the next morning by breake of day, Lucullus brought all his men armed into the fildie, and put them in order of battell. Now the campe of the barbarous people lay on thother side of the riuier towards the East, and by chaunce the streame of the riuier turned sodainly towards the West, where there was a better ford to passe ouer. Wherefore Lucullus marching with his army by the riuers side, following the streame to meete with some forde, halting to get ouer, Tigranes thought he had marched away, and called for Taxiles, and sayd vnto him, laughing. Doe thou thinke Taxiles, those goodly ROMANE legions, whom thou prailest to be men so inuincible: howe they fle away now? Taxiles aunswere the king againe. I would your good fortune (O king) might worke some miracle this day: for doubtlesse it were a straunge thing that the ROMANES should fle. They are not wont to weare their braue cotes and furniture vpon their armor, when they meane onely but to marche in the fildes: neither doe they carie their shieldes and targets vncafed, nor their burganets bare on their heades, as they doe at this present, hauing thrown away their leather cafes and coverings. But out of doubt, this goodly furniture we see so bright and glittering in our faces, is a manifest signe that they intend to fight, and that they marche towards vs. Taxiles had no sooner spoken these wordes, but Lucullus in the view of his enemies, made his ensigne bearer turne sodainly that caried the first Eagle, & the bands tooke their places to passe the riuier in order of battell. Then Tigranes secretly comen to him selfe, as out of dronkennes: cried out alowde twise, or thrise, come they then to vs? But then was there no small sturre and tumult, to put such a world of people into battell. The king Tigranes him selfe vndertooke to leade the middle battell, gaue the left wing vnto the king of the ADRIANIANS, and the right vnto the king of the MEDES: in the which were the most parte of the complete armed men, who made the first front of all the battell. But as Lucullus was ready to passe the riuier, there were certaine of his Captaines that came vnto him, to wish him to take heede that he fought not that day, because it was one of those which the ROMANES thought vnforgunate; and call them Atri, to say, blacke: for vpon one of those dayes, one Cepus was overthrowen in a set battell with all his army by the CINIBES. But Lucullus gaue the a pretty aunswere againe, which is not forgotten to this day: I will make this a happy day (sayd he) for the ROMANES. It was the sixteenth day of the month of October. And so with those wordes encouraging his men, passed ouer the riuier, and went him selfe the foremost man, and marched directly towards his enemy, armed with an apina of Steele, made with scalloppe shelles, shining like the sunne, & vpon that an arming coate fringed round about, holding his sword drawn in his hand: to let his men vnderstand, that they must sodainly ioyne with their enemies, and fight at the swordes pointe, that were not acquainted to fight but a farre off with shotte and slinges, and that he would so quickly winne the distaunce of grounde they had to marche ere they could ioyne, that they should haue no leasure to shoote. And furthermore, perceiving that the strength of their men of armes (whereof they made so great accompt) was ranged in battell vnder a hill, the toppe whereof was very plaine and quen, and the way vp the hill not passing foure furlonges trauaill, and not very hard nor steepe to clime: he sent thither certaine horsemen of the THRACIANS and GAULES which he had in pay, and commaunded them to geue a charge on the flanke to disorder them, & assay to cut their launces, with their swordes. For all the strength of these men of armes consisteth in their launces, and they can do nothing for them selues, nor against their enemies, they are so heauely armed and loden: so as it seemeth they are locked vp in their armor, as in an iron prison. And he him selfe therewithall taking two ensignes of footemen, stroue also to gaine the toppe of the hill, his souldiers following him hard at the heeles with a notable corage, because they saw him the foremost man trauailing a foot, and digging against the height of the hill. When he had gotten vp to the toppe, he itayed a litle in the highest place he could finde, and then cried out with a lowd voyce: oh companions, the victory is ours. And as he spake those wordes, he ledde them against these men of armes, commaunding them they should not medle with throwing of their darts, but taking their swordes in their handes they should strike at their thighes and legges, because they haue no other partes of their bodies naked. Howbeit there was no need of such fight, for they taryed not the ROMANES, but with great crying out turned their horse heades immediatly, and ranne cowardly (them selues and their horses, heauie armed as they were) through the middlest of the bandes of their footemen, before they had striken a stroke. And thus were so many thousandes of men broken without any stroke striken, or any man hurt, or one drop of blood seene to be spilt. But the great slaughter was, when they beganne to fle, or (to say better) when they thought to fle: for they could not fle, they ranne so one upon an others necke by reason of the maruelous length and bredth of their battells. Tigranes amongest the rest was one of the first that dislodged with a small company, & seeing his sonne running the same fortune, flying as him selfe did, tooke of his diadeame or royall bande from his head, and gaue it him weeping, commaunding him to saue him selfe as well as he could by some other way. But the young prince durst not put it on his head, but gaue it to one of his truly seruantes to keepe, who by chaunce was taken and brought vnto Lucullus: so that amongest the other spoyle and prisoners, there was taken Tigranes diadeame. It is thought that there were slaine at this ouerthrow, aboute a hundred thousand footemen, and very few of all the horsemen saued. On the ROMANES side, there were aboute a hundred hurt, and fiewe slaine. Antiochus the Philosopher speaking of this battell in a treatise he made of the gods, wryteth that the sunne neuer saw the like ouerthrow. And Strabo an other Philosopher in a certaine abridgement he made of stories sayd, that the ROMANES were ashamed, and laughed at them selues that they had drawn their swordes against such dastardly slaues. And Timo Linius declareth also, that the ROMANES were neuer in any battell with so small a number of fighting men, against so great a multitude of enemies: for the conquerers were not in all the world the twentieth parte (nothing like) of those that were ouercome. Wherefore the oldest and best experienced Captaines of the ROMANES did highly commend Lucullus, because he had ouer-come two of the greatest & most mighty Princes of the world, by two sundry contrary meanes, the one by tract and delay, and the other by speede and swiftnesse. For he vndermyned and consumed Mithridates, by holding backe, & delaying, at that time when all his strength was whole and to the contrary he destroyed Tigranes with great speede and haste. And thus did he that, which few Captaines could euer do: that is, vied delay of time to execute, and valliant expedition to winne the victory. This was the cause why Mithridates made no hast to come to the battel, thinking still that Lucullus had vied his wonted policy, to delay and geue backe alwaies, and therefore he came by small iorneyes vnto Tigranes campe. But meeting at the first with a fewe of the ARMENIANS, that fled as he came on his way, like men that had bene frayed, he straight mistrusted the ouerthrow: but afterwards meeting greater troupes of them naked & fore wounded, then he knew how the matter went. So he went to seeke out Tigranes, whom he found alone, forsaken of his men, and in very poore estate, yet did not he requite Tigranes in aduersity with that pride and disdain he had vied him before in his miserie: but lighted of his horse, to bewaile with him their common misfortune, and gaue him all his officers, and traine of a kings court that followed him to serue him, comforting him, & exhorting him to plucke vp his hart againe, and to be coragious thenceforth. Hereupon they both leauied a frethe of the whole force & power they could from all the partes of their dominions. In the meane season, there fell out great sedition in the city of TIGRANOCERTA, betwene the GRECIANS and the barbarous people: for the GRECIANS, they would haue yeelded vp the towne into Lucullus hands. Whereupon, Lucullus geuing an assault to the city at that very instant, wanne it, & seised vpon the kings treasure there, leauing all the rest to the spoile of the souldiers: in the which, besides all other riches, there was eight thousand talents in ready money. And yet besides all that, he gaue of the spoile that was won ap^{on} the enemies, eight hundred Drachmas vnto euery souldier. And vnderstanding that there were diuers musitians, common players, minstrels, and such kinde of people meete for feastes and sporte, whom Tigranes had sent for thither from all partes, to dedicate the Theater he had made in his city: he caused all the to serue at the sportes and feastes of this victory. After the solemnization whereof, he sent the GRECIANS home againe vnto their contry, and gaue them money to defraye their charges by the way, and the barbarous people also that were brought thither by force from their natie contries. And so it fortuneth, that by the desolation and destruction of a city forsaken, many others were built again, and stored with people: because those cities had thereby recouered their naturall inhabitants againe, who euer after did loue & honor Lucullus, as their benefactor and founder. All other things prospered also, according to his vertue and merites. For Lucullus liked better the praise that came of bounty, of iustice, and of clemencie: then that came by force of mai-shall prowes & cheualry. For in deedes of armes, he sayd his army partly deserued praise, and fortune also caried the best parte away: but the praise of the other, were onely due vnto him selfe. Whereby he shewed the valor of an excellent good man, well taught and trained vp in vertue: and so reaped the frute of his worthy deserts. For by those good partes, he wanne the hartes of the barbarous people in such sorte, that the kinges of the ARABIANS came of good will to put them selues and their goods into his hands. So did the nation of the SOPHENIANS also yeld them selues vnto him. The GORDIENIANS in like manner, they liked Lucullus so well, that they would willingly haue forsaken their cities, houses & contry, to follow him with their wives & children vpon this occasion. Zarbiennus king of these GORDIENIANS, as we haue recited before, had priuily entred amity with Lucullus, by meanes of Appius Claudius, who could no longer away with the tyranny of Tigranes. This practise was bewrayed vnto Tigranes, who put Zarbiennus, his wife, & children to death, before the ROMANES maine army came into the con-try of ARMENIA. Howbeit Lucullus did not forget it, but passing through his realme, gaue him very royall funeralles. For hauing heaped vp a huge pile of wodde, sumptuously set out with cloth of gold and siluer, & other rich spoiles of Tigranes: he him selfe in person, would needes set it a fire, and made the funerall effusions and accustomed sprincklings at burialsles, with his friends

A friendes and kinfemen, doing him this honor, as to call him friend and confederate of the Ro-MANE people, & appointed also a great summe of money besides to erect a sumptuous tombe for him. For they found great store of gold and siluer in the kinges castell, and there was pleny of prouision allof three hundred thousand buhells of wheate: the which did enrich his souldiers maruelously, and made Lucullus to be wondered at, that hauing received not one Drachma from the sparing coffers at ROME, he had notwithstanding made the warre enter-taine it selfe. About the selfe same time also, the king of the PARTHIANS sent Ambassadors vnto him to offer him his friendship and allyance: which Lucullus willingly accepted, and sent Ambassadors fro him also of acceptation, who made report to Lucullus at their returne, that the king of the PARTHIANS stood doubtfull how to resolue which parte he should take; and that secretly he sent vnto Tigranes, to aske the realme of MESOPOTAMIA for his reward to aide him against the ROMANES. Lucullus being truly enformed of the king of PARTHIAES double dealing, determined to leaue Tigranes and Mithridates, as two enemies wearied & ouercome, & a litle to proue the force & power of the PARTHIANS by making warres vpon the, thinking it great honor vnto him, if he might discomfit and ouerthrow three so mighty kings one after another, like a valliant conqueror that had ouercome three famous Captaines together, and had passed through the contries of three of the greatest Princes vnder the sunne, alwayes a conqueror, and neuer conquered. Hereupon he wrote immediatly vnto Sernadinus and other of his Captaines which he had left to keepe the realme of PONTVS, that they should repaie to him with all speede with the bandes they had vnder their charge, for that he was determined to departe out of the contry of GORDIENIA, to go against the PARTHIANS: howbeit his purpose altered by occasion. For his Lieutenantes that had many times before founde their souldiers mutinous, and rebelling at their commaundements, knew plainly then their cancred souldiers & incorrigible disobedience. For they could not possibly get them from thence, by any compulsion or perswasions they could vie: but contrarily they cryed out, and tolde them plainly, that they would no longer tary where they were, but would goe home to their contry, and leaue the realme of PONTVS without gard or garrison at all. And further, that worst of all was, when these newes were brought to Lucullus campe, they gaue a full example of boldnes to his souldiers there, to mutiny in such sorte, hauing good will and disposition thereunto of themselves before. For their purses being full, and they acquainted with finenes, were become so dull and lasie, that they could endure no paines nor hardnes of warres, but desired to liue in all idleness and ease. And hearing the reporte of their fellows stourenesse, called them iustice laddes, saying, they must needes take the like course, and doe as they taught them, vaunting of their good seruice of long time done, which well deserued leaue nowe to departe home with safety, and thenceforth take their rest. Lucullus hearing of this their talke, & many other their words worse, and fuller of sedition then these: brake of his enterprise against the PARTHIANS, and went againe in the midst of sommer to meete with Tigranes. But when he was come to the top of mount Taurus, it grieved him to see the fields so full of wheate yet standing, which came by the season of the year, and coldnes of the ayer, being so lacke and slowe in all those partes. Neuertheles, he came downe into the valley, and at two or three skirmishes ouerthrow the ARMENIANS, that ventured to abide his coming downe. And ranne ouer all the valley, and destroyed the whole contry, without let or stoppe of any man, taking away the prouision of come that was made for Tigranes campe: wherby he straightened his enemies vnto that neede and necessity of vittells which him selfe feared, & yet ceased not to prouoke them (by all other meanes) to come to battell. Sometime enclosing their cape with trenches about, as if he ment to famish them: sometime againe destroying and spoyling the whole contry before their face.
But because they had so ofte bene discomfited, they would no more stirre; nor once moue against him. Lucullus perceiuing that, in the end raised his campe, & went and layed siege vnto ARTAXATA, the chiefe city of the kingdom of ARMENIA, in the which were Tigranes lawfull wives & young children, hoping that Tigranes would rather hazard an other battell, then suffer that city to be lost. It is sayd that Hannibal of CARTHAGE (after king Antiochus was ouer-throwen in battell by the ROMANES) went vnto king Artaxerxes, whom he taught many necessary and profitable things for his realme: & amongst other, considering that one of the goodlieft and pleasauntest places of all his kingdom lay wast, and no reckoning made of it, between a plat of a city, brought the king thither, and caused it to be built and inhabited. The king liked his deuise maruelous well, and prayed him to take the charge vpon him to see the worke finished. And thus was this noble and famous city built, and called after the kings name, Armenia; and held euer after the reputation of the chieft place of the whole realme of Armenia, Tigranes being aduertised that Lucullus went to laye siege thereunto, could not endure it, but went with all his army to follow the ROMANES, and the fourth day came and camped hard by them: insomuch as there was but the riuer of Arfanias betwene them, which the ROMANES of necessite must passe ouer to goe to ARTAXATA. Lucullus hauinge first sacrificed vnto the goddess, assuring him selfe of the victorie, as if he had it already in his handes: made his armie passe ouer in order of battell, putting twelue cohortes in the fronte, and the other behinde, fearing least the enemies hauing a great number of men of armes shoulde enuironne them at their backes. They had against them also the MARDIAN bow men a horse backe, and the LUB-RIANS with their lances, in whom Tigranes trusted more then in any other, as in the best footdiers he had in pay: and yet for all that they did no notable seruice. For when they had skirmished but a little with the horsemen of the ROMANES, they durst not tarie the legionaries or footebands that came behinde them, but disperfed them selues, some flying one way, some another, which intified the ROMANES horsemen to follow the chafe. But when the men of armes that were about Tigranes perfon, sawe the horsemen so scattered abroad, they began straight to breake vpon the footemen. Lucullus seeing the great multitude of them, and how passingly they were armed and appointed, being somewhat affrayed thereof: sent in hast to call in his horsemen that followed the chafe, and in the meane time him selfe marched foremost against these Lordes and Satrapes, which were in the fronte before him with all the nobility of their hoast, whom he put in such a feare, that before he could come to hand strokes, they all turned taile and fled. There were three kings ranged in battell one hard by another, howbeit of the three, he that fled most shamefully and cowardly, was Mithridates king of PONTVS, who had not the hart so much as to abide the cries of the ROMANES. The chafe was very long: for it continued all night vntill such time as the ROMANES were wearied with killing, taking of prisoners, and packing vp of all kindes of spoyle. Titus Livius sayeth, that there were flaine moe men in the first battell: but greater personages in the seconde, and the chieft of the enemies were all taken. After this battell Lucullus hart being bigge, and fearing nothing, determined to goe further into the contry, euen vtterly to destroy this barbarous king. But in the time of the equinoctiall autumnne, (when the weather waxed more bitter then any man would in that season haue thought) there fell out so great a cold, that for the most part it did nothing but snow: and if the element did any thing cleere, then frose it so hard, that the horse could come by no water, the riuers were so extremely congealed with ice. And there could no man passe ouer by forde: for they did not so soone enter, but the ice brake, and cut the vaines & sinewes of the horse legges a sunder, they were so hard and thicke withall. And furthermore, the contry being full of trees, woddes and forrestes, and the wayes very narrowe, not being able to passe by the fieldes, they were through wet with snow that fell vpon them: & when they came to their lodging, then it was worfe, for there were they constrained to lye in soft & moyst places. And therefore the souldiers had followed but few dayes after this battell, but they refused to goe any further. And first they sent their Collonnells and Captaines to intreate Lucullus to leaue of this iorney. Afterwards they gathered together more boldly in trowpes, and in the night time beganne to murmur and groyne in their tents (which is a certaine signe and token of a minious armie, that hath a minde to rebell against their Generall) although that Lucullus vsed all gentle perswasions to winne them with patience to abide this iorney, at the least, till time they might take the cite of CARTHAGE in ARMENIA: to thende they might there destroy the worke and memory of the greatest enemy that euer the ROMANES had in this world, meaning Hannibal. But when he saw all this would not preuaile, he brought them backe againe, & passed ouer mount Taurus an other way, and came downe into the contry called MYGDONIA, a very hotte and fertile fylde, where there is a great city, and maruelously replenished with in-habitauntes: who call it NISIBIS, and the GRECIANS call it ANTIOCH, of MYGDONIA. In that

A that city Gouras was Gouernor, who was Tigranes owne brother: but for experie in engines of battery, and for sufficiency and skill in such matters, there was Callimachus also, he that so matroulously troubled Lucullus before at the siege of the city of AMISVS. Lucullus placing his campe before this city, besieged the same by all such meanes as might enforce it, and that lo valliantly, that in very (horre) time he took it by assault. And as for Gouras, who submitted him selfe to Lucullus mercie, he was very curteously intreated. But for Callimachus, he would not once heare him speake, notwithstanding that he promised, if they would saue his life, he would tell them of coffers full of great treasure hidden, which no man knew but him selfe onely. But Lucullus commaunded them to bring him with gnyes to receiue the punishment he had iustly deserued, for setting the city of AMISVS a fire, and taking from him the meane to shewe the B GRECIANS his goodnesse, affection and liberality towards them. Vntill this present time, it might be truly sayd, that good fortune euer fauored & followed Lucullus in all his enterprises and affayres: but from that time forwards, it was quickly seene that the fauorable blast of fortune failed him, he did all his things with so great payne, and all that he did fell out contrarie vnto him, and to very ill purpose. In deede he did euer hew the valiancy, patience, and great courage that should be in a valliant Generall, or Lieutenant of an armie. But his exploits and doinges had neuer after that easie grace, nor shining glory they were wont to haue: but to the contrary, he was like to haue lost all that he had wonne before, through the misfortunes that fell vpon him, and for the brawles and vaine contention he had with his people to no purpose.
But the worst was, that they make him selfe thonly author of all these euills, because he could C not, or would not entertaine the goodwill of the multitude of his souldiers: thinking that whatsoeuer a Generall, or any other officer of state or calling doth to please and content them he hath vnder his charge, is to dishonor him selfe, and to geue cause vnto his souldiers to despise his authoritie. But that which made most against him was this: that he gaue no estimation to gentlemen, and men of like quality to him selfe, but did disdain them, and thought them vnworthy to be equall with him. For these they say were his faultes and imperfections, but otherwise that he wanted no vertues, nor naturall giftes & good condicions that could be possibly wished for, or desired. For he was a tall gentleman, of goodly presence, well spoken, wise and discreete, as well in matters of gouernment, as in warres: and as well to perswade the people in peace, as to encourage his souldiers in warre. Salustius wryteth of him, that his souldiers began to mislike with him, euen from the first entry into these warres, because he made them lye out two winters together in the field, one after another: the one before the city of CIZICVS, and the other before the city of AMISVS. And euen as much did the other winters following vexe and trouble them. For either they lay in their enemies contry, or else if they lay in their frendes, yet he made them campe abroad in the field, and shrowd them selues in their tentes: for Lucullus neuer entred with his army into any city or confederate towne of GRECE. Now if the souldiers of them selues misliked Lucullus, the counsellors at ROME that were his enemies, and enuied his prosperity and glory, gaue them yet greater occasions to mutine against him.
For they continually accused him to the people in their orations, that he drew out this warre in length, purposely because he would alwayes haue occasion to rule, & meanes to get, hauing in E his hands in manner all CILICIA, ASIA, BITHYNIA, PAPHLAGONIA, GALATIA, PONTVS, ARMENIA, and all the provinces and regions as farre as to the riuer of Phasis: and yet he had not long before spoyled the Princely houles of Tigranes, as if he had bene sent thither only to sack and spoyle, and not to destroy & ouercome those kings. And they say that it was Lucius Quintius, one of the Prætors, that spake these wordes. It was he also that most moued the people to take order, that Lucullus should be called home, & other sent to succede him in the charge & gouernment of the contries he had subdued. By the selfe same meane, it was also ordained: that diuers which were vnder his charge, should be disperfed with all for their othes, and licenced to leaue the warres when they thought good. But besides those & such like great causes, there was yet another more dangerous plague, & that most ouerthrew Lucullus proceedings, passing all the other euills being put together: and that was Publius Clodius, a wicked, licentious, and a harebrained man. He was Lucullus wiues brother, and she was so light of her body, that Clodius her brother was accused of incontinencie with her. This Clodius being at that time in Publius Clodius stirred up the soldiers against Lucullus.

Lucullus campe, cared not that estimation and credit he thought him selfe worthy of. For he tooke him selfe equall with the best, and would needes haue bene holden for chiefe: when in deede there were many of farre better desert, he being noted both for a vicious and ill disposed person. Whereupon he beganne for sight to suborne the bandes called Fimbrians, and to stirre them vp against Lucullus, sowing sweete and pleasant wordes amongst the souldiers, which being wonted therunto, looked still to be flattered. For they were those whom Fimbrius had procured to kill the Consul Flaccus, and choose him in his steede for their Capitaine. By reason whereof they gaue good care to Clodius words, and called him a noble Capitaine, a louer of souldiers. For when he spake vnto them, he made as though he had pittied them, for that they should neuer see an end of their great paynes and warres, but should miserably consume their dayes in fighting continually, sometime with one nation, and sometime with another: and that they wandered through all the contries of the world, receiuing no worthy reward of so long and painfull seruice, seruing only to gard Lucullus cartes & camells laden with plate and vessell of golde, and siluer, and other precious stones. Where the souldiers that had serued vnder Pompey, tooke nowe their ease at home in their contry with their wiues and children, and were landed men, dwelling in goodly fayer cities, as rich burgeses and wealthy citizens: and yet they had not driuen Mithridates and Tigranes out of their kingdomes, into desert places vnhabitable, nor had destroyed the Princely houles of Asia, but only made a litle warre in Spain against those that were banished, & in Italy against fugitiue slaues. Shall we then sayd he, cary harmesse on our backs all the dayes of our life? Is it not better that we which are escaped vntill this present, rescue our selues, our bodies & liues for that noble Capitaine, who esteemeth the greatest honor and glory he can achieve vnto, is to make his souldiers rich that serue vnder him? Lucullus army was so seduced and corrupted, with these munions and seditious accusations, that the souldiers would no longer follow him, neither against Tigranes, nor against Mithridates: who went presently out of Armenia into his realme of Pontus, and beganne to conquer it againe, whilest the Roman souldiers mutining against their General, remained idle in the prouince of Gordiena, excusing them selues by the winter season, & tarrying vntill Pompey or some other Capitaine should quickly come to raise the siege, and succede Lucullus. Notwithstanding, when they vnderstoode that Mithridates had ouerthrowen Fabius, one of Lucullus Lieutenants, and that he went against Sornatius & Triarius: they were then ashamed of them selues, and became contented to be led by Lucullus. But Triarius in a brauery, when he heard that Lucullus drew neere, made hast to winne the victory, as if it had bene cocke sure before Lucullus came: and was him selfe ouerthrowen in a great battell, where some say there dyed aboue seuen thousand Romanes, amongst the which were a hundred and fifty centurions, & foure and twenty Captaines or Collonnells of a thousand men a peece, and yet besides, Mithridates tooke their campe also. Shortly after this overthrow, Lucullus came thither, who hid Triarius, whom the souldiers fought in their anger by all the meanes they could to kill. Now when Lucullus was come, he prouoed sundrie meanes to procure Mithridates to battell: but Mithridates would not once stirre abroad, because he looked for Tigranes that came downe with a mighty power. Whereupon he determined againe to goe against Tigranes to fight with him, before Mithridates and he ioynd forces together. But as he was in his iorney towards him, the Fimbrian bandes beganne to rebella new, and would not follow his enignes, saying, and alleaging of them selues, that by decree of the people they had leaue to departe, and were discharged from their othe: and furthermore that Lucullus had no more to do to commaund them, considering that the government of the prouinces which he had, was geuen vnto others. Lucullus perceiving this, did so humble him selfe vnto them, supposing that way to winne them, as there was no kinde of vncomely humilitie but he submitted him selfe vnto it: in somuch as he went into their tentes to pray and intreate them one after another, with water in his eyes, and with fo great lowlinesse, as euen to shake handes with them. But they fiercely reiected all his curtesies and fayer intreaties, casting their pennyleffe purses before him, and angrily bad him fight with his enemies alone, since he had with the spoile of them all so well enriched him selfe alone. Neuerthelesse, at the intercession and earnest request of the other soldiers, these Fimbrian bands were compelled to promise,

The Fimbrian souldiers forsake Lucullus.

Lucullus forced to humble him selfe to his rebellious souldiers.

A misse that they would yet tary all that sommer, so that if no man in the meane time offered them battell at the ende of the terme, they might go where they would. Lucullus was forced to accept this condicon, or else to remaine alone, & consequently to forsake the contry of the barbarous people. With much a do thus he kept them together, but in such sorte, as he durst no more venter to compell them to come to battell, contenting him selfe that they were willing onely to stay with him, being forced to suffer Tigranes in the meane time to destroy and ouerrunne the contry of Cappadocia, & Mithridates also to bragge againe, of whom he had before written to the Senate that he had vterly ouercome him: in somuch as there came commissioners & deputies from Rome by his owne procurement, to order the state of the realme of Pontus with him, as of a kingdom already wonne to the Roman Empire. But when they were come, they found him not master of him selfe, & that his owne souldiers flowted him, and did him all the spite and iniury they could. For they were so vnruely towards their Capitaine, and did so much disdain him, that when the end of the sommer was come, they armed them selues with armor and weapon, and drawing out their swordes in mockery, challenged their enemies to battell which were gone out of the fildes: and after they had made the noyse and cryes accustomed when they ioynd battell, and made as though they fought, hurling and swinging their swordes in the ayer, they went from the campe, declaring openly that their time was expired, which they promised Lucullus to tary. On another side Pompey had written vnto the other souldiers that were yet in campe, to come vnto him: for through the peoples fauor at Rome, the practises and flatteries of the common counsellors there, he was substituted General in Lucullus place. Which much misliked the Senate and nobility: for they thought Lucullus greatly wronged to haue a succesor sent, not to succcede him in troubles and dangers, but in honor and glory of triumphe. And that they should compell him not onely to resigne vp the office of a General to another, but (for the good seruice he long time had done) the reward of his honor due for the same: and this also more misliked them, that were then about him. That so soone as Pompey was arrived in Asia, he tooke all power & authority from Lucullus, to punish or reward any man, for good or ill seruice done to the common wealth in those warres, & did moreover prohibite by publicke bills set vp in euery common place, that they should no more repaire vnto him, nor obey ought, that he, or any of the ten commissioners sent to dispose of the state of the prouinces wonne by him, should commaund or ordaine: and because Pompey came with a greater power and army then his, he was in some feare of him. Their friends thought good neuerthelesse they should meete together: and so they did inconuently, in a village of Galatia, where at their first meeting they saluted ech other very courteously, reioycing together of the noble victories that either had wonne. Lucullus was the elder man, but Pompey of greater dignity, because he had bene General of the Roman people in many warres, & had already triumphed twise. The bundells of rodde which the sergeants caried before them, were wreathed about with lawrell branches for the victories they had both achieved: but Pompeys bundells were withered away, because they had come a longe iorney through hotte and drye contries. Lucullus officers seeing theirs withered, courteously gaue them of theirs fresh and new gathered: which Pompeys frendes tooke for a signe of good lucke. For to say truly, the things that Lucullus did in the time of his charge, were cause of the honor that Pompey afterwards wanne. Howbeit in the end for all their talke, they were no whit the better frendes: but departed thome from thother more straunge then they met. For Pompey by a plaine edict, brake, reuoked, and disannulled all Lucullus ordinaunces, and taking from him all his other souldiers, left him but only fixtene hundred to accompany his triumphe, and yet they followed him with vnwilling mindes: such was Lucullus imperfection & mayme, either by nature, or frowardnes of fortune, that he lacked the chiefe thing a General should haue, which was, to be beloued of his souldiers. For if he had attained to that perfection, amongst many other his excellent vertues, and magnanimity, wisdom, iudgement, & iustice: the riuier of Euphrates had not bene the vtermoost confines of the Empire of Rome on Asia side, but it had extended as farre as the sea Hyracane, yea euen vnto thutmost parte of the world. For king Tigranes had already conquered the other nations that lye beyonde that, sauing the contry of Parthia, which then was not so great nor stronge, as it appeared afterwarde in

Craſſus time: nor fo ioynd and knit together, but (what through ciuill diſſentions amongſt them at home, and forrein warres of their neighbors abroad) was ſo weake, that with ſmall difficulty they could defend themſelues from the ARMENIANS, that continually harried them out of their ſkinnes. But to take things rightly as they be in deede, me thinks that Lucullus did more hurt vnto his contry by other, then he did benefit the ſame by him ſelfe. For the tokens of triumph and victories which he wanne in ARMENIA ſo neere vnto the PARTHIANS, the cities of TIGRANOCERTA and of NISIBIS which he had ſacked and ſpoyled, the great treaſure that he brought to ROME, and the Diademe alſo of Tigranes, which was thewedin triumphe as a priſoner with the reit: moued Craſſus with ſuch a maruelous deſire to paſſe into ASIA, as if all the barbarous people had bene nothing but an aſſured ſpoyle, and a purpoſed pray vnto all thoſe that would come to take them. But Craſſus ſarre otherwiſe, finding him ſelfe galled and troubled with the arrowes of the PARTHIANS, knew then by prooſe, that Lucullus had not ſo much overcome his enemies for that they wanted ſkill, or were a cowardly people, as he had done through his wiſedom and valiantnes. But that ſhalbe ſcene hereafter. Furthermore, Lucullus being now returned to ROME, found firſt of all his brother Marius accuſed by one Gaius Memmius, for that he had done in his office of treaſurer, in *Sylla*es time, and by his commandment, whereof he was cleared by ſentence of the iudges. But Memmius of ſpight turned his anger againſt Lucullus ſelfe, ſtirring vp the people againſt him, and letting them vnderſtand that Lucullus had kept backe and robbed much parte of the treaſure, which ſhould haue comen to the common wealth, and that to worke his ſeate the better, had prolonged theſe warres as he did: wherefore he perſwaded them ſtarty to deny him the honore of his triumphe. And truly Lucullus was in great daunger to haue loſt it vnto: but that the noble men of the city, and they that were of greateſt authority, intermeddled them ſelues with the tribes when they came to paſſe it by voyces of the people, whome they intreaced ſo much through ſute and perſwaſion, that in the end, with much a doe, the people ſuffred him to enter the city in triumphe. So Lucullus made a triumphant entry, nor terrible nor troubleſome for the long ſhewe or ſight thereof, nor for the multitude of things that he brought thither with him, as many other Capitaines had done before him. For he cauſed the ſhowe place (which they call Circus Flaminius at ROME) to be ſet out and furniſhed chiefly with armor and weapons of the enemies to a maruelous number: and with the kinges engynes and inuentions of battering peeces, which was a pleaſant ſight to behold. And in this ſhow, there was a certaine number of his men of armes brauely armed, tenne cartes of warre armed with ſythes that paſſed by, and three ſcore of the chiefeſt frendes and Capitaines of the two kinges that were led priſoners through the city. And there were alſo drawn after them, a hundred and tenne gallies all armed in the prooues with ſtrong ſpurs of copper, and a ſtatue of Mithridates all of cleane gold, ſixe foote high, with a rich target ſet with pretious ſtones. Beſides all that, there were twenty cubberds as full of ſiluer plate as could be, and thirty cubberds full alſo of golden veſſell, armor and coyne of gold, caried vpon mens ſhoulders. After them followed eight mules laden with golden beddes, and ſixe and fifty other mules that caried ſiluer bullion, & a hundred & ſeu en other moyles that caried ſiluer coyne, amounting to the ſumme of two hundred three ſcore and tenne thouſand ſeſtertios. Furthermore, there were bookes of accompt caried alſo, wherein were particularly written the ſummes of mony which Lucullus had deliuered before vnto Pompey for the warre againſt pyrates on the ſea, & vnto the treaſurers and high treaſors, to put into the ſparing coffers of the common wealth at ROME. And afterwarres in an article by it ſelfe, that he had geuen nyne hundred and fifty Drachmas to euery ſouldier by the polle. After the ſhewe of this triumphe was ended, he made a generall feaſt, in the which he feaſted all the city and villages thereabouts, which the ROMANES call Vicos. And afterwarres forooke he his wife Clodia for her vnchaſt and wanton life, and married Servilia Caſca ſiſter: howbeit he wanne nothing by the exchange, for he ſped as euill with the ſeconde, as he did with the firſt. For, ſauing that ſhe was not ſlandred with thineſt of her owne brethern, otherwiſe ſhe was as diſhoneſt and vnchaſt as Clodia: and yet he bare withall a while for her brothers ſake, but at the length grew weary of her, and put her away as he had done Clodia. Nowe when he had filled the Senate with a maruelous hope and expectation of him, Lucullus triumphe.

Lucullus forſakeſ Clodia and marieth Seruilia Caſca: ſiſter, as vnchaſt as Clodia.

A thing (who thought they had now got one to encounter and withſtande Pompeys tyranny, and to withſtand and maintaine the authority of the nobility and Senate againſt the people), for that by his noble deedes he had atchieued ſo great fame and reputacion, he ſodainly gaue ouer all deliſhings in thaffayres of the common wealth: either becauſe he ſawe it ſo beſt, being a hard thing now to keepe it from ruine: or elſe (as other ſayd) for that he felt him ſelfe ſufficiently furniſhed with honor and wealth, and therefore determined from thenceforth to liue quietly all at his eaſe, after ſo great paynes, trauailes and troubles, the end whereof fell nor out ouer fortunately. And ſurely ſome were of his minde, and liked this great change of his maruelous well: becauſe he did not as Marius did, neither happened on the ill ſuccelle and end that Marius had. For Marius after the notable victories which he brought from the CITIZENS, and after his valliant actes in warres which had won him great honor, yet would he be ſo leaue of, when he might haue bene chronicled to his wonderfull glory: but of an vnſatiable minde, and ambitious deſire to rule and beare ſway, (being withall a very olde man) went and ſorted him ſelfe amongſt young men deſirous of gouernment, who brought him not only to comit many outrages, but made him ſelfe alſo to ſuffer greater cruelties. It is thought alſo that Marius had ended his aged courſe more happily, if after he had quenched Catiline coſpiracy, he had then taken his eaſe. And ſo had Scipio in like caſe, if when he had ioynded NUMANTIA vnto CARTHAGE, he would then haue quieted him ſelfe. And therefore, ſome ſay, that there is a certaine reſolution and time appointed, beyond the which no wiſe man ſhould medle any more with thaffayers of the common wealth: no more then a man whole youth & ſtrength is gone and decayed, is any more fit to iuſt, wreſtle, or enter into ſuch exerciſes of the body. But contrarily, Craſſus and Pompey mocked Lucullus, becauſe he gaue him ſelfe ſo much to pleaſure and paſtime: as if to liue pleaſantly, & delicatly did not worke become his age, then to comend an army, or to gouerne thaffayres of a common weale. And for my parte, reading Lucullus life: me thinks that I read an auncient comedy, the beginning whereof is tedious, & the latter end ioyfull. For at the beginning of his life, you finde notable exploits done by him in warres, and great good gouernment alſo in peace: but in the end they all turned into feaſts, and banquetts; and lacking litle of maſkes and mommeries, dauncing with torches, and all other ſuch delights fitte for young men. For I bring within the compaſſe and reckoning of his finches and pleaſures, his ſumptuous buildinges; his ſtately walles and galleries, his home houſes and ſtoutes, his tables and pictures, his ſtatues alſo: and the great workmanſhippe and curioſitie he had beſides of all other cartes by him, gotten together out of all partes to his infinite charge; abuſing therein the world of goodes and treaſure gotten and wonne in the warres, in time of his charge and office of Generall, and otherwiſe. In ſomuch, that notwithstanding exceſſe and ſuperfluity hath euer ſince increaſed vntil this preſent time, yet they reckon the gardens Lucullus made, to be the moſt ſumptuous and delicateſt places that the Emperors haue. And therefore Tubero the Stoike Philoſopher, hauing ſene theſe ſtately works which Lucullus had cauſed to be made neere vnto NAPLES, by the ſea ſide, (where there are mountaines cut through, light as day, and hanged vpon vawtes) and great ditches caſt by force to make the ſea paſſe and runne through his houſes, to keepe fiſh therein, and lodgings alſo that he built in the ſea it ſelfe: he called Lucullus, Xerxes the gownman, as if he would haue ſayd, Xerxes the ROMANE. For eu en ſo did Xerxes in olde time cauſe the mountaine Athos to be cut in ſunder, and a channell to be digged there to paſſe his ſhippes through. He had alſo many other pleaſant places within the territories of ROME, neere vnto THESELYUM, where there were great large halles ſet vpon tarraſſes to ſee rounde about farre off in the day time. And Pompey going thither ſometime to ſee him, reproved him greatly, telling him that he had built a maruelous ſayer ſommer houſe, but not to be dwelt in, the winter ſeaſon. Lucullus laughing, answered him: doe ye thinke me to haue leſſe wit and reaſon then ſtorkes or cranes, that I can not ſhift houſes accordinge to the ſeaſon? An other time there was a Prator of ROME, that makinge playes to ſhewe the people paſtime, ſent vnto Lucullus to borrow certaine purple clokes to ſet forth his players. Lucullus made him aunſwer, that he would cauſe his folkes to looke if he had any. And the next morning demanding of him, how many he ſhould neede: the other aunſwered, that a hundred would ſerue his turne. Whereupon Lucullus told him againe, he would furnish him with two hundred, if his case so required. And therefore the Poet Horace writing of this story, addeth to a notable exclamation against superfluity, saying: that men think themselves poore house, where there is no more riches then necessary, and where there is not more than appeareth in sight, and that the master knoweth of. He was a vain man in his ordinary service at his borde, not only in that his beddes whereon he fedde, were covered with rich pettes of purple, and him selfe served in gold and silver vessel set with precious stones, but there was dauncing, musike, plays, and other such like pastimes of ordinary; but also for that he was continually served with all sortes of fine dainty dishes, with workes of paltrey, banqueting dishes, and frute curiously wrought and prepared, which only made him to be wondered at of men of simple vnderstanding and meane condicon. Therefore was Pompey marvellously esteemed, and specially for a word he spake one day when he was sicke, and that the Philistia had willed him to eate of a thruse. For when his seruants told him they were hard to come by in sommer, but at Lucullus house where they brought them vp all the yeare through: he would in no wise they should aske any of him, but sayd vnto his Philistia. What if Lucullus were not geuen to pleasure: could not Pompey liue? And so willed them to get him some other such thing, as they might more easily come by. Cato was Lucullus friend & kinsman both, and yet he so much disliked his manner of liuing and ordinary expence: that one day a young man making a long and tedious Oration in open Senate (out of time, and to no purpose) touching meane dyet, sobriety, & temperance of life: Cato could no longer abide him, but rose vp, and sayd vnto him. What wilt thou not leaue babbling to vs all day: thou that art riche as Craesus, that liuest as Lucullus, and speakest as Cato? Other affirme that these words were spoken thus, but that it was not Cato that spake them: neuertheless it is certaine, by the notable sayings they haue gathered of Lucullus, he did not only delight to liue so delicately, but also he gloried in it. Some wryte that he feasted certaine Grecians many dayes together in his house, that were come out of Greece to Rome; and that they being men brought vp with the sobriety and simplicity of Greece, after they had bene feasted there diuers times, were ashamed, & refused to goe thither any more, being afterwards intreated to come to Lucullus, supping that he had made them this great chere for their owne sakes. Lucullus hearing of it, told them: my Lords, I pray you refuse not to come to me for that. In deede I must needs graunt that there is somewhat more then ordinary, to welcome you with all: but I tell you truly, the most paine is for Lucullus sake. An other time when he supped all alone, and his men had layed but one bord, and prepared but a reasonable supper for him, he was very angry with them, and called for his steward to know why he was served so: the steward answered him. My Lord, because I sawe you fende for no body, I thought this supper sufficient. What, sayd he againe: knewest not thou that Lucullus should suppe to night with him selfe? In fine, Lucullus fare was commonly known through Rome, that there was no talke but of Lucullus noble housekeeping. Whereupon, Cicero and Pompey being desirous to see the prooffe thereof, came one day to him in the market place seeing him at pleasure: (for Cicero was Lucullus very good friend, and Pompey also; and though there was some iarre betweene them for matters of warres, he did not let for that to come vnto him, and to speake gently one to another) and Cicero after he had saluted him, asked him if he would be contented they should come and see him. Oh, sayd he, with all my hart: I pray you come to me. Well then, sayd Cicero, Pompey and I will come and suppe with you to night, with cōdicion that you prouide no more then your ordinary. Lucullus told them againe, they should then fare but badly, and therefore it were better they taried till to morrow. But they would none of that, nor no suffer him to speake with his men, for feare he should cōmaund them, to provide somewhat more then for him selfe. Neuertheless, at his desire, they suffered him only in their presence alowde to tell one of his men, that he would suppe that night in Apollō: (for so was one of his most stately and sumptuous halles of his house called) and with that word only finely deceived them both, and they neuer found him. For every halles had his certaine summe and rate appointed for the charge and expence of euery supper they made in them, and the ordinary furniture and seruice for the same. So that when his seruants had their watche worde but in what halles he would suppe, they knewe straight what charge he would be at for his supper, & what orders should be obserued therein. Antiochus was to spende when he made any feast in the halles of Apollō, fifty thousand pence, and that the day the supper was prepared according to that value: inso much as Pompey marvelled howe it could be possible that a supper of so exceeding great charge could be so sodainly prepared: In such things therefore did Lucullus laudably and riotously spend his goodes, like people in deede gotten of slaues and barbarous people. But that specially which he bestowed in goodly trariffes & fayer walks, or other pleasant places thereabouts conuenient to stand reason together, and neuer shut dore against them: where learned men met commonly, and oftentimes spent the whole day in conference together, as in the house of the Muses, being very glad when other matters were dispatched, they had so much leasure as but to goe thither. And Lucullus selfe would also many times be amongst them, in those trariffes and pleasant walks, delighting much to talke with them: and he did euer helpe to dispatch them that had any busines with him, and graunted the thing they requested of him. To conclude, his house was a common receite for all them that came from Greece to Rome. He loued all manner of Philosophy, and refused no sect of the same. But from his youth vpward, he euer loued & esteemed best the Academicke sect, not that which they call the new Academicke (although it florished at that time through Carneades workes, which Philo made such estimation of) but the old Academicke, which the Philosopher Antiochus of the city of Ascalon did defende and maintaine at that time, being an eloquent rethorician and well spoken, whom Lucullus sought to win by all means to make him his friende, and to haue him in house with him: because he might inuey against *Philo*s hearers and followers, whose scholler Cicero among the rest was, that wrote a notable booke against this olde Academicke sect. And in the same he reciteth Lucullus, maintaining the opinion of the old Academicke: who hold, that a man may certainly know, and comprehend something, and called that Catalepin: but Cicero defended the contrary. The booke is intituled Lucullus: for they were (as we haue rehearsed before) very good friendes, and had both one selfe desire for government in the common wealth. For Lucullus did not so withdraw him selfe from matters of state, that he would no more medle at all, nor heare speake of them: but he betimes gaue ouer all ambition & contention, as a thing of no small daunger, & breeding great reproache and dishonor to Marcus Craesus, and Cato, to be chiefe in authority. And these two were they that defended the Senate, and whom they raised vp to withstand *Pompey*s greatnes, being affrayed of him, after that Lucullus had refused the chiefe place of authority. But otherwise, Lucullus would be in the marketplace at courtes and common counsells, to pleasure his friendes when they requested him: and would goe to the Senate also, when there was occasion to breake any new practise, or to ouerthrowe *Pompey*s ambitious policie. For he ouerthrew all the orders and constitutions that Pompey had made, after he had overcome the kinges, Mithridates and Tigranes: to and with the helpe of Cato hindered a distribution of money which Pompey had wrytten for to Rome, to be bestowed amongst his souldiers. Whereupon Pompey fell in friendship, (or to speake more plainly, in conspiracy) with Craesus and Cesar, by whose helpe and assistance, he besieged Rome with armes and souldiers: and made the people by force to passe and confirme what he would haue done, after he had violently expelled Lucullus and Cato out of the market place. Whereat the noble men were much offended, and misliking the great wrong they had offered Lucullus & Cato, *Pompey*s followers suborned a Brutian, and said he was taken lying in waite to kill Pompey. Whereupon the sayd Brutian being examined by the Senate, named certaine: when he came before the people, he named Lucullus, saying that he had hyered him to kill Pompey. But no man beleued him. For they perceiued openly in the market place, that he was procured by them selues falsely to accuse Lucullus, & Pompey other aduerfaries. And this was procured more plainly within few dayes after, when they threw the body of this Brutian dead in the midst of the streete, out of the prison: who they say dyed of him selfe with sickness. Howbeit the markes being plainly seene of the halter wherewith they had strangled him, and the stripes appearing also which they had geuen him: did plainly shew that they them selues did it, whom after they had suborned to accuse Lucullus, they flue in this manner. This was the cause why Lucullus did more the before absent him selfe from meddling in publicke causes: but after, when he sawe that they had so wickedly exiled Cicero, and found meanes also to suborn Cato farre enough of, vnder pretenced colour to fende him with charge into the Ile of Cyprus: then he gaue vp altogether. Some wryte that a litle before his death, he was not poore in his wittes, decaying through age by lide & lide. Howbeit Cornelius Nepos sayth, that he was not for age, nor sickenes, that his wittes did alter: but through payson which one of his flauers had geuen him, whom he had made free, called Callisthenes: who gaue it him, not of any ill intent, but bicause his master should loue him the more, supposing that this payson had power to make him loue him. But he troubled his wits so much with this payson, that Lucullus while he liued was faine to haue his brother Marcus to ouersee his goods. Notwithstanding this, while he was dead, he was as much bewayled and lamented of all the people, as if he had dyed in his best credit, and greatest prosperity. For all the people ranne to honor his funeralles, and his body was caried to the place, by the young noble men of the citie. The people would not in any case haue buried him within the field of Mars, as they had before buried Sylla. But bicause no man thought of it before, and also for that things necessary were not easily to be provided for the place: his brother Marcus be sought the people they would be content his funeralles might be at a towne of his owne, neere vnto the city of Thysclvum, where his tombe was prepared, and he him selfe liued not long time after. For as Lucullus both in age, and honor, had not left him farre behinde him: so did he not much in his death. For as a brother that had alwayes dearly loued him, he could not then long liue, and suruiue him.

Lucullus fell out of his wits before his death.

THE COMPARISON OF Lucullus with Cimon.

Lucullus death blessed.

Nothing (in my opinion) made Lucullus more happy, then to dye when he did, before he sawe the chaunge & alteration of the comon weale, which the fatall destinies plagued the ROMANES withall, with sedition & ciuill warres: and that he dyed in his contry yet enjoying her liberty, but beginning then to fall to decay. And in that he was likest vnto Cimon about all other things: who died whilest the GRECIANS were in good loue and peace with other, and not in broyle of discorde and ciuill warres. In dedde Cimon dyed in his campe, being Generall of his contry, at the siege of the city of CITIVM in CYPRVS, not withdrawn to his home, as one wearied, liuing idly, or leading a voluptuous life in feastes and banquettes, making that the end and reward of his warres, victories and triumphes: but as Plato said, (when he wisely blamed and reprobred Orpheus, who promifeth perpetuall drunkenes in the world to come, for reward of their vertue, that liued well in this life) merily. And truly it is a

A great comfort and contentation of minde, for an old man feeble with age, and compell'd by weaknes, to withdraw him selfe from the world, as well in matters of gouernment, as in peace, as in warres: and quietly to passe his time in studie, where delight is ioyned with benefit contemplation. But to finish his vertuous deedes, by referring them to pleasure, at another end, and moreover, to grow old by pleasure and vanity, islempling of gambles all the rest of his life: after he hath made such warres, & commanded such armies, that mens mindes thinke a thing vnworthy of an honest ACADIVCKE, and altogether vnmeet for one professing old ACADEMICK doctrine, but fit rather for a man geuen ouer altogether to Epicurus discipline. There is a wonderfull thing to be considered of in these two men, that the ones youth was altogether virtuous and reproachfull, and thothers to the contrary, honest and vertuous. But he is the better that chaungeth for the better: & that nature is alwayes more commendable, in which a vice decayeth, and vertue waxeth young; then that which by continuance of time becometh still the contrary. And furthermore, they both grew rich by one selfe means: but they did not both the like vie their riches. For it were to no purpose to compare the buildings of the walls that standeth south within the castell of ATHENS, which was built with the money Cimon brought thither: with the fine built chambers, and high raised turrets to gale a farr, & continued about with conduits of water, which Lucullus erected by NAPLES, with the spoyles of the barbarous people. Neither is Cimon's table also of moderate fare & dyet, but yet open to any man comparable to Lucullus borde: which was sumptuously furnished, and shewed the greatness of his Lord. For Cimon's bord fed many mouthes daily with a small charge: and Lucullus table exceeded in expence, to feede a few, with superfluous dainties. Onlesse they will say, that time caused this difference betwene them. But who can tell, if Cimon had bene at leasure to haue withdrawn him selfe to quiet in age from gouernment, and armes, he also would not haue ledde a more sumptuous & dissolute life, geuen to all pleasure, then Lucullus did? For of his owne nature he loued wine, banquettes, and playes, and was also geuen to women, as we haue told you before. But prosperity, and fortunate successe of things doe bring such delight to ambitious men of nature, and borne to great enterprises: that they make them forget to runne after their other voluptuous vaine desires. And therefore had Lucullus dyed abroad in the warres, whilst he commanded armies: there had not bene that liuing man, how curious soeuer he had bene to reprove other mens faultes, that could haue detected him of any reproachfull vice.

D And thus much for their manner of life. Now furthermore, touching the state of their warres, no doubt both the one and the other were excellent Captaines, as well by sea as by land. And like as in games of prize and exercises of body which are shewed in GRACE, they that in one selfe day winne the games at wrestling, and weapons both, are called by a straunge custome, not conquerours only, but victors also, to honor them withall: euen so me thinke that Cimon in like case hauing in one selfe day crowned GRACE with two notable markes of triumphe, for two battels he wanne, the one by sea, and the other by lande, deserueth to haue some place and preferment before other Captaines. And moreover, Lucullus receiued the authoritie to command, of his contry and common weale: but Cimon gaue his contry both authority & ability to command. Lucullus found his contry a commanding people to all their friends and confederats: through whose aide he ouercame his enemies. And Cimon contrarily found his contry marching vnder an others ensigne, and through his vallianties did so behaue him selfe, that he made his city goe before her confederats, and triumphe ouer her enemies: compelling the PERSIANS by force to geue them the rule by sea, and pettwarding the LACEDEMONIANS willingly to geue place vnto them by lande. Now if the chiefe thing that can be in an excellent Captaine, is to make him selfe to be beloued of his fouldiers, that they may delight to obey him: then was Lucullus despised of his fouldiers, & Cimon esteemed and wondred at, euen of the confederates them selues. For Lucullus was forsaken of his owne men: and Cimon was followed by very straungers, for the confederates did ioyne together with him. Lucullus returned home into his contry, forsaken of those he caried out with him. Cimon returned againe, finding them that were sent out with him to obey others: and had at one time done for his contry three notable things, & hard for them to haue compassed: to wit, made peace with the enemies, geuen them authority & rule of their confederats, and ioyned frendshippe with the BACEDÆMONIANS. Both of them vnderooke to destroy great Empires, and conquer all ASIA. But neither of them both could bring their enterprise to passe. The one by reason of his death, which cut him off on the Iodaine being General, and when his affaires prospered best. The other can hardly be excused, that there was not a great fault in him: either in that he could not, or because he would not satisfie the complaints & griefes of his men, which caused them so much to hate and mislike him. And yet it might be layd also, that in this fault he was like vnto Cimon: who was oftentimes accused by his citizens, and at the length banished his countie for the space of tenn yeares, because that in tenn yeares space (as Plato sayth) they should no more heare him speake. For to say truly, it seldom times happeneth, that the graue wittes of noble men do please the multitude, neither are they acceptable vnto the common people. be- cause they strining continually to reforme them when they go awry, do grieue them as much, as surgeons doe their patients when they binde vp their sores with bandes to cure them. For though by that binding they restore & bring to their natural places againe the broken bones or members out of ioynt: yet put they the patient to great paine and griefe. And therefore me thinks neither the one nor the other is to be blamed. Furthermore, Lucullus wet a great deale further with his army, then euer Cimon did. For he was the first ROMANE Capitaine that passed ouer mount Taurus, and the ruer of Tigris with an army. He tooke and burnt almost in sight of both the kinges, the royall cities of ASIA, TIGRANOCENTA, CABIRA, SINOPE, and NISIBIS. Towards the north, he went as farre as the ruer of Phasis: towards the east, into MEDITERRANEAN and fourthward, euen to the redde sea, and vnto the realmes of ARABIA, subduing all vnto the ROMANE Empire. And hauing ouerthrowen all the power of these two mighty kinges, he tooke from them all, but their persons only: who fled and hid them selues like wild beastes, in infinite deserts and vnpassable forrestes. Wherein is easily discerned the difference betwixt the doings of the one, and of the other. For the PERSIANS, as if they had had no hurt nor overthrow at all by Cimon, fought a battell immediately after against the GRECIANS, & ouerthrew the greatest parte of their army in EGYPT: where Mithridates and Tigranes, after Lucullus victories, did neuer any notable act. For the one finding him selfe altogether pulled downe on his knees, and broken by the former battells: durst neuer once only shew his army vnto Pompey, out of the strength of his campe, but fled into the realme of BOSPHORVS, where he dyed. And Tigranes, he went and humbled him selfe on his knees, vnarmed, and without weapon, vnto Pompey: and taking his diadem of from his head, layd it at his feete, not flattering him for the victories he had won, but for those which Lucullus had triumphed for. By reason whereof he escaped good cheape, & thought him selfe happy, when Pompey gaue him only the mark and tide of a king, the which before had bene taken from him. He therefore is to be thought the more worthy Capitaine, & stowest champion, that leaueth his enemy in weake estate for him that followeth, and shall fight afterwarde with him. And furthermore, Cimon found the power of the king of PERSIA ouerharried, the pride and fiercenesse of the PERSIANS layd a grounde, by many great battells they had lost before vnto Themistocles, king Pausanias, & Lerychides, who had ouerthrowen them: and going now againe to fight a fresh with them, it was an easie thing to overcome the bodies of those, whose hearts were already vanquished. Where Lucullus to the contrary, assailed Tigranes, that had neuer bene overcome, but bare a marvellous lofty minde with him, for the many great battells and conquestes he had wonne. And for the multitude of enemies, there was no comparison betwene those that Cimon ouerthrew, & those that were ranged in battell against Lucullus. So that all things weyed and considered, it were hard to iudge which of them two proued the worthiest man: for that it seemeth, that the goddes did fauor both the one and the other, telling the one what he should doe, and the other what he should not doe. And thus it appeareth by testimonie of the goddes, they were both good men, and that they both obtained euermlasting glorie.

Cimon was victorious obtained in one day.

The end of Lucullus life.

THE LIFE OF Nicias.

HAue reason (as I thinke) to compare Nicias with Craffus, and the effects that happened to the one in PARTHIA, with those that befell the other in SICILE: yet am I to pray them that shall happen to read my wrytings, not to thinke me in entermiddling with those matters (in the describing and reporting whereof, Thucydides hath gone beyond him selfe, both for variety & liuelines of narration, as also in choice & excellent words) to haue the like intent and opinion; that Timaeus the historiographer had. Who, hoping by the grauity & life of his words and reportes; to darken the glorie of Thucydides, and make Philistus (in comparison of him selfe) appeare ignoraunt, & without any grace of historicall narrations) hath in his history of purpose sought occasion to enter into the describing of those battells by sea and by land; and the reporte of those speches and orations, which are deliuered by them with great iudgement and eloquence. Wherein he commeth as neere them whose he commends to passe, as doth the footeman to the LYDIAN coche, as layth Pindarus; and besides this, with him selfe foed and of small iudgement, or as Diphilus layth,

A lubber laden with Sicilian greafe.
And in diuers places, he falleth into Xenarchus follies. As where he sayth, that he thinkes it was an euill token for the ATHENIANS, that Nicias the Capitaine (whose name was deriued of this word NICE, signifying victory) disfrayed their attempts against SICILE: and that by the throwing downe and mangling of the Hermes (to say, the images of Mercury) it was fore-C showed that they should receiue great ouerthrowes by the General of the SYRACUSIANS, called Hermocrates, the sonne of Hermion. And further, that it was not vnlilkely that Heracles did fauor the SYRACUSIANS, by reason of the goddesse Proserpina, (protector and defender of the citie of SYRACUSA) to requite her for that she gaue him Cerberus the dogge, portor of hell; and that he did malice the ATHENIANS besides, because they tooke the WESTERNES partes: (who came of the TROYANS, whom he much hated) for breaking their promise and faith with him, whose citie him selfe had ouerthrowen in reuenge of the wrong that Laomedon king of TROY had offered him. Howbeit Timaeus shewes as much wit and iudgement, in deliuering vs such toys in an history: as he doth in correcting the stile of Philistus, or in condemning and railing of Plato and Aristotle. or to speake more clerkely then others, sheweth alwayes a base enuious minde, like a scholer full of his schoole pointes. But when it striueth with thinges that are past all challenge & correcting, then is it extreme follie and madnes. Sence therefore I may not passe ouer nor omit certain thinges, which Thucydides and Philistus haue already set downe, and especially those wherein they lay open Nicias nature and qualities, which the variety of his successes and fortune did couer. I must lightly touch them, and reporte so much as is necessary, & conuenient, least men condemne me, for slouth and negligence. And in the rest I haue endeouored to gather and propounde thinges not commonly marked and knownen, which I haue collected as well out of sundry mens workes & auncient recordes, as out of many olde antiquities: and of them all compiled a narration, which will serue (I doubt not) to decipher the man and his nature. Of Nicias therefore may be sayd that which Aristotle hath written of him: that there were three famous citizens of ATTENS, very honest men, & which fauored the comūnalty with a naturall fatherly loue: Nicias the sonne of Niceratus, Thucydides the sonne of Milobius, and Theramenes the sonne of Agnon. But of the three, this last was of smallest account: for he is flowred as a forrenner borne in the Ile of Ceos, and chalenged besides for incontinēt & irresolute in matters of state and government: and inclining sometimes to one faction, sometime to another, he was called Cathurnus, a kinde of buskin indifferently seruing for both legges, and in old time was vsed of common players of tragedies. Of the other two, Thucydides being the elder, did many good actes in fauor of the nobility against Pericles, who alwayes tooke parte with the inferior folke. Nicias that was the younger, had reasonable estimation in Pericles life time: for he was ioynd Captaine with him, and oftentimes also had charge by him selfe alone without him. After Pericles death, the nobility raised him to great authority, to be as a strong bulwarke for them, against Cleons insolency & boldnes: and with all, he had the loue of the people, to aduance and preferre him. Now this Cleon in troth could do much with the people, he did so flatter and dandle them, like an olde man, still feeding their humor with gaine: but yet they them selues whome he thus flattered, knowing his extreme couetousnes, impudency, and boldnes, preferred Nicias before him, bicause his grauity was not feuer nor odious, but mingled with a kinde of modesty, that he seemed to feare the presence of the people, which made them thereby the more to loue and esteeme him. For being (as he was) of a fearefull & mistrustfull nature & disposition: in warres he cloked his feare with good fortune, which euer fauored him alike in all his iorneyes and employes that he tooke in hand, where he was Captaine. Now being much affrayed of accusers, this timorous manner of his proceeding in the citie, was founde to be popular, whereby he wanne him the good will of the people: and by meanes thereof rose daily more and more, bicause the people commonly feare those that hate them, & aduance them that feare them. For the greatest honor nobility can do to the commūnalty, is to shewe that they doe not despise them. Nowe Pericles, who through his perfit vertue only, and force of his great eloquence ruled the whole state & common wealth of ATTENS, he needed no counterfeite colour, nor artificiall flattering of the people, to winne their fauor and good willes: but Nicias lacking that, and hauing wealth enough, sought thereby to creepe into the peoples fauor. And where Cleon would enterraine the ATTENIANS with pleasaunt toyes and deuisies, and could feede the peoples humor that way: Nicias finding him selfe no fit man to worke by such encounter, crept into the peoples fauor with liberality, with charges of common playes, and with such like sumptuousnes, exceeding in cost and pleasaunt sportes, not only all those that had bene before him, but such also as were in his time. There yet remaine monuments of his consecrating vnto the goddesses the image of Pallas in the castell of ATTENS, the gilt being wome of: and the chappell which is vnder the festiuall table of Bacchus: for he many times had the chiefe prise in Bacchus daunces, & neuer went away without some game. And touching this matter, there goeth a reporte that at certaine playes whereof Nicias defrayed the charges, one of his men came forth upon the players stage before the people, apparelled like Bacchus, & being a goodly tall young man, without any heare on his face, the ATTENIANS tooke such pleasure to see him so attired, that they made a clapping of their hands a long time together for ioy. Therewithall Nicias stood vpon, and told them, that it were a shame for him to leaue the body of a man in bondage, that openly

A openly was esteemed as a god: and thereupon forthwith made this young flauie a free man. Men wryte also of certaine sumptuous and deuout actes he did in the Ile of DELLOS, where the daunfers and fingers which the cities of GRACE sent thither to singe rimmes and verses in the honor of Apollo, were wont before to arriue disorderly: and the cause was, for the numbers of people that ranne to see them, who made them singe straight without any order, and landing in hast out of their shippes, they left their apparell, and put on such vestements as they should weare in procession, and their garlands of flowers on their heades, all at one present time. But Nicias, being commaunded to go thither to present the fingers of ATTENS, landed first in the Ile of RENIA, hard adioyning to the Ile of DELLOS, with his fingers, his beates for sacrifice, and with all the rest of his traine, carying a bridge with him, which he had caused to be made at ATTENS, vpon measure taken of the channell, betwext the one and thother Ile set out with pictures and tables, with gilding, with nosegayes and garlandes of triumphe, and with excellent wrought tapistry: which in the night he set vp vpon the channell, being not very broad, and the next morning by breake of the day caused his fingers to passe ouer upon it, singing all the way as they went in his procession so nobly set forth, euen vnto the very temple of Apollo. And when the sacrifice, the feast, and games that were to be played were finished, he gaue a goodly palme tree of copper, which he offered vp to Apollo, bought landes besides that cost him tenne thousande Drachmas, which he consecrated also vnto the god Panion of the Ile: and ordained, that the profittes of the same should be yearely bestowed by the DELTIANS, upon an open sacrifice and feast, in the which they should pray to their god, for the health and prosperity of Nicias: and so caused it to be wrytten and grauen upon a pillar he left in DELLOS, as a perpetuall monument and keeper of his offspring, and foundation. Afterwards, this copper palme tree being broken by windes, it fell upon the great image of the NAXIANS gift, and threw it downe to the ground. Surely in this ceremony and act of his, there was a maruelous pompe, & great shew of popular ambition: neuer thelesse, he that shall consider of his life and actions, may easily perswade him selfe that aboute all he did it of very pure zeale & deuotion, and secondly, to geue pleasure and pastime to the people. For by Thucydides reporte of him, he was one that feared the gods with trembling, and was wholly geuen to religion. We finde wrytten in one of the dialogues of Palsphoon, that Nicias did sacrifice dayly to the goddesses, and kept a soothsayer continually in his house, geuing out abroade, that it was to counsaile with him what should happen about the assayres of the common wealth: but in troth it was to inquier of his owne busines, and specially of his mynes of siluer. For he had many great mynes about LAVRION side, that were very profitable to him: but withall they digged with great danger, and he was driuen continually to kepe a maruelous number of slaues at worke there. The most parte of Nicias riches was in ready money, and thereby he had many crauers and hangers on him, whome he gaue money vnto: for he gaue as well vnto wicked people that might doe mischief, as vnto them that deserved reward, and were worthe of his liberalitie. Thus was his feare a rent to the wicked, as his liberalitie was also a reuenue to the good: and hereof the comical Poets doe deliuer vs auncient testimony. For Teleclides speaking of a certain informer sayth thus:

Charicles did refuse to geue one Mina for to stay, The brating of his secret birth, conueyed close away:
 But Nice, the sonne of Nicerate, did willingly bestow, A brace of Minaze dole told. And though I will doe know The cause of his so doing, yet I will not him beuoyse: For why? The man is my good friend, and wisse I dare well say.

And he, whom Eupolis mocketh in his comedy intituled Maricas, bringing a plaine simple man upon the stage, doth aske him:

 How long is it a goe since thou didst speake with Nicias?

The plaine man.

I saw him standing euen right now vpon the market place.

The informer.

*This man affirms he saw him there. And wherefore should he say He saw him, but of some intent his leuades to beuoyay?
Now first ye see how Nicias here is taken in the trap,
For all his walking close in cloudes to geue the priuy slip.*

The Author.

*O foolish folke, suppose ye that so good a man as he,
In any fault or shamefull fact will tardy take be?*

And Cleon threatening in the comedie of Aristophanes, intitled the Knights, sayth these words.

The Orators if by the throte I take, Then sure I am, that Nicias streit will quake.

Phrynichus selfe also telleth vs glaunsingly, that he was so timorous and easie to be frayed, when he sayd speaking of an other man:

*A good stout man (I know full well) he was,
And not a coward like to Nicias.*

not so offende.*

Now Nicias being thus timorous of nature, and fearing to geue any litle occasion to the Orators to accule him: kept him selfe so warely, that he neither durst eate nor drinke with any man in the city, nor yet put forth him selfe in companie to talke, or passe the time amongst them, but altogether auoyded such sportes and pleasures. For when he was in office, he would neuer out of the counsaile house, but still busied him selfe in dispatching causes, from morning till night, and was euer the first that came, and last that went away. And when he had no matter of state in hande, then was he very hardly to be spoken withall, and would suffer no access vnto him, but kept close in his house: and some of his frendes did euer answerre them that came to his gate, and prayed them to pardon him, saying, that he was busie then about affayers of the common wealth. One Hieron, whom Nicias had brought vp in his house, and had him selfe taught him both learning & musike, was his greatest procurer and instrument to keepe him from speech with any man, and brought him to this reputation of greatnes and grauity. This Hieron (as it is reported) was the sonne of Dionysius Chalcus, of whom they finde certain Poeticall workes at this day: who being Captaine of a certaine number of men that were sent to dwell in ITALIE, did build there the cite of THYRIE. Hieron I say did ferue his turne, and holpe him secretly to inquier what he would vnderstande of the Soothsayers, and gaue out these wordes among the people: that Nicias led too miserable and painefull a life, for the ouergreat care he tooke to serue the common wealth: inso much, as though he were in his hotte house to wash him, or at his table at meate, his minde ranne still of some maten about the common wealth, and to serue the state, did neglect his owne priuate affayers: so that he scant beganne to sleepe & take rest, when others commonly had slept their first sleepe, and that he looked like no body. Furthermore, that he was growen crabbed and vncourteous, euen to such as before had bene his familiar frendes. So that, sayd he, he loseth them together with his goodes, and all for seruice of the common wealth: where others grow rich, and win frendes, by the credit they haue to be heard of the people, and can make mery among them, and sporte with the matters of state which they haue in their handes. Now in troth, such was Nicias life, that he might truly say that which Agamemnon spake of him selfe in the tragedie of Euripides, called Iphigenie in Aulide.

Nicias life.

And yet the peoples vnderling I am in very dede.*

And Nicias perceiuing that the people in some things did serue their turnes with the experience of them that were eloquent, & wiser then others, although they yet mistrusted their sufficiency, and had a speciall eye to them, plucking downe their corage, by taking their authority from them: as for prooffe the condemnation of Pericles, the banishment of Damon, and the mistrust they had of Antiphon RHAMNYSIAN, and moreover by that they did vnto Paches (that tooke the Ile of LESBOS) who being brought before the iudges in open counsell to geue vp an accompt of his charge, drewe out his sword, and slue him selfe in presence of them all.

Nicias

A Nicias I saye, remembering these examples, sought euer to flee from these offices; which were either too great, or too smal, and when he accepted any, had speciall regard to worke surely, & to venture nothing. Whereby all his enterprises that he tooke in hand, as we may easily coniecture, prospered maruelous well: but yet he imputed nothing to his owne wisdom, nor yet to his vertue and sufficiencie, but thanked fortune euer for all, and praying diligently to the goddess, contented him selfe to lessen his glory, and that onely to auoyde enuy. As the euent of thinges falling out euen in his time doe sufficiently witness vnto vs. For the cite of ATHENS hauing susteined many great losses and ouerthrowes, he was neuer a party, nor had ought to doe any of them. As once for example: the ATHENIANS were ouercome in the battell by the CHALCIDONIANS, howbeit it was vnder the leading of Cabides & Xenophanes, who were their Captaines. An other time, the losse they had in ÆTOLIA vnder the charge of Demisthenes. Moreover at DELPHI, a city of BOEOTIA, where they loske showlander men at one conflict, Hippocrates then being there Generall. And as touching the plague, the greatest number layed the fault thereof to Pericles, who by reason of warres kept the men that came out of the contry, within the walles of the cite of ATHENS: and so by chaunging of ayer, and their wonted maner of life, they fell into it. Now with none of all these great troubles and misfortunes, was Nicias euer burdened: but contrariwise he being Captaine tooke the Ile of CYTHERA, which the LACEDÆMONIANS inhabited, being an excellent place for situation to molest and destroy the contrie of LACONIA. He wanne diuers cities againe that had rebelled in THRACIA, and brought them once more vnder the obedience of ATHENS. At his first coming, hauing shut in the MEGARIANS within their walles, he tooke the Ile of MIMORA: and at his departure thence, shortly after wanne the haven of Nisea also. Furthermore, hauing in the contry of the CORINTHIANS, he ouercame them that offered him battell, and slue a great number, and among others Lycophron the Captaine. At this battell he chaunfed to forget to bury two of his men that were slaine, whose bodies could not be found in gathering vp of the rest: howbeit so soone as he heard of it, he caused all his fleet to stay, and sent Aristeul to the enemies, to pray leaue to fetch away those two bodies. Now, though by law of armes they that sent to aske leaue to take away their deade to bury them, did thereby lose the honor of their victory, & were barred to set vp any marke or token of triumphe, bicause it seemed by the sute, that they which had them in their power were conquerors, and not the petitioners that made request for them, which otherwise needed none haue made demande of them: Nicias notwithstanding was contented rather to forsake the honor of his victory, then to leaue the bodies of two of his contrymen in the field without buriall. So, after he had destroyed all the coast of LACONIA, and had ouercome certaine LACEDÆMONIANS that came against him in battell: he tooke the city of THYREA, which the ÆGIETES kept at that time, whom he brought prisoners vnto ATHENS. And when the PELOPONNESIANS had prepared great armies both by sea and by land to besiege the forte of PYLOS, the which Demophilus the Captaine had fortified: battell being geuen by sea, it chaunfed there remained foure hundred naturall citizens of SPARTA, within the Ile of SPAGERTIA. Now the ATHENIANS thought it a noble exploitte of them, (as in dede it was) to take those foure hundred alie: howbeit the siege was very fore, bicause they lacked water euen in the middle of sommer, and were forced to fetch a maruelous compasse to bring wittells to their campe, which when winter should be once common would be very dangerous, and almost an impossible thing to doe. Whereupon, they then became sory, and repented them much that they had sent away the Ambassadors of the LACEDÆMONIANS which came to them to treat of peace, and that they had (through *Cleon*s procurement) suffered them to departe in that sorte without resolution taken: who was against the altogether, only to do Nicias a despite, being his enemy, & did earnestly sollicite the matter the LACEDÆMONIANS requested. This was the cause why Cleon perswaded the ATHENIANS, to refuse their offer of peace. But when the people saw that this siege drewe out in length, and that their campe suffered grieuous wantes and necessities, then fell they out with Cleon, and he againe burdened Nicias, saying that through his feare he would let the besieged SPARTANS escape, and that if he had bene Captaine, they should not haue holden out so long. Thereupon the ATHENIANS sayd a lowde to Cleon: and why doest thou goe thither yet to take them? Moreover Nicias selfe alio rising vp, openly gaue him his authority to take this Pyle, and bad him leauy as many souldiers as he would to goe thither, and not to bragge with such impudent wordes where was no daunger, but to doe some notable seruice to the cōmon wealth. Cleon at the first thronke backe, being amafed withall, litle thinking they would haue taken him so sodainly at his word. But in the ende, perceiving the people vrged him to it, and that Nicias also was importunate with him: ambition so enflamed him, that he not onely tooke the charge upon him, but in a brauery sayd, that within twenty dayes after his departure he would either put all the SPARTANS to the sword, or bring them prisoners vnto ATHENS. The ATHENIANS hearing Cleon say so, had more lust to laugh a good, then to beleue that he spake: for it was their maner euer to laugh at his anger and folly. For it is reported of him, that the people on a time being solēly assembled in counsell early in the morning, to heare what Cleon would say, & hauing taried long for him: at the lengthe came with a garland on his head, and prayed the assemblee to dismisse the courte till the next morning: for, quod he, I shall not be at leasure to day, because I haue sacrificed, and doe cast also certaine straungers my frendes that are come to see me. So the people burst out in a laughing, and brake vp thaisfembly. This notwithstanding, fortune fauored him at that time, & he badled him selfe so well in this charge with Demosthenes, that he tooke all the SPARTANS that they besieged, within the time he had appointed, sauing such as were slaine: and hauing made them yeelde, brought them prisoners to ATHENS. This fell out greatly to Nicias shame and reproache. For it appeared not only a casting away of his shielde, but worse then that, a voluntary forsaking of his prouince upon a base timorous minde, geuing his enemy occasion thereby to doe some noble exploit, depriuing him selfe of his honorable charge. Wherefore Aristophanes mocketh him againe, in his comedy of birds, saying:

It is not time to sleepe and linger still,

As Nicias doth: without good cause or skill,

Alloin in another place of his comedy of plowmen he sayth:

I faine would follow my husbandry, VVho lets thee? Mary you.

A thorow and Dragmace I will geue to be discharged now.

Of office in the common weale. Content, so shall you haue

Two thousand Dragmace iust, with those that Nicias lately gaue.

But herein Nicias did great hurt to the cōmon wealth, suffering Cleon in that sorte to grow to credit & estimation. For after that victory, Cleon grew to so haucie a minde & pride of him selfe, that he was not to be delt withall: wherupon fel out the occasiō of the great miseries that happened to the city of ATHENS, which most grieved Nicias of all other. For Cleon amongst other things tooke away the modesty and reuerence vsed before in publicke Orations to the people: he of all other was the first that cried out in his Orations, that clapped his hand on his thigh, threw open his gowne, & floong vp & downe the pulpit as he spake. Of which exiple afterwards followed all licentiousnes, and contempt of honesty, the which all the Orators & counsellors fell into, that delt in matters of state & cōmon wealth, & was in the end the overthrow of all together. In that very time began Alcibiades to grow to credit, by practise in the state, who was not altogether so corrupt, neither simply euill: but as they say of the lande of EGYPT, that for the fumes and lustines of the soyle,

It bringeth forth both holseme herbes, and also myseme vveedes.

Euen so Alcibiades wit excellēg either in good or ill, was the cause and beginning of great change and alteration. For, it fell out, that after Nicias was ridde of Cleon, he could not yet bring the citie of ATHENS againe to peace and quietnes. For when the common wealth began to grow to some rest and reasonable good order, then was it againe brought into warres, through Alcibiades extreme fury of ambition. And thus it beganne. The only peacebreakers and disturbers of common quiet generally throughout GREECE, were these two persones, Cleon and Brasidas: for warre clogged the wickednes of the one, and aduanced the valiancies of the other, geuing to either occasion to doe great mischiefes, and also opportunity to worke many noble exploitēs. Now Cleon and Brasidas being both slaine together at a battell fought by Amphipolis, Nicias straight perceiving the SPARTANS had long desired peace, and that the ATHENIANS were no more so hottely geuen to the warres, but that both the one & the other had their hands full, & were willing to be quiet: deuised what meanes he might vse to bring SPARTA and ATHENS to reconciliation againe, and to rid all the cities of GREECE also from broyle and misery of warre, that thenceforth they might all together enioy a peaceable and happy life. The riche men, the olde men, and the husbandmen, he found very willing to hearken to peace: and talking priuately also with diuers others, he had so perswaded them, that he cooled them for being desirous of warres. Whereupon, putting the SPARTANS in good hope that all were inclined to peace, if they fought it: the SPARTANS beleued him, not onely for that they had founde him at other times very soft and courteous, but also because he was careful to see that their prisoners of SPARTA, (who had bene taken at the force of Pyle) were gently intreated, and had made their miserable captivity more tollerable. So, peace was concluded betwene the SPARTANS and the ATHENIANS for a yeare, during which abstinence, they frequenting one another againe, and beginning to taste the sweetenes and pleasures of peace, and the safety of free access one to see another frendes that were straungers: began then to wishe that they might still continue in peace and amity together, without effusion of blood of either partie, and tooke great delight in their daunces, to heare them singe such songs:

They did also with great ioy & gladnes remember him which sayd, that in peace no found of tromper, but the crowing of the cocke doth wake them that be a sleepe: and on the other side they cursed and tooke on with them that sayd it was predestined, the warre should continue thirle nine yeares. And so, vpon a meeting together to talke of many matters, they made an vniuersall peace throughout all GREECE. Now most men thought that surely all their sorowes and miseries were come to an ende, and there was no talke of any man but of Nicias, saying: that he was a man beloued of the goddes, who for his deuotion towards them, had this speciall gift geue him, that the greatest blessing that could come vnto the world, was called after his name. For to confesse a troth, euery man was certainly perswaded that this peace was Nicias worke, as the warre was Pericles procurement, who vpon light causes perswaded the GREECIANS to runne headlong into most grieuous calamities: and Nicias on the other side had brought them to become frends, and to forger the great hurtēs the one had receiued of the other in former warres. And euē to this present day, that peace is called Nicias, as who would say, Nicias peace. The capitulations of the peace were thus agreed vpon: that of either side they should alike deliuer vp the cities, and landes, which eche had taken from other in time of warres, together with the prisoners also: and that they should first make restitution, whose lot it was to beginne. Nicias (according to Theophrastus reporte) for ready mōney lecrely bought the lot, that the LACEDÆMONIANS might be the first that should make restitution. And when the CORINTHIANS and BOEOTIANS that disliked of this peace, fought by the complaints they made, to renew the warre againe: Nicias then perswaded both the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS, that they should adde for strength vnto their contry, the allyance & peace offensiue and defensiuē made betwene them, for a more sure know befrendshippe, wherby they might be the better assured the one of the other, and also the more dreadfull to their enemies that should rebell against them. These thinges went cleane against Alcibiades minde: who besides that he was ill borne for peace, was enemy also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that they fought to Nicias, and made none accompt of him: but despised him. Here was thoccafion that caused Alcibiades to proue from the beginning what he could doe to hinder this peace, wherein he preuailed nothing. Yet shortly after, Alcibiades perceiving that the ATHENIANS liked not so well of the LACEDÆMONIANS, as they did before, and that they thought themselves iniured by the, because they had lately made league with the BOEOTIANS without their priuity, and had not wholly rendred vp the cities of PASACTYM & AMPHIOLIS according to the condicions articulated betwene them: began then to enlarge and aggrauate the peoples complaints, and to make them offended with euery one of them. And furthermore he procured Ambassadors from the city, of ARGOS to come to ATHENS, and to handled the matter, that the ATHENIANS made league offensiue & defensiuē with them.

While these matters werethus in hand, there came to ATHENS also Ambassadors from CADEMON, with full power and authority to set all things at stay, and to compound all controversies: who having first spoken with the Senate, propounded things unto them both very honest and reasonable. Whereupon, Alcibiades being affrayed that they letting the people understand so much, should thereby bring them to yeelde to what they desired: he finely deceiued the poore Ambassadors by this deuise. He promised apou his othe to helpe them in that they went about, so farre forth as they would not confesse them selues to haue absolute power from the Ephores: making them to beleue it was the only way to bring their matters to passe. The Ambassadors geuing credit to his wordes, relied apou him, and so forsooke Nicias. Whereupon Alcibiades brought them before the people being set in counsell, and there demanded openly of them, whether they had full power and authoritie to accorde all matters yea or no. Whereunto they made him aunswere with a lowde voyce, that they hadnot. Thereupon Alcibiades, contrarie both to their expectation, and his owne othe and promise made vnto them: beganne to call the counsell to wimes, whether they did not in open Senate say the contrary, & so aduised the people not to trust nor geue credit vnto such men, as were openly taken with so manifest a lye, & that in one selfe matter would one while say one thing, an other while an other. It bootes not to aske whether the Ambassadors were much amazed to heare Alcibiades wordes: for Nicias him selfe wist not what to say to the matter, the suddenness of the cause did so confuse and grieue him, being a thing he least looked for. Nowe the people they were so moued besides, that they became indifferent whether to haue sent for the Ambassadors of ARGOS presently to haue made league with them or not: but there fell out an earthquake apou this matter, that greatly serued Nicias turne, and brake vp the assembly. The people meeting againe in counsell the next morning, Nicias with all that he could doe, or say, could scant withhold them from making league with the ARGIVES: and to get leaue in the meane time to go to the LACEDEMONIANS, promising he would make all well againe. Thereupon, Nicias going to SPARTA, was receiued and honored there like a noble man, and as one whom they thought well affected towards them: but for the rest, he preuailed nothing, and being ouercomen by those that fauored the BOEOTIANS, returned againe to ATHENS as he departed thence. Where he was not only ill welcomed home, and worse esteemed, but was also in daunger of his person, through the fury of the people, that at his request & counsell had redeliuered such men prisoners, and so great a number of them. For in deede, the prisoners which Cleon had brought to ATHENS from the sorte of Pyle, were all of the chiefe houses of SPARTA, and their kinsmen and friends were the noblest men of the city. Notwithstanding, the people in the end did none other violence to him, sauing that they chose Alcibiades their Captaine, and made league with the ELIANS, and MANTINIANS (which had revolted from the LACEDEMONIANS) and with the ARGIVES also: & sent pyrates to the sorte of Pyle, to spoyle the contry of LACONIA. Vpon these occasions the ATHENIANS fell againe into warres. Now when the quarrell and contouersie was greatest betwene Nicias and Alcibiades, the Ostracism (to wit, the banishment for a time) came in, by the which the people banished for tenne yeares any such of their citizens as they thought either of too great authority, or that was most eniued for his wealth and substaunce. Alcibiades and Nicias were then not a litle perplexed, considering their present daunger, being sure that thone of them who should not faile but be banished by this next banishment. For the people hated Alcibiades himselfe, & were affrayed of his valliantnes: as we haue more amply declared in the description of his life. And for Nicias, his wealth made him to be eniued, besides they misliked his straunge manner of dealing, being no more familiar nor conseruant with the people than he was, and counted him too stately: moreouer they hated him also, because in many matters he had spoken directly against the thing the people desired, & had enforced them against their willes to agree to that which was profitable for them selues. In fine to speake more plainly, there fell out great strife betwene the young men that would haue warres, and the olde men that coueted peace, some desirous to banish Nicias, and some others Alcibiades: but

The wicked vniu the chiefe remove.*

And

A And so fell it out then. For the ATHENIANS being deuided in two factions, gave authority to certaine of the most impudent & insolent periones that were in all the city: and among them was one Hyperbolus of the towne of PERITHVS, a man of no hauior nor value, why he should be bold: but yet one that grew to some credit & power, dishonouring his contry, by the honor they gaue him. Now Hyperbolus thinking him selfe free at that time from any daunger of banishment, (having rather deferred the gallows) hoping that if one of them two were banished, he should match him well enough that remained behinde: shewed openly, that he was glad of their discord and variance, and blisfully stirred vp the people against them both. Nicias and Alcibiades being acquainted with his wicked practises, hauing secretly talked together, ioynted both their factions in one: whereby they brought it so to passe, that neither of them was banished, but Hyperbolus selfe for tenne yeares. Which matter for the present time made the people very mery, though afterwarde it grieved them much, seeing their ordinance of the Ostracism blenshied by the vnworthines of the person which punishment was in his norvnto him. For this banishment was thought a meete punishment for Theophrastus, Aristides, and such like men of accompt as they, or their like: but for Hyperbolus, it was thought too greaue an honor, & too manifest an occasion of glory to be geuen to him, that for his wickednes had the selfe same punishment, which was to be inflicted vpon the chiefeest estates for their greaues: And the comical Poet Plato him selfe sayth in a place,

Although his leuord behavior did deserue as much or more, Yet was not that the punishment he should haue had therefore.

C The Ostracism desired was for men of noble fame, And not for warlers, whose leuord life deserued open shame.

After this Hyperbolus, there was neuer man banished with the Ostracism. For himselfe was the last, as Hipparchus CHOLARGIAN, and nearest kinsman to the tyranne, was the first. Sure fortune is a very vncerten thing, & without cōciet of reason. For had Nicias frankly put him selfe to the hazard of this banishment against Alcibiades, one of these two things must needs haue happened him: either to haue remained in the city with victory, his aduery being banished: or being conuict by his banishment to haue scaped those extreame miseries and calamities the which he afterwards fell into, besides the fame he had wonne of a wise Captaine, though he had bene ouercomen. I know notwithstanding that Theophrastus wryteth, how Hyperbolus not Nicias, was banished through the dissention that fell betwene Phaeax and Alcibiades: albeit most wryters agree with that I haue told you before. Now the Ambassadors of the EGESTANS and LEONTINES being comen to ATHENS, to perswade the ATHENIANS to attempt the conquest of SICILIA: Nicias being against it, was overcome by Alcibiades craft & ambition. For he, before they were called to counsell, had already through false surmises filled the peoples heades with a vaine hope & perswasion of conquest. Insomuch as the young men meeting in places of exercise, & the olde men also in artificers shoppes, and in their compassed chayers, or halfe circles where they fate talking together, were eury one occupied about drawing the platforme of SICILE, telling the nature of the SICILIAN sea, & reckoning vp the hauens and places looking towards AFRICKE. For they made not their accompt that SICILE should be the end of their warres, but rather the storehouse and armorie for all their munition and martiall prouision to make warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, and to conquer all AFRICKE, and consequently all the AFRICKE seas, euen to Hercules pillars. Now all their mindes being bent to warres, when Nicias spake against it, he founde very fewe men of quality to stand by him. For the riche, fearing least the people would thinke they did it to auoide charge, and the cost they should be at about these warres, they held their peace, though in dede not contented withall: yet would not Nicias leaue still to counsell the to the contrary. But when they had past the decree in counsell for the enterprise of SICILE, and that the people had chosen him chiefe Captaine, with Alcibiades and Lamachus, to follow the same: at the next session of the counsell holden in the citie, Nicias rose vp againe, to see if he could turne the people from this iorney with all the protestations he could possibly make, burdening Alcibiades, that for his owne ambition and perfitate commodity, he brought the common wealth into so farre and daungerous a warre. But all his wordes preuailed not. Him selfe before all others was thought the meekest man for this charge, partly because of his experience, but chiefly for that they knew he would handle their matters with greater safety, when his more rous foresight (should bejoynt with Alcibiades valiantnes, and with Lamachus solmes, which in deede most confirmed the election. Now after the matter thus debated, Demosthenes of the Orators that most procured the ATHENIANS to vndertake this enterprise stepped forth, and sayd. It were good that Nicias left off, and set a side all these excuses and denials, and preferred a decree, that the people shoulde thorowly authorize the Captaine, that were chosen, to set forward & execute what they thought good, as well here as there, and so periwaded the people to passe and authorize it. Yet it is sayd that the Priests objected many thinges to hinder the iorney. But Alcibiades also having suborned certaine soothsayers, alleged inlike case some auncient Oracles that sayd, the ATHENIANS should have great honor from SICILE: & further had intitled certaine pilgrimes, who sayd they were but newly come from the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, and had brought this Oracle thence, That the Athenians should take all the Syracusans. But worst of all, if any knew of contrary signes or tokens to come, they held their peace, least it should seeme they entermeddled to prognosticate euill for afflictions sake, seeing that the signes them selues, which were most plain and notorious, could not remove them from thenterprise of this iorney. As for example, the hacking and cutting of the Hermes, and images of Mercurye, which in one night were all to be mangled, saving one image only called the Hermes of Andocides, which was geuen & consecrated in old time by the tribe of the ÆGEIDES, and was set vp directly ouer against a citizens house called Andocides. Furthermore, the chauce that happened by the aluter of the twelue goddes: where a man leaping sodainly vpon it, after he had gone round about it, cut of his genitorities with a stone. And in a temple also in the city of DELPHES, where was a litle image of Minerues of gold, set upon a palme tree of copper, which the cite of ATHENS had geuen of the spoyle wonne of the MEDES. Upon that palme tree sat certaine crows many dayes together, and neuer left pecking and iobbing at the frute of it which was all of golde, vntill they made the same to fall from the tree. But the ATHENIANS sayd, that the DELPHIANS (whom the SYRACUSANS had subdued) had finely fained this deuile. There was a prophecy also that commaunded them to bring one of Minerues Nunnes to ATHENS, that was in the city of CLAZOMENES. So they sent for this Nunne called Hefychia, which is, rest: & it seemeth it was that which the goddes by this prophecy did counsell them vnto, that for that time they should be quiet. Meton the Astronomer hauing charge in the army leauied for the warre of SICILE, being a-frayed of this prophetic, or otherwise misliking the celestiall signes, and successe of the iorney: fained him selfe mad, and set his house a fire. Others say he counterfeited not madnes, but did one night in deede set his house a fire, and that the next morning looking ruefully on it, he went into the market place as a man brought to pitiefull state, to sue to the people, that in consideration of his great misfortune happened him, they would discharge his sonne of the voyage, who was to take charge of a gallie at his owne cost, and ready to make sayle. Moreover, the familiar spirite of wise Socrates that did vse to tell him before what should happen: told him then that this iorney would fall out to the destruction of ATHENS. Socrates told in certaine of his very familiar frendes: and from them the rumor became common. And this also troubled a number of them, for the vnluckie dayes on the which they did imbarke. For they were the very dayes on the which the women celebrated the feast and yereday of Adonis death: and there were also in diuers partes of the city, images of dead men caried to buriall, and women following them, mourning & lamenting. So that such as did put any confidence in those signes, sayd they misliked it much, and that they were afrayed least the same signified, that all the goodly preparation of this army, (the which was set out with such pompe & bravery) would come to nothing. Now for Nicias, that he spake against this warre in open counsell, whilst they were deliberating apon it, and that he was not caried away with any vaine hope, nor puffed vp with the glory of so honorable a charge to make him change his minde therein surely he shewed him selfe an honest man, wise, and constant. But when he saw plainly that he could by no perswasions remove the people from the enterprise of this warre, neither yet by sute nor intreaty get him selfe discharged from being a Captaine thereof, but that they

they would in any case make him one of the heades of the army: then was it out of time to be fearful, and still geuing backe, turning his head so oft like a child to looke upon his gallie be- hind him, and euer to be telling that no reason could be heard in determining of this iorney. For in deede this was enough to discourage his companions, & to marre all as their first setting out: where, to say truly, he should sodainly haue set upon his enemies, & haue gone to it with a lully corage, to haue assayed fortune. But he tooke a cleane contrary course. For when Lamachus thought good at their first coming to goe straight to SYRACUSA, and to geue them battell as neere the walles as might be, & that Alcibiades on the other side was of opinion first of all to goe about to winne the cities that were in league with the SYRACUSANS, & after that they had made them rebell, then to goe against the SYRACUSANS them selues. Nicias to the contrary spake in counsell, and thought it better to goe on fayer and softly, desiering the capitall of SICILE round about to view their gallies and preparation, & so to returne straight to ATHENS againe, leauing only a few of their men with the EGESTANS, to helpe to defende them. But this from the beginning maruelously cooled the corage of the fouldiers, and quite discouraged them. Shortly after also, the ATHENIANS hauing sent for Alcibiades to answer to certaine accusations, Nicias remaining Captaine with Lamachus (the other Captaine in fight, but Nicias selfe in power and authority the Lieutenant generall of all the army) still y- ted delays, running vp and downe, and spending time so long in consultation, till the fouldiers were left without both hope and corage, and the feast phemy had of them at their first coming to see so great an army, was now in maner cleane gone. Yet Alcibiades being in the army, before he was sent for from ATHENS, they went with three fower gallies to SYRACUSA, of the which they placed fifty in battell ray out of the haven, and sent the other thence into the haven to discouer: which approaching neere the city, caused an Herald to make open proclamation, that they were come thither to restore the LEONTINES to their landes and possessions, and tooke a shippe of the enemies, in the which among other thinges they founde tables, wherein were written the names of all the inhabitants of SYRACUSA, according to their tribes and houles. These tables were kept farre from the cite, in the temple of Iupiter Olympian, but at that time they had sent for them to know the number of men of seruice, and of age to beare weapon. The same tables being taken by the ATHENIANS, and caried to the generalls of the army, the soothsayers seeing this long rolle of names, at the first misliked it, fearing least the prophie had bene fulfilled, which promised them, that the ATHENIANS one day should take all the SYRACUSANS. Howbeit it is reported this prophie came to passe in an other employe, where Callippus ATHENIAN hauing slaine Dion, wan also the city of SYRACUSA. Now when Alcibiades was gone from the campe, Nicias bare all the sway and commaunded the whole army. For Lamachus, though otherwise he was a slowe man, an honest man; and very valliant of his handes, and one that would not spare him selfe in time of neede: neuertheless he was so poore and miserable, that euen when he was in state of a Generall, & gaue vp an account of his expences, he would not sticke to put into his bookes, so much, for a gowne, and so much for a payer of pantophles. Where Nicias authority & reputation contrarywise was of an other maner of cut, as well for other respects, as for his riches, and for the hope of many noble thinges which he had done before. As one namely which they tell of him, that on a time being a Captaine with others, and sitting in counsell with his companions in the countie sell house at ATHENS, about the dispatch of certaine causes, he spake vnto Sophocles the Poet, then present amongst them; and bad him speake first and say his opinion, being the oldest man of all the whole company. Sophocles answered him againe: in deede I am faine to be the oldest man, but thou art the noblest man, and him whom euery man regardeth best. So he was queing at that time Lamachus vnder him, a better Captaine & man of warre then himselfe was yet by being so slow to imploy the army vnder his charge by desiering of time, till he was wearying about SICILE as farre from his enemies as he could: he first gaue the enemies time and leisure to be bold without feare of him. And then going to besiege Hydruntum, being a polie single towne, and raising the siege without taking of it: he fell into so greua a combat with euery man, that from thenceforth no man almost made any more reckoning of him. At last he retired vnto CATANIA with his army, without any other employe done, saying that he tooke HYCCATA, a baggadge village of the barbarous people, and where it is sayd Zanab a courtisane was borne, and that being then a young gerle, he was sold among other prisoners, and afterwarde caried into PELOPONNESVS. And in fine, the sommer being farre spent, Nicias was informed that the SYRACVSANS had taken such corage to them, that they would come and enterprife the charge upon them first: and that their horsemen were approached already before his campe, to skirmish with them, asking the ATHENIANS in mockery, if they were come into SICILE to dwell with the CATANIANS, or to restore the LEONTINES to their landes againe. Hereupon with much ado, Nicias determined to goe to SYRACUSA, and because he would campe there in safety, and at ease without hafard: he sent one of CATANA before to SYRACUSA, to tell them (as if he had bene a spye) that if they would sodainly come, and set upon the campe of the ATHENIANS & take all their cariage, he wished them to come with all their power to CATANA at a day certaine which he would appoint them. For the ATHENIANS (sayd he) for the most parte are within the city, wherein there are certaine citizens, which fauoring the SYRACVSANS, haue determined to soone as they heare of their coming, to keepe the gates of the city, and at the same time also to set the ATHENIANS (shippes a fire and how there were also a great number in the citie of this confederacy, that did but looke vponer hower for their coming. And this was the noblest stratageame of warre, that Nicias shewed all the time he was in SICILE. For by this deuise he made the SYRACVSANS come into the fildes with all their power, so that they left their citie without garde: and he him selfe departing in the meane time from CATANA with all his fleet, wanne the haue of SYRACUSA at his ease, and chose out a place to campe in, where his enemies could not hurt him: in the which he was both the stronger, and might without let or difficulty set upon them with that, wherein he most trusted. The SYRACVSANS returning straight from CATANA, and offering him battell hard by the walles of SYRACUSA, he came out into the field, and ouerthrow them. There were not many of the SYRACVSANS slaine at this battell, because their horsemen did hinder the chafe: but Nicias breaking vp the bridges upon the riuier, gaue Hermocrates occasion to mocke him. For, comforting & encouraging the SYRACVSANS, he told them Nicias deserued to be laughed at, because he did what he could that he might not fight, as if he had not purposely come from ATHENS to SYRACUSA to fight. This notwithstanding, he made the SYRACVSANS quake for feare: for where they had then fiftene Capitaines, they chose out three only, to whom the people were sworne, that they would suffer them to haue full power & authority to commaund and take order for all things. The temple of Iupiter Olympian was hard by the ATHENIANS campe, which they would gladly haue taken, for that it was full of rich iuelles and offerings of gold and siluer; geuen vnto the temple afore time. But Nicias of purpose still draue of time, and delayed so long, till the SYRACVSANS at last sent a good garison thither to keepe it safe: thinking with him selfe, that if his souldiers came to take and spoyle the temple, his contry should be nothing the richer by it, and him selfe besides should beare all the blame of sacrilege. So, hauing obtained victorie without profit, (which ranne straight through SICILE) within few dayes after he returned vnto the city of NAXOS, where he lay all the winter, consuming a wonderfull masse of vittells with so great an army, for the doing of thinges of small moment, vpon certaine SICILIANS that yielded to him. The SYRACVSANS in the meane time being in hart againe, and coragious: returned to CATANA, where they spoiled and ouerran all the contrie, and burnt the campe of the ATHENIANS. Herefore euery man blamed Nicias much, because through his long delay, and protracting of time to make all thinges sure, he let slippe sundry occasions of notable exploit, wherein good seruice might haue bene done. Yet when he would do a thing in deede, he did it so thorowly as no man could take exception to his doings, for that he brought it to so good a passe: and once taking it in hande, he did execute it with all speede, though he was both slowe to determine and a coward to enterprife. Now when he remoued his army to returne to SYRACUSA, he brought it so orderly, & also with such speede & safety: that he was come by sea to THARSVS, had landed & taken the forte of Epipolis, before the SYRACVSANS had any intelligence of it, or could possibly helpe it. For the choyce men of the SYRACVSANS being set out against him, hoping to haue stoppe this passage: he ouerthrow them, tooke three hundred prisoners,

made their horsemen die, which before were thought invincible. But that which made the SYRACVSANS most aftrayed, and seemed most wonderfull all to the other GREEKIANS, was this: that in a very short space he had almost emurrouned SYRACUSA with a wall, which was as much in compass about, as the walles of ATHENS, and worke to performe, by reason of the woody contry; and for the sea also that beareth upon the walles, besides that there were diuers hundred hard by it, and yet (sicke as he was of the stone) he had almost finished it. And sure good reason it is that we attribute the fault of the not finishing of it, vnto his sickelesse. For mine owne parte I wonder maruclously both of the care & diligence of the Capitaine, and of the valianties and dexterity of the souldiers, which appeareth by the notable seates they did for euery pace after their ouerthrow and vicer running, made a funeral Epitaph in verse, and Sylbithus thus: Eight times four men did put the men of Syracuse to flight, so long as with indifferenose the goddess did use their might. But we find it written, that the SYRACVSANS were not only eight times, but many times more ouerthrowen by them: a time at length there was in deede, that both the gods and for time fought against them; euen when the ATHENIANS were of greater power. Now Nicias his owne person was euer in the greatest and most weighty attayers, straining with his sickelesse body: Howbeit one day when his disease grew sore upon him, he was compelled to be lodged in his campe with a few of his men: but Lamachus in the meane time alone hauing charge of the whole army, fought with the SYRACVSANS, who then had brought a wall from the city vnto the wall with which the ATHENIANS had purposed to haue shutt them in: to keepe that they should not compass it rounde. And because the ATHENIANS commonly were the stronger in these skirmishes, they many times ouer rather followed the chafe of their enemies that fled: As it chaunced one day that Zanab went so farre, that he was left alone to encounter a company of horsemen of the city, before whom Callistratus marched for melt, a valliant man of his handes, who challenged Lamachus hand to hand: Lamachus abode him; and in the conflict was first hurt: but he gaue Callistratus also such a wound therewithall, that they both fell downe dead presently in the place. At that time the SYRACVSANS being the stronger side, tooke vp his body, and caried it away with them: but they spured euery one of them to the ATHENIANS campe, where Nicias lay sicke, without any garde or succor at all: neither helpe, Nicias rose with speede out of his bed, and perceiving the danger he was in, commaunded certaine of his frendes to set the wodde a fire which they had brought within the attiches of the campe, to make certaine deuises for battery, and the engines of timber and so that were already made. That deuise onely stayed the SYRACVSANS, saued Nicias, and the strength of their campe, together with all the siluer and cariage of the ATHENIANS. For the SYRACVSANS, perceiving a farre off, betwixt them and the strength of their campe, such a great flame as rose vp in the ayer, upon sight of it turned taile straight, and made towards their city. Things falling out thus, Nicias being left lone Capitaine of the army without any companion, in great hope notwithstanding to do some good: diuers cities of SICILE yielded vnto him; shippes caught with corne came out of euery quarter to his campe, and many submitted their felmes, for the good successe he had in all his doings. Furthermore the SYRACVSANS also sent to parle with him of peace, being out of hope that they were able to defende their city any longer against him. Gylippus also a Capitaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS, coming to aide the SYRACVSANS, vnderstanding by the way howe the city of SYRACUSA was shutt in with a wall round about, and in great distresse: helde on his voyage notwithstanding, nor with any hope to defende SICILE (supposing the ATHENIANS had wonne the whole contry) but with intent neuertheless to helpe the cities of ITALIE, if he could possibly. For it was a common rumor abroad, that the ATHENIANS had wonne all; and that their Capitaine for his wisdom and good fortune was invincible. Nicias him selfe now contrary to his wonted wisdom and foresight, running altogether to the good successe which he saw to follow him, but specially beleuing the reportes that were told him of SYRACUSA, & the newes that were brought him thence by some of their felmes, which came secretly vnto him, perswading him selfe that within few dayes he should haue SYRACUSA by composition, tooke no care to withstand Gylippus comminge hether, neither sent any men to kepe him from landinge in Syracusa. By which negligence, Gylippus landed in a passenger, without Nicias knowledge: so reckoning they made of him, and so much did they fondly despise him, Gylippus beinge landed farre from Syracusa, beganne to gather men of warre together, before the Syracusan them selves knew of his landing, or looked for his coming: in such as the Syracusan already appointed the assemblye of a counsell to determine the sturges and expulsiō of peace, which they should conclude upon with Nicias. Moreover, there were some that persuaded they should doe well to make hast to conclude the peace, before the inclosure of the Syracusan walle was altogether finished, which then lacked not much to performe, havinge all the stuffe for the purpose brought even ready to the place. But as these things were even thus doing, arrived one Gongylus at Syracusa, that came from Corinth with a gally. At whose landing, the people upon the peeres flocking about him, to heare what newes: he tolde them that Gylippus would be there before it were long, and that there came certaine other galleys after to their aide. The Syracusan would hardly beleue him, until there came another messenger also sent from Gylippus selfe of purpose, that willed them to come and come to him into the field. Thereupon the Syracusan beinge marvellously reuiued, went all straight armed them selves. And Gylippus was no sooner come into Syracusa, but he presented his men in battellray, to set upon the Athenians. Nicias for his parte had likewise alotted the Athenians in order of battell, and ready to fight. When both armies were nowe approached neere eche to other, Gylippus threw downe his weapons, and sent a Herald vnto Nicias to promise them life and bagage to departe safely out of Syracusa. But Nicias would make the Herald none answer to that message. Howbeit there were certaine of his soldiers that in mockerie asked the Herald, if for the cominge of a poore cape and wand of Lacedemon, the Syracusan thought the selues strengthened so much, that they should despise the Athenians, which not long before kept three hundred Lacedemonians prisoners in irons, farre stronger and more heare on their heades, then Gylippus had, and had also sent them home to their citizens at Lacedemon. And Timaeus wryteth also, that the Syracusan them selves, made no reckoning of Gylippus, neither then, nor at any time after. After, because they sawe his extreme couetousnesse and miserie: and then, for that he came meanely apparelled, with a threede bare cape, and a long bush of heare, which made them scorne him. Yet in another place he sayeth, that so soone as Gylippus arrived in Syracusa, he came to him out of euery quarter with very good will, like birdes wondering at an owle. This second reporte seemeth truer then the first: for they swarmed about him, because in this case & wand they sawe the tokens of the maiesty of the city & feignory of Sparta. Thucydides also sayeth, that it was Gylippus only that did all there. And much like doth Phylistus selfe a Syracusan confesse, who was present then in prison & sawe all things that were done. Notwithstanding, at the first battell the Athenians had the vpper hand, & slue a number of the Syracusan SANS, among the which Gongylus the Corinthian was one. But the next morning following, Gylippus made them know the skill and experience of a wise Captaine. For, with the same weapons, with the same men, with the same horses, and in the same place, changinge only the order of his battell, he ouerthrew the Athenians: and fighting with them thus beinge driuen them euen into their campe, he set the Syracusan SANS to worke to build vpon a walle ouerthwart, (with the very selfe same stones and stuffe which the Athenians had brought and layed there for the finishinge of their inclosure) to cut of the other, and to keepe it from going forward, that it ioyned not together. So, all that the Athenians had done before, which that present was vnto no purpose. Things standing in these termes, the Syracusan beinge courageous againe, beganne to arme gallies, and running vp and downe the fieldes with their horsemen and slaues, tooke many prisoners. Gylippus on another side, went in person to and fro through the cities of Syracusa, perswading and exhortinge the inhabitants in such sorte, that they all willingly obeyed him, and tooke armes by his procurement. Nicias seeinge things thus falle out, fell to his olde trade againe, and consideringe the change of his late and former good lucke, his hart beginninge to fainte, wrote straight to the Athenians to send another army into Syracusa, or rather to call that home which he had there, but in any

A case to geue him leaue to returne, and to discharge him of his office, for cause of this sickness. The Athenians were indifferent before he wrote, so fere wide as they ther: howbeit then upon the hobblity bare vnto Nicias good fortune, did euer cause some delay, that they sent no more than, and then they determined to fend with speede. So Demosthenes, was named to be for away in time, meedily after winter, with a great navy. In the middle of winter, Eutylidemus went to Nicias, & carried him both money, & newes, that the people had choosendome of them for this command. Now Nicias in the meane time beinge sodainly affailed by these enemies, chose by sea and land: so though at the first he had fewer gallies in number than they, yet he budged diuers of theirs and suncke them. But by lande againe, he could not aide his men in time, because Gylippus at the first on set had taken a forte of his called Pleimnyon, within the which by the forte & pass at the first on set had taken a forte of his called Pleimnyon, within the which by the forte & rackell for many gallies, & a great masse of ready money which was wholly lost. Besides, in the same confict also were many men slaine, and many taken prisoners. Yet further, the greatest matter of weight was, that thereby he toke from Nicias the great commoditie he had to bringe his vittells safely by sea to his campe. For while the Athenians kept possession, they might at their pleasure bring vittells without danger to their campe, beinge ordered with the same: but when they had lost it, then it was hard for them so to do, because they were euer driuen to fight with the enemies, that lay at anker before the forte. Furthermore the Syracusan did not thinke that their armie by sea was ouerthrowen, because their enemies were the stronger, but for that their men had followed the Athenians disorderedly, and therefore were desirous once againe to venter, in better sorte and order than before. But Nicias by no means would be brought to fight againe, saying, that it were a madnes looking for such a great navy & a new supply as Demosthenes was cominge withall, rashly to fight with a fewer number of shippes than they, and but poorly furnished. But contrariely, Menander, and Eutylidemus, newly promoted to the state of Captaines with Nicias, beinge pricked forwards with ambition against the two other Captaines (Nicias and Demosthenes) that was then cominge desired to preuent Demosthenes, in performinge some notable seruice before his arrivall, & thereby also to excell Nicias doings: Howbeit, the cloke they had to couer their ambition withall was, the honor & reputation of the city of Athens, the which (sayd they) were shamed and dishonored for euer, if they now should shew the selues affraid of the Syracusan, who promised them to fight. Thus brought they Nicias against his wilke to battell, in the which the Athenians were slaine and ouercome, by the good counsell of a Corinthian Pilot called Arifon. For the left wing of their battell (as Thucydides wryteth) was clearly ouerthrowen, and they lost a great number of their men. Whereupon Nicias was wonderfully perplexed, consideringe on the one side that he had taken maruelous paines, whilst he was sole Captaine of the whole army: and on another side, for that he had committed a foule fault, when they had geuen him companions. But as Nicias was in this great dispaire, they desierd Demosthenes upon a pere of the haven, with his steere brauely fet out and furnished, to terrifie the enemies. For he had three score and thirteene gallies, and in them he brought fise thousande footemen well armed and appointed, and of darters, bowmen, and hurlers with slinges about three thousand, and the gallies trimmed and set forth with goodly armors, numbers of engines, and with a world of trompetes, howboyes, and such marine musike, and all set out in this triumphant shew, to feare the enemies the more. Now thought the Syracusan them selves againe in a peeke of troubles, perceiuing they stroue against the streaitie, and consumed them selves to no purpose, where by that they sawe there was no likely hood to be deliuered fro their troubles. And Nicias also reioyced, that so great aide was come, but his ioy helde not long. For so soone as he began to talke with Demosthenes of the state of things, he found him bent forthwith to set upon the Syracusan, and to hafard all with speede, that they might quickly take Syracusa, and so dispatche away home againe. Nicias thought this more hard than good speede, and feared much this foolhardines. Whereupon he prayed him to attempt nothinge rashly, nor desperately: and perswaded him that it was their best way to prolong the warre against the enemies, who were without money, and therefore would soone be forsaken of their confederates. And besides, if they came once to be pinched for lacke of vittells, that they would then quickly seeke to him for peace, as they had done afore time. For there were many within SYRACUSA that were Nicias frendes, who wished him to abide time: for they were weary of warre, and waxed angry also with Gylippus. So that if they were but straightened a litle more with want of vittells, they would yeelde straight. Nicias deliuering these persuasions sounly but darkely, and keeping somewhat from vtterance, because he would not speake them openly: made his colleagues thinke he spake it for cowardlines, and that he returned againe to his former delays to keepe all in security, by which manner of proceedinge he had from the beginning killed the hartes of his armie, for that he had not at his first comming layd upon the enemies, but had protracted time so long, till the corage of his souldiers was cold and done, and him selfe also brought into contempt with his enemies. Whereupon the other Capitaines (his colleagues and companions with him in the charge) Euthydemus and Meneder, studeo Demosthenes opinion: wherunto Nicias was also forced against his will to yeelde. So Demosthenes the selfe same night taking the footemen, went to assault the fort of Epipolus where, before his enemies heard any thing of his comming, he flue many of them, and made the rest flee that offered resistance. But not content with this victory, he went furder, till he fell upon the BOEOTIANS. They gathering themselves together were the first that resisted the ATHENIANS, basing their pikes with such furie and lowde cries, that they caused the fortresse to retire, and made all the rest of the assailantes afraied and amased. For the foremost flyinge backe, came full upon their companions: who taking them for their enemies, and their flight for a charge, resisted them with all their force, & so mistaking one another, both were wounded and slaine, and the hurt they ment vnto their enemies, did vnfortunately light vpon their owne fellows. For this multitude meetinge thus confusedly together, what through their great feare, & what for that they could not discern one another in the night, the which was neither so darke that they could not see at all, nor yet so cleere, as they might certainly iudge by sight what they were that met them: (for then the moone declined a pace, and the small light it gaue was diffused with the number of men that ran to & fro) the feare they had of the enemy, made them mistrust their frendes. All these troubles and disadvantages had the ATHENIANS; and beside, the moone on their backs, which causing the shadow to fall forward, did hide their number, and glistering of armor: and contrarily, the enemies targets, glancing in their eyes by the reflection of the moone that shone vpon them, encreased their feare, and making them seeme a greater number and better appointed than they were in deede. At last, the enemies geuing a lusty charge vpon them on euery side, after they once beganne to geue backe and turne taile: some were slaine by their enemies, others by their owne company, and others also brake their neckes falling from the rocks. The rest that were dispersed abroad in the fieldes, were the next morning euery man of them put to the sword by the horsemen. So, the account made, two thousand ATHENIANS were slaine, and very few of them escaped by flight, that brought their armors backe againe. Wherefore Nicias that alwayes mistrusted it would thus come to passe, was maruelously offended with Demosthenes, and condemned his rashnes. But he excusing him selfe as well as he could, thought it best to imbarke in the morning betimes, and so to hoyste sayle homewards. For, sayd he, we must looke for no new aide from ATHENS, neither are we strong enough with this armie to overcome our enemies: and though we were, yet must we of necessity auoide the place we are in, because (as it is reported) it is alwayes vnholosome for an army to campe in, and then specially most contagious, by reason of the autumne and season of the yeare, as they might plainly see by experience. For many of their people were already sicke, and all of them in manner had no minde to tary. Nicias in no case liked the motion of departing thence, because he feared not the SYRACUSANS, but rather the ATHENIANS, for their accusations & condemnation. And therefore in open counsell he told them, that as yet he saw no such daunger to remaine: and though there were, yet that he had rather dye of his enemies hands, than to be put to death by his owne contrymen. Being therein of a contrary minde to Leo Bizantine, who after that sayd to his citizens, I had rather suffer death by you, than to be slaine with you. And furthermore, as for removing the campe to some other place, they should haue leasure enough to determine of that matter as they thought good. Now when Nicias had deliuered this opinion in counsell, Demosthenes ha-

A thing that ill lucke at his first coming, durst not contrary it. And the residue also supposing that Nicias shoulde not so hard against their departure, but that he relied upon the trust and confidence he had of some within the city: they all agreed to Nicias. But when newes came that there was a new supply come vnto the SYRACUSANS, and that they saw the plague encreased more and more in their campe: then Nicias selfe thought it best to departe thence, and gaue order to the souldiers to prepare them selves to slippe away. Notwithstanding, when they had put all things in readines for their departure, without any knowledge of the enemy, or suspicion thereof: the moone beganne to eclipse in the night, and sodainly to lose her light, so the great feare of Nicias and quers others, who through ignorance and superstition qualified at such sightes. For, touching the eclipse and darkening of the sunne, which is euer at any continuation of the moone, euery common person then knew the cause to be the darkenes of the body of the moone betwixt the sunne and our sight. But the eclipse of the moone it selfe, to know what doth darken it in that sorte, and howe being at the full it doth sodainly lose her light, and chaunge into so many kinde of colours: that was aboue their knowledge, and therefore they thought it very straunge, perswading them selves that it was a signe of some great mischiefes the goddesses did threaten vnto men. For Anaxagoras, the first that euer determined and deliuered any thing, for certaine and assured, concerning the light and darkenes of the moone: his doctrine was not then of any long continuance, neither had it the credit of antiquity, nor was generally knowe, but only to a few, who durst not talke of it but with feare euen to the they trusted best. And the reason was, for that the people could not at that time abide them that professed the knowledge of natural Philofophy, & inquired of the causes of things: for them they called then Meteoropostrophes, so much to say, as curious inquirers, and ratlers of things aboue the reach of reason, done in heauen and in the ayer. Because the people thought they ascribed that which was done by the goddesses only, vnto certaine naturall and necessary causes, that worke their effectes not by prouidence nor will, but by force, and necessary consequences. For these causes was Protagoras banished from ATHENS, and Anaxagoras put in prison: from whence Pericles had much ado to procure his deliery. And Socrates also, though he did not meddle with that parte of Philofophy, was notwithstanding put to death for the suspicion thereof. In fine, the doctrine of Plato being receiued and liked, as well for his vertuous life, as also for that he submitted the necessity of naturall causes vnto the controlement & disposition of diuine power, as vnto a more excellent and supreme cause: tooke away all the opinion which the people had of such disputations, and gaue open passage and free entry vnto the Mathematicall sciences. And therefore Dion, one of Platoes scholars and frendes, an eclipse of the moone chauning euen at the very same time that he was weying vp his anckers to sayle from ZACYNTHUS, to make warre with the tyrant Dionysius: being nothing afraied much troubled therewithall, made sayle notwithstanding, and when he came to SYRACUSA, draue out the tyrant. But then it fell out vnfortunately for Nicias, who had no expert nor skilful soothsayer: for the party which he was wont to vie for that purpose, and which tooke away much of his superstition, called Stilbides, was dead not long before. For this signe of the eclipse of the moone (as Philochorus sayth) was not hurtfull for men that would flee, but contrarily very good: for sayd he, things that men doe in feare, would be hidden, and therefore light is an enemy vnto them. But this notwithstanding, their custome was not to keepe them selves close about three dayes in such eclipses of the moone and sunne, as Aucostides selfe prescribeth in a booke he made of such matters: where Nicias bare them then in bande, that they should tary the whole and full reuolution of the course of the moone, as though he had not sene her straight cleere againe, after she had once passed the shadow and darkenes of the earth. But all other things layd a side and forgotten, Nicias disposed him selfe to sacrifice vnto the gods: vntill such time as the enemies came againe as well to besiege their fortres, and all their campe by lande, as also to occupy the whole hauen by sea. For they had not onely put men aborde in their gallies able to weare armor, but moreouer young boyes into fisher botes and other light barks, with the which they came to the ATHENIANS, and shamefully reuiled them, to procure them to fight: among the which there was one of a noble house, called Heraclides whose bote being forwarder than his companions, was in daunger of taking by a gallee of the

ATHENIANS, that rowed against him. Polichno his vncle being afrayed of it, lanchid forward with renne galleies of SYRACUSA for his rescue, of the which him selfe was Capitaine. The other galleies douting also least Polichno should take hurt, came on likewise a mayne. In this there fell out a great battell by sea, which the SYRACVSANS wanne, and slue Eurymedon the Capitaine, and many other. This made the fouldiers of the ATHENIANS so afrayed, that they beganne to crie out, it was no longer tarying there, and that there was none other way but to departe thence by land. For after the SYRACVSANS had wonne that battell, they had straight shut vp the haven mouth. Nicias could not consent to such a retyre. For, sayd he, it would be too great a shame for them to leaue their galleies and other shippes to the enemy, considering the number not to be much lesse then two hundred: but he thought good rather to armed hundred and threene galleies with the best & vallantest of their footemen, and darters, that were in the army, because the other galleies had spent their owers. And for the rest of the army, Nicias forsaking their great campe and walles (which reached as farre as the temple of Hercules) did set the in battell ray upon the peere of the haven. In so much, that the SYRACVSANS which vntill that day could not performe their wonted sacrifices vnto Hercules: did then sende their Priestes and Capitaines thither to do them. The fouldiers being imbarked into the galleies, the Priestes and Soothsayers came and told the SYRACVSANS, that vndoutedly the signes of the sacrifices did promise the a noble victory, so that they gaue no charge, but only stood vpon their defence: for so did Hercules euer overcome, defending, when he was assailed. With this good hope the SYRACVSANS rowed forward, and there was such a hot and cruell battell by sea, as had not bene in all this warre before: the which was as dreadfull to them that stood on the shore to behold it, as it was mortall vnto them that fought it, seeing the whole comite, and what alteration fell out beyond all expectation. For the ATHENIANS did as whole hunt them selues by the order they kept in their fight, and by the ranckes of their shippes, as they were hurt by their enemies. For they had placed all their great shippes together, fighting with the heauy, against thenemies that were light and swift, which came on on euery side of them, whirling stones at them which were made sharpe to wound how euer they lighted: whereas the ATHENIANS onely casting their dartes, and vsing their bowes and slinges, by means of their rowing vp and downe could not lightly come to hit with the head. That maner of fight, Aristo a CORINTHIAN (an excellent shippe maister) had taught the SYRACVSANS, who was him selfe slaine valliantly fighting, when they were conquerors. The ATHENIANS thereupon being driuen to fight, hauing sustained a maruelous slaughter & ouerthrow, (their way to life by sea being also cleerely taken from them) and perceiving moreover that they could hardly saue them selues by land: were then so discouraged, as they made no longer resistance, when their enemies came hard by them and caried away their shippes, before their faces. Neither did they aske leaue to take vp their dead mens bodies to bury them, taking more pity to forsake their diseased and fore wounded companions, than to bury them that were already slaine. When they considered all these things, they thought their owne state more miserable than theirs, which were to end their liues with much more cruelty, than was their misery present. So they being determined to departe thence in the night, Gylippus perceiving the SYRACVSANS through all the cite disposed them selues to sacrifice to the goddes, and to be merry, as well for the ioy of their victorie, as also for Hercules feast: thought it bootelesse to perswade them, and much lesse to compell them, to take armes vpon a sodaine, to set upon their enemies that were departing. Howbeit Hermocrates deuising with him selfe how to deceiue Nicias, sent some of his frendes vnto him with instructions, to tell him that they came from such as were wont to send him secret intelligence of all things during this warre: and willed him to take heede not to departe that night, least he fell into the ambushes which the SYRACVSANS had layed for him, hauing sent before to take all the straights and passages, by the which he should passe. Nicias being ouerreachd by Hermocrates craft and subtilty, layed there that night, as though he had bene affrayed to fall within the daunger of his enemies ambush. Thereupon, the SYRACVSANS the next morning by peepe of day, hoyled sayle, got the straights of Nicias passage, stopped the riuers mouthes, & brake vp the bridges: and then cast their horsemen in a squadron in the next plaine fields adioyning, so that the ATHENIANS had no way left

A left to escape, and passe by them, without fighting. At last notwithstanding, hauing stayed all that day and the next night following, they put them selues in iorney, and departed with great cries & lamentations, as if they had gone from their naturall contry, and not out of their enemies laude: as well for the great distresse and necessity wherein they were, (lacking all things needfull to susteine life,) as also for the extreme sorrow they felt to leaue their foret wounded companions and diseased kinsmen and friends behinde them, that could not for their weakness followe the assaiege, but specially for that they looked for some woofle matter to fall, of them selues, than that which they sawe present before their eyes to be happened to their fellowes. But of all the most pinesfull sightes to behold in that campe, there was none more lamentable nor miserable, than the person of Nicias selfe: who being tormented with his disease, and waxen verry leane and pale, was also vnworthly brought to extreame want of food, vntill lutenance, euen when he had most neede of comfort, being very sickely. Yet notwithstanding his weakenes and infirmity, he tolke great paines, and suffered in many things, which the soundest bodys don labor much to overcome and suffer: making it appeare evidently no quey in that he did not abide all that paines for any respect of himselfe, or desire that he had vnto his owne life, so much as for their sakes in that he yielded not vnto present displeasure, where the fouldiers for very feare & sorrow burst out in teares & bitter wayling. Nicias selfe shewed, that if by chaunce he were forced at any tyme to doe the like, it was rather vpon remembrance of the shame and dishonour that came into his minde, to see the vnfortunate successe of this voyage, in steade of the honor and victory they hoped to haue brought home, than for any other respect. But if to see Nicias in this misery, did moue the lookers on to pitty, so did this much more encrease their compassion, when they remembered Nicias words at his orations continually to the people, to breake this iorney, & to dissuade them from the enterprise of this warre. For then they plainly iudged him not to haue deferred these troubles. Yet furthermore, this caused the fouldiers verry to dispayre of helpe from the goddes, when they considered with them selues, that so deuout and godly a man as Nicias (who left nothing vndone that might red to the honor and seruice of the goddes) had no better successe, than the most vile and wicked persones in all the whole army. All this notwithstanding, Nicias strained him selfe in all that might be, both by his good countenance, his cheerefull wordes, & his kinde vsing of euery man, to let them know that he faint not vnder his burden, nor yet did yeeld to this his misfortune and extreame calamity. And thus travelling eight dayes iorney outright together, notwithstanding that he was by the way continually let upon, wearied, and hurt: yet he euer maintained his bandes, and led them whole in company vntill that Demosthenes, with all his bandes of fouldiers was taken prisoner, in a certaine village called RODELIOS: where remaining behinde, he was enuironned by his enemies in fight; and seeing him selfe so compassed in, drew out his sword, and with his owne handes thrust him selfe thorow, but dyed not of it, because his enemies came straight about him, and tooke hold of him. The SYRACVSANS thereupon went with speede to Nicias, and told him of Demosthenes case. He geuing no credit to them, sent presently certaine of his horsemen thither to vnderstand the troth: who brought him wordes that Demosthenes and all his men were taken prisoner. Then he besought Gylippus to treat of peace, to suffer the poore remaine of the ATHENIANS to departe out of SICILY with safety, and to take such hostages for the sure payment of all such summes of money the SYRACVSANS had disbursed by meanes of this warre, as should like him selfe: which he promised he would cause the ATHENIANS to performe satisfie vnto them. Howbeit the SYRACVSANS would in no wise hearken to peace, but cruelly threatening & reuiling them that made motion hereof, in rage gaue a new onser vpon him, then fiercely then euer before they had done. Nicias being then verry without any kinde of victells, did now withstanding hold out that night, & marched all the next day following (though the enemies darters still flew about their eares) vntill he came to the riuier of Afinarus, into the which the SYRACVSANS did forcibly driue them. Some others of them also dying for thirst, entered the riuier of them selues, thinking to drinke. But there of all others was the most cruell slaughter of the poore wretches, euen as they were drinking: vntill such time as Nicias falling downe flat at Gylippus feete, sayd thus vnto him. victery, shewe mercy, not to me that by these miseries haue won immortall honor and glory, but vnto these poore vanquished ATHENIANS: calling to theyr remembrance, that the tunes of warre are common, and howe that the ATHENIANS haue vied you LACEDÆMONIANS curiously, as often as fortune fauored them against you. Gylippus beholding Nicias perswaded by his wordes, tooke compassion of him, (for he knew he was a friend vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS at the last peace concluded betwixt them, and furthermore thought it an honor to him, if he could cary away the two Captaines or generalls of his enemies prisoners) shewed him mercy, gaue him wordes of comforte, and moreover commanded besides that they should take all the residue prisoners. But his commandement was not knowne in time to all: insomuch as there were many more slaine than taken, although some priuate foulding faued diuers notwithstanding by stealth. Now the SYRACVSANS hauing brought all the prisoners that were openly taken into a troupe together, first vnarmed them, then taking their weapons from them hong them vp upon the goodliest younge trees that stood upon their side in token of triumphe. And so putting on triumphing garlandes upon their heads, & hauing trimmed their owne horses in triumphant maner, & also shorne all the horses of their enemies: in this triumphing sorte they made their entry into the citie of SYRACUSA, hauing gloriously ended the most notable warre that euer was amongst the GREEKES one against another, and attained also the noblest victery that could be achieved, and that only by loss of armes and valliancy. So at their returne, a counsell and assembly was holden at SYRACUSA by the citizens and their confederates: in the which, Eurycles one of the orators, (a practitioner of publicke causes) first made petition, that the day on the which they had taken Nicias, might for euer thenceforth be kept holy day, without any manner of worke or labor, but only to doe sacrifice to the goddesses: and that the feast should be called, Asinarus feast, after the name of the riuer where the ouerthrow was geuen. This victery was had the six and twenty day of the moneth of Iuly. And as touching the prisoners, that the confederates of the ATHENIANS and their slaues should be openly solde by the dromme: and that the naturall ATHENIANS which were free men, and their confederates of the contry of SICILE, should be clapped in iron, & layed in prison, the Captaine only excepted, whom they should put to death. The SYRACVSANS confirmed this decree. And when the Captaine Hermocrates went about to perswade them that to be merciful in victery, would be more honor vnto them, than the victery it selfe: they thrust him backe with great tumult. And furthermore, when Gylippus made sure that for the Captaine of the ATHENIANS, he might cary them aliue with him to SPARTA: he was not onely shamefully denied, but most vilely abused, so lusty were they growen upon this victery, beside also that in the time of the warre they were offended with him, & could not endure his straight seuerer LACONIAN government. Timeus sayth moreover, that they accused him of couetousnes and theft, which vice he inherited from his father. For Cleandrides his father was conuict for extortion, and banished ATHENS. And Gylippus selfe hauing stolen thirty talentes out of a howse which Lyfander sent to SPARTA by him, and hauing hid them vnder the eufinges of his howse, being bewrayed, was compelled with shame to flie his contry, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lyfander. So Timeus wryteth, that Nicias & Demosthenes were not stoned to death by the SYRACVSANS, as Thucydides and Philistus reported, but that they killed them selues, upon word sent them by Hermocrates (before the assembly of the people was broken vp) by one of his men whom the keepers of the prison let in vnto them: howbeit their bodies were cast out at the iale dore, for euery man to beholde. I haue heard there is a target at this present to be seene in a temple at SYRACUSA, which is sayd to be Nicias target, couered all ouer with golde and purple silke, passinge finely wrought together. As for the other prisoners of the ATHENIANS, the most of them dyed of sicknesses, and of ill handling in the prison: where they had no more allowed them to liue withall but two dishfulls of barley for their breade, and one of water for eche man a day. In deepe many of them were conueyed away, and sold for slaues: and many also that scaped vnknown as slaues, were also solde for bondmen, whom they branded in the forehead with the printe of a horse, who notwithstanding besides their bondage endured also this paine. But such, their humble patience, and modesty did greatly profit them. For eicher shortly after they were made free men,

A or if they still continued in bondage, they were gently intreated, and beloued of their masters. Some of them were saued also for Euripides sake. For the SICILIANS liked the verses of this Poet better, than they did any other GREEKIANS verses of the middelt of GREECE. For it they heard any times or songes like vnto his, they would haue them by hart, & one would present the to an other with great ioy. And therefore it is reported, that diuers escaping this bondage, and returning againe to ATHENS, went very louingly to salute Euripides, & to thanke him for their liues: and told him how they were deliuered from slavery; only by teaching them those verses which they remembered of his workes. Others tolde him also, how that after the battell, they escaping by flight, & wandering vp and downe the fieldes, met with some that gaue them meate & drinke to sing his verses. And this is not to be marvelled at, weying the reporte made by a shippe of the city of CAVNUS, that on a time being chased in therby by pyrates, thinking to saue the selues within their portes, could not at the first be receiued, but had repulse: howbeit being demaunded whether they could sing any of Euripides songes, and aunswering that they could, were straight suffered to enter, and come in. The newes of this lamentable ouerthrow, was not beleued at the first, when they heard of it at ATHENS. For a stranger that landed in the haven of PIRÆA, went and sat him downe (as the manner is) in a barbers shoppe, & thinking it had bene commonly knowen there, beganne to talke of it. The barber hearing the stranger tell of such matter, before any other had heard of it: ranne into the city as fast as he could, and going to the gouernors tolde the newes openly before them all. The magistrats thereupon did presently call an assembly, and brought the barber before them: who being demaunded of whom he heard these newes, could make no certaine reporte. Whereupon being taken for a forger of newes, that without ground had put the city in feare and trouble: he was presently bound, and layed on a wheele, wheron they vse to put offenders to death, and so was there, tormented a great time, vntill at last there arriued certaine men in the city, who brought too certaine newes thereof, and told euery thing how the ouerthrow came. So as in fine they found Nicias wordes true, which now they beleued, when they sawe all those miseries light fully upon them, which he long before had prognosticated vnto them.

THE LIFE OF Marcus Crassus.

his kind, & young.

MARCUS Crassus was the sonne of a Censor, who had also received the honor of triumphe: but him selfe was brought vp in a litle house with two other of his brethern, which were both married in their fathers & mothers life time, and kept house together. Whereupon it came to passe, that he was a man of such sober and temperate dyet, that one of his brethre being deceased, he married his wife by whom he had children. For women, he liued as continent a life, as any ROMANE of his time: notwithstanding, afterwarde being of riper yeares, he was accused by Plotinus to haue deflowred one of the Vestall Nunnes called Licinia. But in troth the cause of that suspicion grew thus. Licinia had a goodly pleasaunt garden hard by the suburbes of the city, wherewith Crassus was maruelously in loue, and would faine haue had it good cheape: and vpon this only occasion was often scene in speeche with her, which made the people suspect him. But forasmuch as it seemed to the iudges that his couetousnes was the cause that made him follow her, he was clered of thincest suspected, but he neuer left followinge of the Nunne, till he had got the garden of her. The ROMANES lay there was but that only vice of couetousnes in Crassus, that drowned many other goodly vertues in him: for mine owne opinion, me thinks he could not be touched with that vice alone without others, since it grew so great, as the note of that only did hide and couer all his other vices. Nowe to set out his extreme couetous desire of getting, naturally bred in him, they proue it by two manifest reasons. The first, his maner and meanes he vsed to get: and the seconde, the greatnes of his wealth. For at the beginning he was not left much more worthe, then three hundred talentes. And during the time that he delt in the affayres of the common wealth, he offered the tenthes of all his goodes wholly vnto Hercules, kept open house for all the people of ROMANE, and gaue also to euery citizen of the same as much come as would kepe him three monethes: & yet when he went from ROMANE to make warre with the PARTHIANS, him selfe being desirous to know what all he had was worth, founde that it amounted to the summe of seuen thousande one hundred talentes. But if I may with license vse euill speeche, wryting a troth: I say he got the most parte of his wealth by fire and blood, raising his greate reuenue of publicke calamities. For when Sylla had take the citie of ROMANE, he made portefale of the goods of them whom he had put to death, to those that gaue most, tearming them his booty,

How Crassus came by his goodes.

A booty, onely for that he would the nobility, and greatest men of power in the citie should be partakers with him of this iniquity: and in this open sale Crassus neuer left taking of giftes, nor bying of thinges of Sylla for profit. Furthermore, Crassus perceiuinge that the greate decay commonly of the buildings in ROMANE came by fire, and falling downe of houses, through the ouermuch weight by numbers of stories built one upon another: bought bonedme that were mafons, carpinters, and these deuilsours and builders, & of those he had to the number of fife hundred. Afterwarde, when the fire tooke any house, he would buy the house while it was a burning, and the next houses adioyning to it, which the owners sold for litle, being then in daunger as they were, and a burning: so that by proces of time, the most parte of the houses in ROMANE came to be his. But notwithstanding that he had so many flaues to his workemen, he neuer built any house from the ground, sauing his owne house wherein he dwelt: saying, that such as delighted to build, vndid them selues without helpe of any enemy. And though he had many mynes of siluer, many ploughes, and a number of hyndes and plowmen to followe the same: yet all that commoditie was nothing, in respect of the profit his flaues and bonedmen brought him dayly in. As readers, scriueners, goldmythes, bankers, receiuers, stewards of householde, caruers, and other such officers at the table, taking paines him selfe to helpe them when they were learners, and to instruct them what they should doe: and to be shorthe, he thought the greatest care a good householder ought to haue, was to see his flaues by seruantes well taught, being the most liuely cattell and best instruments of a mans house. And surely therein his opinion was not ill, at the least if he thought as he spake: that all thinges must be done by seruantes, and his seruantes must be ruled by him. For we see that the arent fence, is but a bafe thing, only tending to gaine: but when it dependeth vpon good order and government of men, me thinks then it is to knowe how to gouerne well a common wealth. But as his iudgement was good in the other, so was it very bad in this: that he thought no man riche, and wealthie, that could not maintaine a whole army with his owne proper goods. For the warre (as king Archidamus was wont to say) is not made with any certainty of expence: and therefore there must no sufficiency of riches be limited for the maintenance of the same. But herein Marius and he differed farre in opinion: who hauinge allowed euery ROMANE foureteene akers lande (called with them, Iugera) vnderstanding that some were not pleased, but would haue more, made them this aunswer. The gods forbid any ROMANE should thinke that land litle, which in deede is enough to suffice for his maintenance. This notwithstanding, Crassus was courteous to straungers, for his house was open to them all, and he lent his frendes money without interest: but when they brake day of payment with him, then would he resolutely demaunde his money of them. So, his curtesie to lende many times without interest, did more trouble them, than if he had taken very great vsury. In deede when he had any man to come to his table, his fare was but euen ordinary, without all excess: but his fine and cleanly seruice, & the good entertainment he gaue euery man that came to him, pleased them better, than if he had bene more plentifull of dyet and dishes. As for his learning and study, he chiefly studied eloquence, and that sorte specially that best would serue his turne to speake in open prefence: so that he became the best spoken man in ROMANE of all his time, and by his great indutry and diligent indeuor excelled all them that euen by nature were most apt vnto it. For some say, he had neuer so small nor litle a cause in hande, but he alwayes came prepared, hauing studied his case before for pleading: and oftentimes also when Pompey, Caesar, and Cicero refused to rise, and speake to matters, Crassus would defend euery cause if he were requested. And therefore was he generally beloued & well thought of, because he shewed him selfe painfull, & willing to helpe euery man. Likewise was his gentlenes maruelously esteemed, because he saluted euery body curteously and made much of all men: for, whom so euer he met in the streetes that spake to him as he passed and saluted him, were he neuer so meane, he would speake to him againe, and call him by his name. It is sayd also he was very well studied in stories, and indifferently scene in Philofophy, specially in Aristotels workes, which one Alexander did read vnto him, a man that became very gentle and pacient of nature, by vsing of Crassus company: for it were hard to say, whether Alexander was poorer when he came to Crassus or made poorer while he was with him. Of all his frendes he would euer haue Alexander a broade with him, and while they were abroade, would lend him a hat to couer his head by the way: but so soone as they were returned, he would call for it againe. O wonderfull patience of a man: to see that he making profession of Philosophie as he did, the poore man being in great poutery, did not place poutery in thinges indifferent. But hereof we will speake more hereafter. Cinna and Marius being now of greater power, and coming on directly towards Rome; euery man suspected straight their coming was for no good to the common wealth, but as appeared plainly, for the death and destruction of the noblest men of Rome. For this fell out in deede, that they slue all the chiefe men they found in the city, among whom Crassus father & his brother were of the number, and him selfe being at that time but young, escaped the present danger only by flight. Furthermore, Crassus hearing that they layed waite to take him, & that the tyrannes sought him in euery place, tooke three of his frends in his company, and rennessevauntes only, and fled into SPAYNE with all possible speede, where he had bene with his father before, and had got some frendes when he was Prator, and ruled that countie. Neuerthelesse, seeing euery body afayed, and mistrusting Marius cruelty as if he had bene at their dores, he durst not bewray him selfe to any man, but went into the fieldes, and hid him in a great caue being within the lande of one Vibius Piciacus by the sea side, from whence he sent a man of his to this Piciacus, to seele what good will he bare him, but specially for that his vittells beganne to faile him. Vibius hearing that Crassus was safe, and had escaped, became very glad of it: and vnderstanding how many persones he had with him, and into what place he was gotten, went not him selfe to see him, but called one of his slaues (who was his receiuer) and occupied that ground for him) & bringing him neere the place where Crassus was, commaunded him euery night to prouide meate for supper, to bring it ready dressed to this rocke whereunder was the caue, & make no wordes of it, neither be inquisitiue for whom it was, for if he did, he should dye for it: & otherwise, for keeping the thing secret as he commaunded, he promised to make him a free man. This caue is not farre from the sea side, & is closed in round about with two rockes that mete together, which receiue a soft couerwinde into them. When ye are entred into the caue, it is of a great height within, and in the hollownes thereof are many other caues of great receite one within an other, and besides that, it neither lacketh light nor water: for there is a well of passing good water running hard by the rocke, and the naturall riftes of the rockes also receiuing the light without, where they mete together, do sende inward into the caue. So that in the day time it is maruelous light, and hath no dampy ayre, but very pure and drye, by reason of the thicknes of the rocke, which sendeth all the moisture and vapour into that springinge well. Crassus keeping close in this caue, Vibius receiued brought vittells thither dayly to relieue him, and his company, but saw not them he brought it to, nor could vnderstand what they were: and yet they saw him plainly, obseruing the hour & time of his coming when he brought the same. He prouided them no more then would euen necessarily serue their turne, and yet plenty sufficient to make good cheare withall: for Vibius was bent to entertaine Crassus as honorably as he could possible, inasmuch as he considered he was a young man, and therefore reason would he should offer him some occasion to take such pleasure and delight as his youth required. For to relieue his necessity only, he thought that rather a parte of feare, than any shew of loue towards him. One day he tooke two fayer young damselfes, and brought them with him to the sea side: and when he came to the caue, shewed them where they should get vp, and bad them not be afayed. Crassus at the first, when he saw the young wenches, was afayed he had bene betrayed: yet he asked them what they were, and whome they sought. They being instructed by Vibius what they should say, answered, that they sought their master that was hidden there. Then Crassus knew this was Vibius mirth to shew him curtesie: so he receiued them into his caue, and kept them as long as he lay there, letting Vibius vnderstand by them what he lacked. Fenestella wryteth, that he saw one of them when she was an old woman, and that he had heard her tell him this tale many a time with great delight. In fine, Crassus (after he had lyeen hidden in this caue eight monethes) vnderstanding that Cinna was dead, came out: and so soone as he made him selfe to be knowne, there repayed a great number of souldiers vnto him, of whom he only chose

A two thousand fise hundred, and with them passed by many cities, and sacked one called MALACA, as diuers doe wryte, but he flatly denied it, and stowly contraried them that affirmed it. And afterwarde hauing gotten shippes together, went into AFRICKES, to Metellus Pius; a man of great fame, and that had already gotten a great army together. Howbeit he taried not long with Metellus, but iarring with him, went vnto Sylla, who welcomed and honored him as much, as any that he had about him. Sylla afterwarde arriuing in ITALIE, intending to imploy all the young nobility he had in his copany, gaue euery one of them charge vnder him, and sent Crassus into the countie of the MARSIANS, to leaue men of warre there. Crassus desiring certaine bandes of Sylla to aide him, being driuen to passe by his enemies: Sylla answered him angrily againe. I geue thee thy father, thy brother, thy frendes and kinsmen to aide thee, whom they most wickedly haue slaine and murdered, and whose deathea I pursue with hot reuenge of maine army, upon those bloody murderers that haue slaine them. Crassus being nettled with these wordes, departed thence presently, and stowly passing through his enemies, leauied a good number of souldiers: & was euer after ready at Syllas commaundement in all his warres. Here began first (as they say) the strife and contention between him and Pompey. For Pompey being younger than Crassus, and borne of a wicked father in Rome, whom the people more hated than euer they did man: came yet to great honor by his valliancy, & by the notable acts he did in the warres at that time. So that Sylla did Pompey that honor many times, which he seldom did vnto them that were his elders, nor yet vnto those that were his equals: as to rise vp when he came towards him, to put of his eappe, to call him Imperator, as much as Lieutenant generall. And this galled Crassus to the hart, although he had no wrong in that Pompey was taken before him, because he had no experience in matters of warre at that time, and also because these two vices that were bred in him, misery and couerousnes, drowned all his vertue and well doing. For at the sacke of the city of TVDAR, which he tooke, he priueyly got the most parte of the spoyle to him selfe, whereof he was accused before Sylla. Yet in the last battell of all this ciuill warre (which was the greatest and most dangerous of all other) euen before Rome it selfe, the wing that Sylla led, was repulsed and ouerthrowen: but Crassus that led the right wing, ouercame his enemies, followed them in chase till midnight, sent Sylla word of his victory, and demanded vittells for his men. But then againe he ranne into as great defame, for buying, or begging the consecrate goodes of the outlawes appointed to be slaine, for lide or nothing. And it is sayd also, that he made one an outlaw in the countie of the BRYTANS, without Syllas priuie or commaundement, only to haue his goodes. But Sylla being told of it, would neuer after vse him in any open seruice. Surely this is a straunge thing, that Crassus selfe being a great flatterer of other, & could creepe into any mans fauor: was yet him selfe easie to be won through flattery, of any man that would seeke him that way. Furthermore, it is sayd of him that he had this property: that though him selfe was as extremely couerous as might be, yet he bitterly reprinted and vterly misliked them that had his owne humor of auarice. Pompey honors him that he attained vnto dayly, by bearing great charge and ritle in the warres, did greatly trouble Crassus: both because he obtained the honor of triumphe before he came to be Senatour, and also for that the ROMANS commonly called him, Pompey the great, to say, Pompey the great: Crassus being in place on a time when one sayd that lawe Pompey coming, see, Pompey the great is come. And how great I pray ye, sayd he: come fully: howbeit dispayring that he could not attaine to match him in the warres, he gaue him selfe vnto the affairs of the city: and by his paines and industry of pleading, and defending mens causes, by lending of money to them that needed, and by helping of them that sued for any office, or demanded any thing els of the people, he attained in the end to the like estimation and authoritie that Pompey was come vnto, by his many noble victories: And there was one notable thing in either of them. For *Pompey*es fame & power was greater in Rome, when him selfe was absent: and contrary wise when he was there present. Crassus oftentimes was better esteemed than he. Pompey caried a great maiesty and grauity in his manner of life, would not be fennecosen of the people, but kept from repaying to open places, and would speake but in fewe mens causes, and that vnwillingly: all to keepe his fauor and credit whole for him selfe; when he stood in neede to employ the same. ny, because he kept continually in the market place, and was easie to be repayed vnto by any A man that required his helpe, dayly following those exercises, inendoring him selfe to please every man: so that by this easie access and familiaritie, for fauor and good will, he grew to exceede the grauity and maiesty of Pompey. But as for the worthines of their persons, their eloquence of speeche, & their good grace & countenance: in all those (it is sayd) Pompey and Crassus were both alike. And this enuy and emulation neuer caried Crassus away with any open malice and ill will. For though he was fory to see Pompey and Caesar honored above him: yet the worrne of ambition neuer bred malice in him. No, though Caesar when he was taken by pyrates in Asia (as he was once) and being kept prisoner cryed out alowde: O Crassus, what ioy will this be to thee, when thou shalt heare I am in prison. This notwithstanding, they were afterwards good frendes, as it appeareth. For Caesar being ready on a time to depart out of Rome for Prætor into SPAYNE, and not being able to satisfie his creditors that came flocking all at once about him, to stay & arrest his cariage: Crassus in that time of neede forsooke him not, but became his surety for the summe of eight hundred and thirty talentes. In fine, all Rome being deuided into three factions, to wit, of Pompey, Caesar, and Crassus (for as for Cato, the estimation they had of his fidelity was greater, than his authority: and his vertue more wondered at then praised) in so much as the grauest and wisest men tooke parte with Pompey. The liueliest youtthes, and lieliest to runne into desperate attemptes, they followed Caesars hope. Crassus keeping the middelt of the streame, was indifferent to them both, and oftentimes changed his minde and purpose. For in matters of government in the common weale, he neither shewed him selfe a constant friend, nor a dangerous enemy: but for gaine, C was easily made friend or foe. So that in a moment they saw him praise and reprove, defende and condemne, the same lawes, and the same men. His estimation grewe more, through the peoples feare of him: than for any good will they bare him. As appeareth by the aunswere that one Sicinius (a very buisie headed man, and one that troubled euery gouernor of the common weale in his time) made to one that asked him, why he was not busie with Crassus amongest the rest: and howe it happened that he so scaped his handes? O, sayd he, he carries hays on his horne. The manner was then at Rome, if any man had a curst bullocke that would strike with his horne, to winde hays about his heade, that the people might beware of him when they met him. The commocion of fensers, which some call Spartacus warre, their wasting and destroying of ITALIE came upon this occasion. In the cite of CAPUA, there was D one Lentulus Batiatus, that kept a great number of fensers at vnrebated soyles, whom the ROMANES call Gladiatores, whereof the most part were GAVLES and THRACIANS. These men were kept locked vp, not for any fault they had committed, but only for the wickednes of their master that had bought them, and compelled them by force, one to fight with an other at the sharpe. On a time two hundred of them were minded to steale away: but their conspiracy being betrayed, three score and eightene of them entred into a cookes house, and with the spittes and kitching kniues, which there they got, went quite out of the city. By the way they fortuned to meete with cartes laden with fensers weapons, that were brought from CAPUA going to some other city: those they also tooke by force, and arming them selues therewith, got them then to a strong place of situation. Vhere amongst them selues they chose three E Captaines, and one Spartacus a THRACIAN borne (and of those contrymen that go wandering vp and downe with their heards of beastes neuer staying long in a place) they made their Generall. This Spartacus was not onely valliant, but strong made withall, and endued with more wisdom and honesty, than is commonly found in men of his state and condition: and for gility and good vnderstanding, a man more like to the GRECIANS, than any of his contrie men comonly be. It is reported, that when Spartacus came first to Rome to be sold for adalake, there was founde as he slept, a snake wound about his face. His wife seeing it, being his owne contry woman, & a wife woman besides, posselt with Bacchus spirite of diuination: laid plainly that it did signifie, that one day he should be of great power, much dread, and haue very good successe. This same woman prophettess was then with him, and followed him likewise when he fled. Now first they ouerthrew certain souldiers that came out of CAPUA against them, thinking to take them: and stripping them of their armor & weapons, made them glad

A to take the fensers weapons, which they threw away as vile & vnseemly. After that, the ROMANES sent Clodius Prætor against them, with three thousand men. Who besieged them in their forte, situate upon a hill that had a verie steepe and narrow ascent vnto it, and kept the passage vp to them: all the rest of the grounde rounde about it, was nothing but high rockes hanging ouer, & upon the great store of wilde vines. Of them the bondmen cut the stiffest stirrpes, and made thereof ladders, like to these hippe ladders of ropes, of such a length and so strong, that they reached from the toppes of the hill euen to the very bottome: upon those they all came safely downe, sauing one that taried about to throwe downe their armor after them, who afterwards by the same ladder saued him selfe last of all. The ROMANES mistrusting no such matter, these bondmen compassed the hill round, assailed them behinde, & put them B in such a feare with the sodaine onset, as they fled upon it euery man, and so was their campe taken. Thereupon diuers heardmen and shepherds that kept cattell hard by the hill, ioyned with the ROMANES that fled, being strong and hardy men: of which some they armed, and others they vsed as scowtes and spials to discouer. Upon this ouerthrowe was sent an other Capitaine from Rome, called Publius Varinus, against these bondmen: who first ouercame Furinus, the Lieutenant of Varinus in battell, & two thousand of his men: & after that againe they slue one Cosinius, and ouerthrew a great army of his, being ioyned with P. Varinus, as his fellow & counsellor. Spartacus hauing intelligence that Cosinius was bathing him selfe at a place called the salt pittes, had almost taken him tardy, shewing much a do by flight to save him selfe: notwithstanding, Spartacus wanne all his cariage at that time, and hauing him hard in chase, C tooke his whole cape with great slaughter of his men, amongst whom Cosinius selfe was slaine. Spartacus hauing thus now in sundry battells and encounters ouercome the Prætor him selfe, P. Varinus, and at the length taken his fergeauntes from him that carried the axes before him, and his owne horse wherewith he rode him selfe: was growen then to such a power, as he was dreaded of euery man. Yet all this notwithstanding, Spartacus wisely considering his owne force, thinking it not good to tary till he might ouercome the power of the ROMANES: marched with his armie towards the Alpes, taking it their best way after they had passed them ouer, euery man to repayre home to his owne contrie, some into GAVLE, the rest into THRACIA. But his souldiers trusting to their multitude, and perswading them selues to doe great thinges: would not obey him therein, but went againe to spoile and ouerrunne all ITALIA. The Senate of Rome being in a great perplexity, not only for the shame and dishonor that their men should be ouercome in that sorte by slaues and rebells, but also for the feare & daunger all ITALIA stood in besides: sent both the Consulls together, Gellius and Lentulus, as vnto as difficult and dangerous a warre, as any that could haue happened vnto them. This Gellius one of the Consuls, setting sodainly upon a band of the GERMANES, which in abraueure and contempt as it were, disperfed them selues from their campe, put them to the sworde euery man. Lentulus, his colleague and fellow Consul on thother side, compassed in Spartacus round with a great army: but Spartacus charged his Lieutenants that led tharmy, gaue them battell, ouerthrew them, and tooke all their cariage. Hereupon, marching on fill with his army towards the Alpes, Cassius the Prætor, and Gouernor of GAVLE about the Po, came against him with an army of tenne thousand men. Spartacus ioyned battell with him, and ouercame him, Cassius hauing lost a great number of his men, with great difficulty saued him selfe by flying. The Senate hearing of Cassius ouerthrow, were maruelously offended with the Consulls, and sent commaundement vnto them, to leaue of the warre: and thereupon gaue the whole charge thereof vnto Marcus Crassus, who was accompanied in this iorney with many noble young gentlemen of honorable houses, both for that he was maruelously esteemed, & also for the good will they bare him. Now went Crassus from Rome, and camped in ROMANIA, taryng Spartacus comming, who was marching thitherward. He sent Mummius one of his Lieutenants with two legions, to fetch a compass about to intrappe the enemy behinde, straighly commaunding him to follow Spartacus vereward, but in no ease to offer him F skirmish nor battell. But Mummius notwithstanding this straight commaundement, seeing some hope geuen him to doe good, set upon Spartacus, who gaue him the ouerthrowe, slue numbers of his men, and moe had slaine, sauing that certaine of them saued them selues by flight, having only lost their armor and weapons. Hereupon Crassus was grievously offended with Mummus, and receiving his souldiers that fled, gave them other armor and weapons but yet upon surerities, that they should keepe them better thenceforth, than they had before done. Now Crassus of the five hundred that were in the first rankes, and that first fled, them he deuided into fifty times ten, and out of euery one of those he put one of them to death as the lot fell out: reuening againe the auncient discipline of the ROMANES to punish cowardly souldiers, which of long time before had not bene put in vfe. For it is a kinde of death that bringeth open shame withall, and because it is done in the face of the campe, it maketh all the residue afrayed to see the terror of this punishment. Crassus having done execution in this sorte upon his men, led his armie against Spartacus: who still drue backe, vntill he came to the sea side through the contry of the LVCANIANES, where he found in the straight of the Far of MESSINA, certain pyrates shippes of CILICIA, and there determined to goe into SICILIA. And hauing put two thousande men into SICILIE, he then reuiued the warre there of the slaves, which was but in manner newly ended, and lacked small prouocation to beginne it againe. But these pyrates hauing promised Spartacus to passe him ouer thither, & also taken giftes of him, deceived him, & brake their promise. Whereupon Spartacus returning backe againe from the sea side, went & camped within a litle Ile of the RHEGIANS. Crassus comming thither to seeke him, and perceiving that the nature of the place taught him what he should doe: determined with a wall to choke vp the barre or channell entring into this litle Ilande, both to keepe his men occupied from idleness, & his enemies also from vittell. This was a maruelous hard and long peece of worke, notwithstanding. Crassus finished it beyonde all mens expectation in a very shorte time, and brought a trenche from one side of the sea to the other ouerthwart this barre, which was three hundred furlonges in length, fifteene foote broad, and so many in height: and upon the toppe of this treache built a high wall, of a maruelous strength, whereof Spartacus at the first made light accompt, and laughed at it. But when pillage beganne to faile him, & traueling all about the Ile for vittells, perceiving him selfe to be shut in with this wall, and that there was no kinde of vittells to be had within all the compasse of the Ile: he then tooke the vantage of a rough boysterous night, the winde being very great, when it snowed exceedingly, set his men a worke, and filled vp a peece of the trenche (being of a small bredth) with earth, stones, and boughes of trees, whereupon he passed ouer the third parte of his army. Crassus at the first then became afrayed, least Spartacus would haue taken his way directly toward ROME: but he was soone put out of that feare, when he heard they were fallen out together, and that a great number of them rebelling against Spartacus, went & camped by them selues by the lake of LVCANIA, which water by reporte hath this variable property, that at certaine times it chaungeth and becometh very sweete, and at some other times againe so salte and brackish, as no man can drinke it. Crassus going to set upon them, draue them beyond the lake, but could kill no great nuber of them, nor follow them very farre: because Spartacus came presently to the rescue with his army, who stayed the chase. Crassus had writen letters before to the Senate, to call Lucullus home out of THRACIA, & Pompey out of SPAYNE, whereof he then repented him, & made all the possible speede he could to end this warre, before either of them came thither: knowing, that which of them so euer came to his helpe, to him E would the people geue the honor of ending this warre, and not to him selfe. Wherefore he first determined to assaile them that had revolted from Spartacus, and camped by them selues who were led by Caius Caninius, and an other called Cassius. So Crassus sent six thousand foote-men before to take a hill, commanding them to lye as close as they could, that their enemies might not discouer them: and so they did, and couered their morians & headpees as well as might be, from being seene. Neuerthelesse they were discouered by two women doing sacrifice for the safety of their army: and therupon were all in great hafard of casting away, had not Crassus bene, who came in time to their aide, and gaue the enemies the cruelllest battell that euer they fought in all that warre. For there were slaine of the slaues at that battell, twelue thousand and three hundred, of which, two only were found hurt in the backes, and all the rest slaine in the place of their rankes, valiantly fighting where they were set in battell ray. Spartacus after this ouerthrowe, drew towards the mountaines of Petelie, whither Quintus,

A one of Crassus Lieutenantes, and Serofa his treasurer followed him, still skirmishing with his reward all the way: yet in fine, Spartacus turned sodainly upon them, made the ROMANES die that still harried his men in that sorte, and hurt Serofa Crassus treasurer, so fore that he hardly escaped with life. But the vantage they had of the ROMANES by this ouerthrowe, fell out in the ende to the vtter destruction of Spartacus. For his men thereby, being the most of them fugitiue bondmen, grew to such a stowtenes and pride of them selues, that they would no more die from fight, neither yet would they any longer obey their leaders and Captaines: but by the way as they went, they compassed them in with their weapons, and tolde them, that they should go backe againe with them whether they would or not, and be brought through LVCANIA against the ROMANES. All this made for Crassus as he wished, for he had received newes that Pompey was comming, and that diuers were futers for him at ROME to be sent in this iorney, saying, that the last victory of this warre was due to him, and that he would dispatch it at a battell, as soone as he came thither. Crassus therefore seeking occasion to fight, lodged as neere the enemy as he could, and made his men one day cast a trenche, which the bondmen seeking to preuent, came with great fury, and set upon them that wrought. Whereupon fell out a hotte skirmishe, and still supplies came on of either side: so that Spartacus in the ende perceiving he was forced vnto it, put his whole power in battell ray. And when he had set them in order, & that they brought him his horse he was wont to fight on: he drew out his sword, and before them all flue the horse dead in the place, saying: if it be my fortune to winne the field, I know I shall haue horse enow to serue my turne: and if I chaunce to be overcome, then shall I nede no more horses. After that, he flew in among the ROMANES, thinking to attaine to fight with Crassus, but he could not come neere him: yet he flue with his owne handes two ROMANE Centurions that resisted him. In the end, all his men he had about him, forsooke him and fled, so as Spartacus was left alone among his enemies: who valiantly fighting for his life, was cut in peeces. Now though Crassus fortune was very good in this warre, and that he had shewed him selfe a noble and valliant Captaine, venturing his persone in any danger, yet he could not keepe Pompey from the honor of ending this warre: for the slaues that escaped from this last battell where Spartacus was slaine, fell into Pompeys handes, who made an end of all those rebellious rascalls. Pompey hereupon wrote to the Senate, that Crassus had ouercomen the slaues in battell, but that he him selfe had pulled vp that warre euen by the very rootes. After this Pompey made his entrie into ROME, and triumphed for his victorie of Sertorius, and the conquest of SPAYNE. Crassus also sued not for the great triumphe, neither thought he the small Ouation triumphe a foote, which they graunted him, any honor vnto him, for ouercomming a few fugitiue bondmen. But for this small triumphe, whereby it was called Quatio, how much it differeth from the great triumphe: see Marcellus life, where we haue at large discouered thereof. Now Pompey being called to be Consull: Crassus, though he stood in good hope to be chosen Consull with him, did yet notwithstanding pray his friendship and furtherance. Pompey was very willing to helpe him, and was euer desirous to make Crassus beholding to him: whereupon he delt friendly for him, and spake openly in thassembly of the city, that he would no lesse thanke the people to appoint Crassus his companion & fellow Consull with him, then for making him selfe Consull. But notwithstanding they were both Consulls together in office, their friendship held not, but were euer at iarre, & the one against the other. So by meanes of their disagreement, they passed all the time of their Consulshippe, without any memorable act done: sauing that Crassus made a great sacrifice to Heracles, and kept an open feast for the people of ROME of a thousande tables, and gaue to euery citizen coine to finde him three monethes. But in the ende of their Consulship, at a common counsell holden, there was a knight of ROME called Onatius Aurelius: (a man not greatly knownen, for that he had no dealings in the state, and kept most in the contry) who gettinge vp to the pulpit for orations, tolde the people what a vision he had seene in his dreame. Iupiter, said he, appearing to me this night, willed me to tell you openly, that ye should not put Crassus & Pompey out of their office, before they were reconciled together. He had no sooner spoken the wordes, but the people commanded them to be frendes. Pompey sate still, and sayd neuer a word to it. But Crassus rose, and tooke Pompey by the hand, & turning him to the people, told them alowde my Lordes of ROME, I do nothing vnworthy of my selfe, to seeke Pompey's friendship and fauor first, since you your selues haue called him the great, before he had any heere vpon his face, & that ye gaue him the honor of triumphe, before he was Senatour. And this is all that Crassus did of any accompt in his Consulship. When he was Censor also, he passed it ouer without any acte done. For he reformed not the Senate, quistered not the men of warre, norooke any view or estimate of the peoples goodes: although Lucius Catulus was his colleague and fellowe Censor, as gentle a persone as any of that time that liued in ROME. Now Crassus at the first entry into his office of Censor, going about a cruell and violent act, to bring Egypt to pay tribute to the ROMANES, Catulus did stowly withstand him: wherby disension falling out betwene them, they both did willingly resigne their office. In that great conspiracie of Catiline, which in manner ouerthrew the whole state and common wealth of ROME, Crassus was had in some ialousie and mistrust: because there was one of the confederats that named him for one of them, howbeit they gaue no credit vnto him. Yet Cicero in an oration of his, doth plainly accuse Crassus & Caesar, as confederats with Catiline: howbeit this oration came not forth till they were both dead. And in the oration he made also, when his office and authority of Consul ceased, he sayd: that Crassus came one night to him, & shewed him a letter touching Catiline, certainly confirming the conspiracy then in examination. For which cause Crassus euer after hated him: and that he did not openly reuenge it, the let was by meane of his sonne. For Publius Crassus much fauoring eloquence, and beinge geuen to his booke, bare great good will vnto Cicero: in such sorte, that upon his banishment he put on changed garments as Cicero did, and procured many other youtnes to do the like also, and in fine, perswaded his father to become his friend. Caesar now returning to ROME from the province he had in government, intended to sue for the Consulship: and perceiving that Pompey & Crassus were againe at a iarre, thought thus with him selfe, that to make the one of them his friend to further his sute, he should but procure thother his enemy: and minding therefore to attaine his desire with the fauor of them both, sought first the meanes to make the frendes, & perswaded with them, that by their controuersie thone seeking thothers vndoing, they did thereby but make Cicero, Catulus, and Cato, of the greater authority, who of them selues were of no power, if they two ioynd in friendship together: for making both their frendes and factions one, they might rule the state and common wealth euen as they would. Caesar hauing by his perswasion reconciled Crassus and Pompey, ioyning their three powers in one, made them selues vnuincible, which afterwards turned to the destruction of the people and Senate of ROME. For he made them not only greater than they were before, the one by thothers meanes: but him selfe also of great power through them. For when they beganne to fauor Caesar, he was straight chosen Consul without any deniall: and so behaued him selfe in the Consulship, that at the length they gaue him charge of great armies, and then sent him to gouerne the GAVLES: which was, as a man may say, euen them selues to put him into the castle that should kepe all the citie in subiection: imagining that they two should make spoyle and good boory of the rest, sithence they had procured him such a government. Now for Pompey, the cause that made him commit this error was nothing els, but his extreme ambition. But as for Crassus, besides his old vice of couetousnes rooted in him, he added to that a newe avarice and desire of triumphes and victories, which Caesars fame for prowes and noble actes in warres did throughly kindell in him, that he being otherwise his better in all things, might not yet in that be his inferior: which furie tooke such holde as it neuer left him, till it brought him vnto an infamous end, and the common wealth to great misery. Thus Caesar being come out of his province of GAVLE vnto LVCA, diuers ROMANES went thither to see him, and among other, Pompey and Crassus. They hauing talked with him in secret, agreed among them to deuise to haue the whole power of ROME in their handes: so that Caesar should kepe his armie together, and Crassus and Pompey should take other provinces and armies to them. Now to attaine to this, they had no way but one: that Pompey and Crassus should againe sue the second time to be Consuls, and that Caesars frendes at ROME should stand with them for it, sending also a sufficient number of his souldiers to be there at the day of choosing the Consuls. Thereupon Pompey and Crassus returned to ROME at that ende, but not without suspicion of their

A their practise: for there ranne a rumor in the citie, that their meeting of Caesar in LVCA, was for no good intent. Whereupon, Marcellinus and Domitius asked Pompey in open Senate, if he meant to make sute to be Consul. Pompey answered them: peraduenture he did, peraduenture he did not. They asking him againe the same question: he answered, he would sue for the good men, not for the euill. Pompeys answers were thought very prowde & hawty. Howbeit Crassus answered more modestly, that if he saw it necessary for the common wealth, he would sue to be Consul: if not, that he would not stand for it. Vpon these words, some were so bold to make sute for the Consulship, as Domitius among other. But afterwards Pompey and Crassus standing openly for it, all the rest left of their sute for feare of them, Domitius only excepted: whom Cato so prayed and intreated, as his kinsman and friend, that he made him to seeke it. For he perswaded him, that it was to fight for the defence of their libertie, and how that it was not the Consulshippe Crassus and Pompey looked after, but that they went about to bring in a tyranny: & that they sued not for the office, but to get such provinces and armies into their handes as they desired, vnder colour and countenance of the Consulship. Cato ringing these words into their eares, & beleuing it certainly to be true as he sayd, brought Domitius as it were by force into the market place, where many honest men ioynd with this, because they wondred what the matter ment that these two noble men should sue the second time to be Consuls, and why they made sute to be ioynd together, and not to haue any other with them, considering there were so many other worthy men, meete to be companion with either of them both in that office. Pompey fearing he should be preuented of his purpose, fell to commit great outrage and violence. As amongst other, when the day came to chooe the Consuls, Domitius going early in the morning before day, accompanied with his frendes to the place where the electi should be: his man that caried the torch before him was slaine, by some whom Pompey had layed in waite, & many of his companie hurt, and among others, Cato. And hauing thus dispersed them, he beset a house rounde about whether they fled for succour, and inclosed them there, vntill they were both chosen Consuls together. Shortly after they came with force to the pulpit for orations, and draue Cato out of the market place, & slue some of them that resisted & would not flye. They also then prolonged Caesars government of the GAVLES for five yeeres more, and procured for them selues by decrees of the people, the contries of SYRIA and SPAYNE. Again, when they drew loutes together, SYRIA fell to Crassus, and SPAYNE to Pompey. Euery man was glad of their fortune. For the people on the one side were loth Pompey should goe farre from ROME: & him selfe also louing his wife well, was glad he had occasion to be so neere her, that he might remaine the most of his time at ROME. But Crassus of all other reioyced most at his happe, that he should goe into SYRIA: and it appeared plainly that he thought it was the happiest turne that euer came to him, for he would euer be talking of the iorney, were he in neuer so great or strange company. Furthermore, being among his frendes and familiars; he would geue out such fonde boastes of it, as no young man could haue made greater vauntes: which was cleane contrary to his yeres and nature, hauing liued all his life time as modestly, and with as small ostentacion as any man liuing. But then forgetting him selfe too much had such fond conceites in his head, as he not E only hoped after the conquest of SYRIA, and of the PARTHIANS, but flattered him selfe that the world should see all that Lucullus had done against king Tigranes, and Pompey against king Artabazanes, were but trifles (as a man would say) to that he intended. For he looked to conquer the BACTRIANS, the INDIANS, and the great Ocean sea toward the East, though in the decree passed by the people there was no mention made of any warres against the PARTHIANS. Nowe euery man sawe Crassus ambition and greedy desire of honor: in much as Caesar selfe wrote vnto Crassus out of GAVLE, commending his noble intent and forwardnes, and wished him to goe thorow therewith. But Attius one of the Tribunes being bent against Crassus to withstand his departure: (hauing diuers other confederats with him to further his purpose, who much misliked that any man of a brauery and lustines should make warre with any nation or people that had no way offended the ROMANES: but were their frendes and confederates) Crassus fearing this conspiracy, prayed Pompey to assist and accompany him out of the citie, because he was of great authority and much reuerenced of the people, as it appeared then.

Crassus should not be suspected.

Pompey made him selfe and Crassus Consuls by force.

Crassus had the government of Syria.

Attius the Tribune, against Crassus departure.

For, though multitudes of people were gathered together of purpose to let Crassus of his due parture, and to crie out upon him: yet when they saw Pompey goe before him, with a pleasant smiling countenance, they quieted their selues, and made a lane for them, suffering them to passe on, and sayd nothing. This notwithstanding, Atticus the Tribune stepped before them, and commaunded Crassus he should not departe the city, with great protestations if he did the contrary. But perceiuing Crassus still held on his way notwithstanding, he commaunded then one of the officers to lay hold of him, & to arrest him: howbeit the other Tribunes would not suffer the officer to doe it. So the fergeaunt dismissed Crassus. Then Atticus running towards the gate of the city, got a chafingdish with coles, & set it in the midst of the streete. When Crassus came against it, he cast in certaine perfumes, and made sprincklinges over it, pronouncing horrible curses, and calling upon terrible and straunge names of goddes. The Ro-manes say that those manner of curses are very auncient, but yet very secret, and of so great force: as he that is once cursed with that curse can neuer escape it, nor he that vseth it dothe neuer prosper after it. And therefore fewemen doe vfe it, and neuer but upon vrgent occasion.
 But then they much reprobued Atticus, for vsing of these dreadfull ceremonies and extreme curses, which were much hurtfull to the common weale, although he for his contries sake had thus cursed Crassus. Crassus settinge forward notwithstandinge, sayled on, and arriued at BRVNDISIUM, when winter stormes had not left the seas, and he had lost many of his shippes howbeit he landed his army, and marched through the contry of GALATIA. There he found king Deiotarus, a very old man and yet building a new city: and to taunte him pretily, sayd va-to him. What, O king, beginne you to builde now in the afternone? To whom the king of the GALATIANS againe smiling made aunswere. And truly Syr Capitaine, you goe not very earely (me thinkes) to make warre with the PARTHIANS. For in deede Crassus was three score and vppward, and yet his face made him seeme elder then he was. But to our story againe. Crassus beinge comen into the contry, had as good lucke as he looked for: for he easily built a bridge upon the riuier of Euphrates, and passed his armie ouer it without any let or trouble. So entering into MESOPOTAMIA, receiued many cities, that of good will yellected them selues vnto him. Howbeit there was one city called ZENODOTIA, whereof Apollonius was tyrant, where Crassus lost a hundred of his men: thereupon he brought his whole armie thither, tooke by force, sacked their goodes, and sold the prisoners by the drumme. The GREEKES called this citie ZENODOTIA, and for winning of the same Crassus suffered his men to call him Impera-tor, to say, soueraigne Capitaine: which turned to his shame and reproach, and made him to be thought of a bafe minde, as one that had small hope to attaine to great thinges, making such reckoning of so small a trifle. Thus when he had bestowed seuen thousand of his footmen in garrison, in those cities that had yellected vnto him, and about a thousand horsemen returned backe to winter in SYRIA. Thither came his sonne Publius Crassus to him out of GAYLE from Iulius Caesar, who had geuen him such honors, as Generall of Rome did vie to goe to valliant souldiers for reward of their good seruice: and brought vnto his father a thousand men of armes, all choise men. This me thinkes was the greatest fault Crassus committed in all his enterprise of that warre. For when he should presently haue gone on still, and entred into BABYLON and SELEVCIA, (cities that were euer enemies vnto the PARTHIANS) he he tracted time, & gaue them leasure to prepare to encounter his force when he should come against them. Againe they found great fault with him for spending of his time when he lay in SYRIA, seeming rather to leade a marchauntes life, than a chieftaines. For he neuer saw his army, nor trained them out to any marshall exercise, but fell to counting the reuenue of the cities, and was many dayes busily occupied weying of the gold and siluer in the temple of the goddesse Hierapolis. And worse then that he sent to the people, princes, and cities about him, to furnishe him with a certaine number of men of warre, and then he would discharge them for a summe of money. All these thinges made him to be both ill spoken of, & despised of euery body. The first token of this ill lucke that happened to him, came from this goddesse Hierapolis, whom some suppose to be Venus, other say Iuno, and others, that she is the mother and chiefe cause that giueth beginning of moisture to euery thing that commeth forth and hath a being, and taught men the original cause also of euery good thing. For as Crassus the father, & sonne

A both, were comming out of the temple: Crassus the younger fell first on his face, and the father afterwards upon his sonne. Likewise as he was gathering his garnisons together, & calling them out of the cities into the fieldes, there came Ambassadors vnto him from Asa-ces, kinge of the PARTHIANS: who deliuered him their message in fewe wordes, and tolde him, that if this army he brought came from the ROMANES to make warre with their master, then that he would haue no peace nor friendship with them, but would make mortall warres against them. Further, if it were (as he had heard say) that Crassus against the peoples mindes of ROMES, for his owne couetous desire, and peculiar profit was come in a iolity to make warre with the PARTHIANS, and to inuade their contry: then in that respect Asaces would deale more fauorably, in consideration of Crassus yeares, and was contented also to suffer his men to depart with life and goods, whom he tooke rather to be in prison, than in garrison within his cities. Thereto Crassus coragiously aunswere, that he would make them aunswere in the city of SELEVCIA. Therewith Vagises, one of the eldest Ambassadors fell a laughing, and shewing Crassus the palme of his hand, told him thus: heare will sooner grow in the palme of my hand, Crassus, than you will come to SELEVCIA. In this sorte the Ambassadors tooke their leaue of Crassus, and returned to their kinge Hyrodes, telling him he was to prepare for warre. In the meane space, certaine of Crassus souldiers whom he had left in garrison in the cities of ME-SOPOTAMIA, hauing escaped maruelous daungerously and with great difficulty: brought him newes of importance, hauing them selues seene the wonderfull great campe of the enemy & their manner of fight in the assaultes they made to the cities where they lay in garrison. And as it falleth out commonly among men escaped from any danger making thinges more fearefull and dangerous than they be in deede: they reported that it was vnpossible by syinge to saue them selues, if they did followe in chafe: neither to ouertake them also, if they fled.
 And further, that they had such kinde of arrowes as would flie swifter, than a mans eye could discerne them, and would perce through any thing they hit, before a man could tell who shot them. Besides, for the horsemen weapons they vsed, that they were such, as no armor could possibly hold out: and their armors on thother side made of such a temper and metall, as no force of any thing could pearce them thorow. The ROMANES hearing these newes, fell from their former stoutnes and corage, being borne in hande before, that the PARTHIANS differed nothing at all from the ARMENIANS and CAPPADOCIANS, whom Lucillus had overcome and spoyled so oft, that he was weary withall: and they had already made accompt, that their greatest paynes in this warre, was but the tediousnes of the iorney they had to make, and the trouble they should haue to follow those men that would not abide them. But then contrarie to expectation, they looked to come to strokes, and to be lustely fought withall. Hereupon, diuers Captaines and head officers that had charge in the army (among whom Crassus the tresorer was one) aduised Crassus to stay, and to deliberate in counsell to knowe whether he were best to goe on, or to remaine where he was. The soothsayers them selues did partly let Crassus vnderstand, that the goddes shewed no good tokens in all their sacrifices, and were hardly to be pacified. But Crassus gaue no eare to them, neither would heare any other that told him as much, but only listned to them that counselled him to make hast. Yet Crassus chieft com-E forte and incouragement, was of Artabazes, king of ARMENIA, who came to his campe with sixe thousand horse, which were but only the kinges cornet and garde. Againe he promised him other tenne thousand horsemen all armed and barbed, and thirty thousand footmen which he kept continually in pay, and counselled Crassus to enter the PARTHIANS contrie vpon ARMENIANS side: because his campe shoulde not onely haue plenty of vittells, which he would send him out of his contry, but for that he should also march in more safety, hauing a contrie full of mountaines and woddes before him very ill for horsemen, which was the only strength and force of the PARTHIANS. Crassus coldly thanked Artabazes for his good will, & all his noble offer of aide: yet told him he would take his iorney through MESOPOTAMIA, where he had left many good souldiers of the ROMANES. And thus departed the king of AR-MENIA from him. But now as Crassus was passing his army upon the bridge he had made ouer the riuier of Euphrates, there fel out sodaine strange & terrible crackes of thuder, with fearefull flashes of lightning full in the souldiers faces: moreover, out of a great blacke clowde came a wonderfull storme and tempest of winde upon the bridge, that the maruelous force thereof ouerthrew a great parte of the bridge, and caried it quite away. Besides all this, the place where he appointed to lodge, was twise stricken with two great thunder clappes. One of his great horse in like case, being brauely furnished and set out, tooke the bit in his teeth, and leapt into the riuer with his ryder on his backe, who were both drowned; and neuer seene after. They say also, that the first Eagle & ensigne that was to be taken vp when they marched, turned backe of it selfe, without any handes layed vpon it. Further it fortuned that as they were distributing the vittells vnto the souldiers, after they had all passed ouer the bridge, the first thing that was geuen them, was salte, and water lintels, which the ROMANES take for a token of death and mourning, because they vse it at the funeralles of the deade. After all this, when Crassus was exhorting his souldiers, a worde escaped his mouth that troubled the armie maruelously. For he told them that he had broken the bridge which he had made ouer the riuer of Euphrates, of purpose, because there should not a man of them returne backe againe. Where in deede when he had seene that they tooke this word in ill parte, he should haue called it in againe, or haue declared his meaning, seeing his men so amazed thereat: but he made light of it, he was so willfull. In the ende he made ordinarie sacrifice for the purging of his army: and when the Soothsayer gaue him the intrells of the beast that was sacrificed, they fell out of his handes. Crassus perceiving that the standers by were troubled withall, fell a laughing, and told them, you see what age is: yett shall you not see my sword fall out of my hande. So hauing ended his sacrifice, he beganne to marche forward into the contrie by the riuers side, with seuen legions of footemen, and litle lacke of foure thousand horse, and in maner many shot and slinges lightly armed. There returned to him certaine of his skoutes that had viewed the contrie, and told him there was not an enemy to be seene in the field: howbeit that they had founde the tracke of a maruelous number of horse, which seemed as they were returned backe. Then Crassus first of all beganne to hope well: and his souldiers also, they fell to despise the PARTHIANS, thinking certainly that they would not come to battell with them. Yet Crassus his treasurer euer perswaded him the contrary, and thought it better for him to refresh his army a litle in one of the cities where he had his garrison, vntill such time as he heard more certaine newes of the enemies: or else that he would march directly towards Seleucia by the riuers side, which lay fit for him to vitell him selfe easily by boates that would alwayes follow his campe, & should be sure besides that the enemies could not enuiron him behinde, so that hauing no way to set upon the but before, they should haue none aduantage of them. Crassus going about then to consult of the matter, there came one Ariamnes vnto him, a Captaine of the ARABIANS, a fine subtil fellow, which was the greatest mischief and euill, that fortune could send to Crassus at that present time, to bring him to vtter ruine and destruction. For there were some of Crassus souldiers that had serued Pompey before in that contrie, who knew him very well, and remembered that Pompey had done him great pleasures: whereupon they thought that he bare great good will to the ROMANES. But Ariamnes had bene labored at that time by the king of PARTHIAS Captaines, & was wonne by them to deceiue Crassus, and to intice him all he could, to drawe him from the riuer and the woddy contrie, & to bring him into the plaine felde, where they might compass him in with their horsemen: for they ment nothing lesse than to fight with the ROMANES at the swordes point. This barbarous Captaine Ariamnes comming to Crassus, did highly praise and commend Pompey, as his good Lord and benefactor (for he was an excellent spoken man) and extolled Crassus army, reproving him that he came so slowly forward, tracting time in that sorte as he did, preparing him selfe as though he had neede of armor and weapon, and not of feete and handes swift & ready against the enemies: who (for the chiefe of them) had of long time occupied them selues to stie with their best moueables, towards the desertes of SCYTHIA & HYRCANIA. Therefore if you determine (sayd he) to fight, it were good you made hast to meete them, before the king haue gathered all his power together. For nowe you haue but Surenas and Sillaces, two of his Lieutenantes against you, whom he hath sent before to stay you that you followe him not. For the king him selfe, be bold, he meaneth not to trouble you. But he lyed in all. For king Hyrodes had deuised his army in two partes at the first, whereof him selfe tooke the one, and went

A went to spoyle the realme of ARMENIA, to be reuenged of king Artabazes: and with the other he sent Surenas against the ROMANES, not for any contempt he had of Crassus (for it was not likely he would disdain to come to battell with him, being one of the chiefe noble men of ROMES, and to thinke it more honorable to make warre with king Artabazes in ARMENIA) but I thinke rather he did it of purpose to auoide the greater danger, and to keepe farre off, that he might with safetie see what would happen, and therefore sent Surenas before to halard battell, and to turtie the ROMANES backe againe. For Surenas was no meane man, but the second person of PARTHIA next vnto the king: in riches, reputation, valure, and experience in warres, the chiefe of this time among all the PARTHIANS; and for execution, no man like him. Surenas, when he did but remoue into the contrie only with his household, had a thousand camels to carry his sumpters, and two hundred coches of Curisians, a thousand men of armes armed at all peeces, and as many more besides lightly armed: so that his whole traine & court made about ten thousand horse. Further, by the tenure of that land he had by succession from his ancestors, his office was at the first proclaiming of any king, to put the roial crowne or diadem upon the kings head. Moreouer, he had restored king Hyrodes that then reigned, to his crowne, who had bene before driuen out of his realme: and had wonne him also the great city of Seleucia, him selfe being the first man that scaled the walls, and ouerthrew them with his owne handes that resisted him. And though he was vnder thirtie yeares of age, yet they counted him a wise man, as well for his counsell, as his experience, which were the meanes whereby he ouercame Crassus. Who through his rashnes and folly at the first, and afterwards for very feare and timorousnes, which his misfortune had brought him vnto, was easie to be taken and intrapped, by any policy or deceit. Now this barbarous Captaine Ariamnes hauing then brought Crassus to beleue all that he sayd, and drawn him by perswasion from the riuer of Euphrates, vnto a goodly plaine contrie, meeting at the first with very good way, but after with very ill, because they entred into sandes where their feete soncke deepe, and into desert fields where was neither tree nor water, nor any end of them that they could deeme by eye, so that not only extreame thirst, and miserable way maruelously amazed the ROMANES, but the discomfort of the eye also, when they could see nothing to stay their sight vpon: that, above all the rest, wrought their extreame trouble. For, neither farre nor nere any sight of tree, riuer, brooke, mountaine, grasse, or greene herbe appeared within their view, but in troth an endlesse sea of desert sandes on euerie side, rounde about their campe. Then beganne they to suspect that they were betrayed. Againe, when newes came that Artabazes king of ARMENIA, was kept in his contrie with a great warre king Hyrodes made upon him, which kept him that he could not according to his promise come to aide him, yet that he wished him to draw towards ARMENIA, that both their armies being ioyned together they might the better fight with king Hyrodes, if not, that he would alwayes keepe the woddy contrie, marching in those vallies and places where his horsemen might be safe, and about the mountaines: Crassus was so willfull, as he would wryte no aunswere to it, but angrily told the messenger, that he had no leasure then to harken to the ARMENIANS, but that afterwards he would be reuenged well enough of Artabazes treason. Crassus his treasurer was much offended with Crassus for this answer: howbeit perceiving he could doe no good with him, and that he tooke euery thing in euill parte, he sayd vnto him, he would tell him no more. Notwithstanding, taking Ariamnes this Captaine of the ARABIANS a side, he rebuked him roundly, and sayd: O thou wretche, what cursed deuil hath brought thee to vs, and how cunningly hast thou bewitched & charmed Crassus: that thou hast made him bring his army into this endlesse desert, and to trace this way fitter for an ARABIAN Captaine of theeuers, than for a Generall and Consul of the ROMANES? Ariamnes being crafty & subtil, speaking gently vnto Crassus, did comforte him, and prayed him to haue patience, and going and comming by the bandes, seeming to helpe the souldiers, he tolde them merily: O my fellowes, I beleue you thinke to marche through the contrie of Naples, and looke to meete with your pleasure springs, goodly groues of wodde, F your naturall bathes, and the good innes round about to refresh the you, and doe not remember that you passe through the desertes of ARABIA & ASSYRIA. And thus did this barbarous Captaine entertaine the ROMANES a while: but afterwards he dislodged betimes, before he was openly known for a traitor, and yet not without Crassus priuiey, whom he bare in hand, that he would goe for some broyle and tumult in the enemies campe. It is reported that Crassus the very same day came out of his tent not in his coate armor, of scarlet, (as the manner was of the ROMANES Generalls) but in a blacke coate: howbeit, remembering him selfe, he straight chaunged it againe. It is sayd moreouer, that the ensigne bearers when they should marche way, had much a doe to plucke their ensignes out of the ground, they stucke so fast. But Crassus scoffing at the matter, hastened them the more to marche forward, compelling the footemen to goe as fast as the horsemen, till a fewe of their skowtes came in, whom they had sent to discouer: who brought newes howe the enemies had slaine their fellows, and what a doe they had them selues to scape with life, and that they were a maruelous great army, & well appointed to geue them battell. This newes made all the campe aftrayed, but Crassus selfe more than the rest, so as he beganne to set his men in battell ray, being for haile in manner besides him selfe. At the first following Crassus minde, he set his rankes wide, casting his souldiers into a square battell, a good way a fonder one from an other, bicause he would take in as much of the plaine as he coulde, to keepe the enemies from compassing them in, and so deuoided the horsemen into the winges. Yet afterwards he chaunged his minde againe, and straitned the battell of his footemen, facioning it like a bricke, more long than broad, making a front, and shewing their faces euery way. For there were twelve cohorts or ensignes imbatelled on either side, & by euery cohorte a company of horse, bicause there should be no place left without aide of horsemen, and that all his battell should be a like defended. Then he gaue Crassus the leading of one wing, his sonne Publius Crassus the other, and him selfe led the battell in the middest. In this order they marched forward, till they came to a litle brooke called Ballidus, where there was no great store of water, but yet happily lighted on for the souldiers, for the great thirst and extreame heate they had abidden all that painfull way, where they had met with no water before. There the most parte of Crassus Captaines thought best to campe all night, that they might in the meane time finde meanes to knowe their enemies what number they were, and how they were armed, that they might fight with them in the morning. But Crassus yielding to his sonnes and his horsemens perswasion, who intreated him to marche on with his army, and to set upon the enemy presently: commaunded, that such as would eate, should eate standing, keeping their rankes. Yet on the sodaine, before this commaundement could runne through the whole army, he commaunded them againe to marche, not fayer and softly as when they go to geue battell, but with speede, till they spied the enemies, who seemed not to the ROMANES at the first to be so great a number, neither so brauelie armed as they thought they had bene. For, concerning their great number, Surenas had of purpose hid them, with certaine troups he sent before: and to hyde their bright armors, he had cast clothes and beastes skinned upon them. But when both the armies approached neere thone to thother, & that the signe to geue charge was lift vp in the ayer: first they filled the felde with a dreadfull noyse to heare. For the PARTHIANS doe not encourage their men to fight with the sounde of a horne, neither with trumpets nor howboyes, but with great kettle drommes hollow within, & about them they hang litle bells & copper rings, and with them they all make a noyse euery where together, and it is like a dead sounde, mingled as it were with the braying or bellowing of a wild beast, & a fearefull noyse as if it thundered, knowing that hearing is one of the senses that soonest moueth the harte & spirite of any man, & maketh him soonest besides him selfe. The ROMANES being put in feare with this dead sounde, the PARTHIANS straight threw the clothes & couerings from them that hid their armor, & then shewed their bright helmets and curaces of Margian tempered Steele, that glared like fire, & their horses barbed with Steele and copper. And Surenas also, General of the PARTHIANS, who was as goodly a personage, and as valliant, as any other in all his host, though his beawtie somewhat effeminate, in iudgement shewed small likelyhoode of any such corage: for he painted his face, and ware his heare after the facion of the MEDES, contrary to the manner of the PARTHIANS, who let their heare grow after the facion of the TARTARES, without combing or tricking of them, to appeare more terrible to their enemies. The PARTHIANS at the first thought to haue set upon the ROMANES with their pykes, to see if they could breake their first rankes. But when they drew neere, and

A sweete deper of the ROMANES battell standing close together, firmly keeping their rankes: then they gaue backe, making as though they fled, & dispersed them selues. But the ROMANES were not when they found it contrary, & that it was but a deuise to enturonne them on euery side. Whereupon Crassus commaunded his thor and light armed men to assaile them, which they did: but they went not farre, they were so beaten in with arrowes, and driven so neere to their fore, of his armed men. And this was the first beginning that both feared and moubled the ROMANES: when they saw the vehemency and great force of the enemies shottes, which brake their armors, and ranne thorpe any thing they hit, were it neuer so hard or soft. The PARTHIANS thus still drawing backe, thore all together on euery side, as a fore battell: but at last enturonne for the battell of the ROMANES, too neere together, as if they would they could not misse the killing of some. These bowmen drew a great strength, & had bigge strong bowes, which sent the arrowes from them with a wonderful force. The ROMANES by means of these bowes were in hard state. For if they kept their rankes, they were grievously wounded: if they left them, and sought to run upon the PARTHIANS to fight at hand, with them, they saw they would do them but litle hurt, and yet were very likely to take the greater harme them selues. For yea fast as the ROMANES came upon them, so fast did the PARTHIANS still draw from them, and yet in flying continued still their shooting: which no nation but the SCYTHIANS could better doe than they, being a matter in deede most greatly to their aduantage. For by their flight they best doe saue them selues, and fighting still, they thereby shunne the shame of that their flying. The ROMANES still defended them selues, and held it out, so long as they had any hope that the PARTHIANS would leaue fighting, when they had spent their arrowes, or would ioyne battell with them. But after they vnderstood that there were a great number of camels laden with quiers full of arrowes: where the first that had bestowed their arrowes fetched about to take new quiers: then Crassus seeing no end of their shotte, began to faint, and sent to Publius his sonne, willing him in any cale to charge upon the enemies, and to geue an onser, before they were compassed in on euery side. For it was on Publius side, that one of the winges of the enemies battell was neereft vnto them, and where they rode vp and downe to compass them behinde. Whereupon Crassus sonne taking thirtene hundred horsemen with him (of the which, a thowfand were of the men of armes whom Julius Caesar sent) & five hundred shot, with eight ensignes of footemen hauing targets, most neere to the place, where D him selfe then was: he put them out in bredth, that whelming about they might geue a charge vpon them that rode vp & downe. But they seeing him comming, turned straight their horse and fled, either bicause they met in a marriage, or else of purpose to beguile this young Crassus, intising him thereby as farre from his father as they could. Publius Crassus seeing them flye, tried out, these men will not abide vs, and so spurred on for life after them: so did Celsus and Megabates with him (the one a Senator of Rome a very eloquent man, the other a stout coragious valliant man of warre) both of them Crassus well appoynted frendes, and in manner of his owne yeares. Now the horsemen of the ROMANES being trained out thus to the chafe, their horsemen also would not abide behinde, nor shew them selues to haue lesse hope, ioy, and corage, then their horsemen had. For they thought all had bene won, and that there was no more to do, but to follow the chafe: till they were gone farre from the army, and then they found the deceit. For the horsemen that fled before them, sodainly turned againe, and a number of others besides came and set vpon them. Whereupon they stayed, thinking that the enemies perceiuing they were so few, would come and fight with them hand to hand. Howbeit they set out against them their men at armes with their barbed horse, & made their light horsemen whele rounde about them, keeping no order at all: who galloping vp and downe the plaine, whurled vp the sand hilles from the bottoome with their horse feet, which raised such a wonderfull dust, that the ROMANES could scarce see or speake one to another. For they being shut vp into a litle roome, and standing close one to another, were sore wounded with the PARTHIANS arrowes, and died of a cruell lingering death, crying out for anguish and paine they felt: and turning and tormenting them selues upon the sande, they brake the arrowes sticking in them. Againe, struing by force to plucke out the forked arrowe heades, that had peared farre into their bodies through their vaines & sinewes: thereby they opened their woundes wider, and so cast them selues away. Many of them dyed thus miserably: cryed: and such as dyed not, were not able to defend them selues. Then when Publius Crassus prayed and besought them to charge the men at armes with their barbed horse, they showed him their handes fast nailed to their targets with arrowes, & their feete likewise shot through and nailed to the ground: so as they could neither flee, nor yet defende themselves. Therupon him selfe incouraging his horsemen, went and gaue a charge, and did valiantly set upon the enemies, but it was with too great disadvantage, both for offence, and also for defence. For him selfe and his men with weake & light stances, brake upon them that were armed with all manner of steels, or stiffe leather iackets. And the *PARTHIAN*s in contrary manner with mightie strong pykes gaue charge upon these GAVLES, which were either varnished, or else but lightly armed. Yet those were they in whom Crassus most trusted, having done wonderfull featues of warre with them. For they receiued the *PARTHIAN*s pykes in their handes, &ooke them about the middells, and threw them of their horse, where they lay on the ground, and could not stirre for the weight of their harness: and there were diuers of them also that lightning from their horse, lay vnder their enemies horse bellies, & thrust their swordes into them. Their horse flinging & bounding in the ayer for very paine threw their maisters vnder feete, & their enemies ore upon an other, & in the end fell dead among them. Moreover, extreme heat and thirst did maruelously comber the GAVLES, who were fied to abide neither of both: and the most parte of their horse were laine, charging with al their power upon the men at armes of the *PARTHIAN*s, and so ranne them selues in upon the pointes of their pykes. At the length, they were driuen to retire towards their footemen, & Publius Crassus among them, who was very ill by reason of the woundes he had receiued. And seeing a sand hill by chance not farre from them, they went thither, & setting their horse in the middelt of it, compassed it in round with their targets, thinking by this meanes to couer and defende them selues the better from the barbarous people: howbeit they founde it contrary. For the contry being plaine, they in the foremost rankes did somewhat couer them behinde, but they that were behinde, standing hieer than they that stood foremost (by reason of the nature of the hill that was hieest in the middelt) could by no meanes saue them selues, but were all hurt alike, as well the one as the other, bewailing their owne miserie and misfortune, that must needs dye without reuenge, or declaration of their valiancy. At that present time there were two *GRECIAN*s about Publius Crassus, Hieronymus, and Nicomachus, who dwelt in those quarters, in the city of CARRA: they both counselled P. Crassus to steale away with them, and to flee to a city called ISCHEUS, that was not farre from thence; andooke the *ROMAN*s parte. But P. answered them, that there was no death so cruell as could make him forsake them, that dyed for his sake. When he had so sayd, wishing them to saue them selues, he embraced them, &ooke his leaue of them and being very sore hurt with the shot of an arrow through one of his handes, commanded one of his gentlemen to thrust him through with a sword, & so turned his side to him for the purpose. It is reported Cenforinus did the like. But Megabacchus slue him selfe with his owne handes, and so did the most parte of the gentlemen that were of that company. And for those that were left alieue, the *PARTHIAN*s got vpon the sand hill, and fighting with them, thrust them through with their speares and pykes, andooke but slue hundred prisoners. After that, they strake of Publius Crassus head, & therupon returned straight to set upon his father Crassus, who was then in this state. Crassus the father, after he had willed his sonne to charge the enemies, and that one brought him word he had broken them, & pursued the chase: & perceiving also that they that remained in their great battell, did not prease upon him so neere as they did before, because that a great number of them were gone after the other for rescue: he began to be liuely againe, and keeping his men close, rettyred with them the best he could by a hills side, looking euer that his sonne would not be long before that he returned from the chase. But Publius seeing him selfe in daunger, had sent diuers messengers to his father, to aduertise him of his distresse, whom the *PARTHIAN*s intercepted and slue by the way: and the last messengers he sent, escaping very hardly, brought Crassus newes, that his sonne was but cast away, if he did not presently aide him, and that with a great power. These newes were grievous to Crassus in two respects: first for the feare he had, seeing him selfe in daunger to lose all: and Carræ a city of Mesopotamia. Ischeus, a citie.

The death of Publius Crassus.

A secondly for the vehement desire he had to goe to his sonnes helpe: Thus he saw in reason all would come to nought, and in fine determined to goe with all his power, to the rescue of his sonne. But in the meane time the enemies were returned from his sonnes overthrow: with a more drestfull noyse and crie of victorie, than euer before: and thereupon their deadly sounding drommes filled the ayer with their wonderfull noise. The *ROMAN*s then looked straight for a hot alarme. But the *PARTHIAN*s that brought Publius Crassus head upon the point of a lance, comming neere to the *ROMAN*s, shewed them his head, and asked them in derision, if they knew what house he was of; and who were his parentes: for it is not likely (sayd they) that so noble and valliant a young man, should be the sonne of so cowardly a father, as Crassus. The sight of Publius Crassus head killed the *ROMAN*s hartes more, than any other daunger they had bene in at any time in all the battell. For it did not set their hartes a fire as it should haue done, with anger, and desire of reuenge: but farre otherwise, made them quake for feare, & strooke them starcke dead to behold it. Yet Crassus selfe shewed greater corage in this misfortune, than he before had done in all the warre beside. For riding by euery band he cried out aloude. The griefe and sorrow of this losse (my fellowes) is no mans but mine, mine only: but the noble successe and honor of ROME remaineth still vnuincible, so long as you are yet liuing. Nowe, if you pitie my losse of so noble and valliant a sonne, my good souldiers, let me intreate you to turne your sorrow into fury: make them deere buy the ioy, they haue gotten: be reuenged of their cruelty, and let not my misfortune feare you. For why, aspiring mindes sometime must needs susteine losse. Lucullus ouercame not Tigranes, nor Scipio, Antiochus, but their blood did pay for it. Our ancestors in olde time lost a thousande shippes, yea in ITALIE diuers armies and chieftaines for the conquest of SICILIE, yet for all the losse of them, at the length they were victorious ouer them, by whom they were before vanquished. For the Empire of ROME came not to that greatnes it now is at; by good fortune onely, but by patience and constant suffering of trouble and aduersitie, neuer yeeldinge or geuing place to any daunger. Crassus vsing these perswasions to encourage his souldiers for resolution, founde that all his wordes wrought none effect: but contrarily, after he had commanded them to geue the showte of battell, he plainly sawe their hartes were done, for that then sheweth role, but faint, and not all alike. The *PARTHIAN*s on the other side, their shewte was great, and lustie, they range it out. Now when they came to ioyne, the *PARTHIAN*s archers & horsebacke compassing in the *ROMAN*s upon the winges, shot an infinite nuber of arrowes at their sides. But their men at armes geuing charge upon the front of the *ROMAN*s battel with their great lances, compelled them to draw into a narrow roome, a few excepted, that valiantly, and in desperate maner ranne in among them, as men rather desiring to dye, than to be slaine with their arrowes, where they could do the *PARTHIAN*s almost no hurt at all. So were they sone dispatcht, with the great lances that ranne them through, head, wodde and all, with such a force, as oftentimes they ranne through two at once. Thus when they had fought the whole day, night drew on, and made them retire, saying they would geue Crassus that nightes respite, to lament and bewaile his sonnes death: onlesse that otherwise he wisely looking about him, thought it better for his safety to come and offer him selfe to king Artaxerxes mercy, then to tary to be brought vnto him by force. So the *PARTHIAN*s camping hard by the *ROMAN*s, were in very good hope to ouerthrow him the next morning. The *ROMAN*s on the other side had a maruelous ill night, making no reckoning to bury their dead, nor to dresse their wounded men, that dyed in miserable paine: but euery man bewayled his hard fortune, when they saw not one of them could escape; if they taryed till the morning. On the other side, to departe in the night through that desert, their wounded men did grieue them much. Bicause, to carie them so away, they knew it would let their flight: and yet to leaue them to behinde, their pitiefull cries would geue the enemies knowledge of their departure. Nowe, though they all thought Crassus the only author of their misery, yet were they desirous to see his face, and to heare him speake. But Crassus went a side without light, and layed him downe with his head covered, bicause he would see no man, shewing thereby the common forte an example of vntable fortune: and the wife men, a good learning to know the frutes of ill counsell, and vaine ambition, that had so much blinded him, as he could not be content to commaunde so many thowlandes of men, but thought (as a man would say) him selfe the meaneft of all others, and one that posselt nothing, because he was accompted inferior vnto two persones only, Caesar, and Cassius. Notwithstanding, Octavianus, one of his chieftaines, and Cassius the treasurer, made him rise, and sought to comfort him the best they could. But in the end, losing him to come come with sorrow, and out of hart, that he had no life nor spirit in him: they them selues called the Capitaines and Centurions together, and fate in counsell for their departure, and agreed that there was no longer tarrying for the. Thus of their owne authoritie at the first they made the army marche away, without any sound of trumpet or other noyse. But immediately after, they that were left hurt and sicke, and could not follow, seeing the campe remoued, fell a crying out and tormenting them selues in such sorte, that they filled the whole campe with sorrow, and put them out of all order, with the great moone and lowde lamentation: so as the foremost ranke that first dislodged, fell into a maruelous feare, thinking they had bene the enemies that had come and set upon them. Then turning oft, and setting them selues in battell raze, one while loding their beastes with the wounded men, an other while vnloading them againe, they were left behinde, sauing three hundred horsemen that escaped, who came about midnight to the city of CARRIS. Senatus their Captaine called to the watche on the walles, and spake in the Latine tongue. Who answering, he willed them to tell Coponius, Gouverneur of the towne, that Crassus had fought a great battell with the PARTHIANS, and sayd no more, neither told what he was: but rode on still, till he came to the bridge which Crassus had made ouer Euphrates. Yet this word Senatus gaue to the watch to tell Coponius, serued Crassus vnto very well. For Coponius thought by this great hast of his, and the short confused speeche made, passing on his way, that he had no good newes to tell them: wherefore he straight armed his souldiers, and vnderstanding that Crassus was returning backe, went to meete him, and brought him & his army into the city of CARRIS. The PARTHIANS knew well enough of the remouing of the ROMANES campe, but yet would not follow them in the night, but the next morning entering into their campe where they lay, slue all that were left behinde, which was about foure thousande men: and riding after them that were gone, tooke many straggles in the plaine. Among them there was Barguninus, one of Crassus Lieutenantes, who strayed in the night out of the army with foure whole ensignes, and hauing lost his way, gotte to a hill, where the PARTHIANS besieged him, slue him & all his company, though he valiantly defended him selfe: yet twenty of them only escaped, who with their swordes drawn in their hands, running forward with their heeles, thrust in among the thickest of the PARTHIANS: They wondering at their desperation, opened of them selues, & suffered the to march on towards the city of CARRIS. In the meane time false newes was brought to Surenus, how Crassus with all the chieftest men of his host was fled, & that the great number that were receiued into the city of CARRIS were men of all sortes gathered together, and not a man of any qualitie estimation. Surenus thereupon thinking he had lost the honor of his victorie, yet standing in some doubt of it, because he would knowe the troth, that he might either besiege the citie of CARRIS, or pursue after Crassus: sent one of his interpreters to the walles of the city, charging him to call for Crassus, or Cassius, & to tell them that Surenus would parle with them. The interpreter did as he was commaunded. Word was brought to Crassus, and he accepted of the proffer. Shortly after also, thither came certaine souldiers of the ARABIANS from the camp of the PARTHIANS, who knew Crassus and Cassius very well by sight, hauing diuers times seen them in their campe before the battell. These ARABIANS seeing Cassius on the walles, told him, that Surenus was contented to make peace with them, and to let them goe safely, as his masters good frendes, so that they would surrender MESOPOTAMIA into the king of PARTHIAS handes, and how they thought that was the best way for both parties, rather than to be enforced vnto it by extremitie. Cassius thought this a good offer, and told them, that they must appoint the day & place, where Crassus and Surenus should meete to talke together of this matter. The ARABIANS made answer they would doe it: and so departed. Surenus hearing this, was glad he had them at such advantage, where he might besiege them. The next day he brought all his armie before the city of CARRIS. There the PARTHIANS marckedly reuiled the ROMANES, and told them, they must deliuer them Crassus and Cassius bound hand and feet,

A foot if they would haue any grace or peace with them. The ROMANES were maruiledly offended that they were thus deceived, and told Crassus, that it was no boot to any longer to looke for aide of the ARABIANS, but presently to flie: howbeit to keepe it secret in any wise from any of the CARRIANS, till the very houre of their departure. Yet Crassus selfe had told it to Andromachus, the veriest traitor and villen in all the city, whom he had chosen to be his guide. This traitor Andromachus aduertised the enemies in every point, of their purpose and departure. But because the PARTHIANS do neuer vse to fight in the night, & that it was a hard matter to bring them to it, and againe that Crassus departed in the night time: Andromachus was stayed least the ROMANES would winne lush ground before the PARTHIANS, as they could not possibly undertake him the next day. Therefore of purpose he sometime brought them one way, other while an other way, and at the last, brought them into a great bogge or marish, full of deepe holes and ditches, and where they must needs make many turnes and retournes before they could get out againe, and yet very hardly. Whereupon, some in the armie began to mistrust, that Andromachus meant no good to come and coste them vp and downe in that sorte, and therefore would follow him no more: inso much as Cassius among others, returned towards the citie of CARRIS againe, from whence they came. And when his guides who were ARABIANS counseled him to tary there, till the moone were out of the signe of Scorpio, he answered them: I feare the signe of Sagittarie more. So as loone as he could, heooke his way towards ASSYRIA with five hundred horsemen. And other of the armie also hauing faithfull guides, recovered a cuntry of the mountains, called Sinnac, and retired into a safe place before the breake of day: and they were about five hundred men, whom Octavian a noble man had in charge. But the day stode upon Crassus hunting vp & downe yet in the staruie, in those ill fauored places, into the which Andromachus that traitor had of purpose brought him, hauing with him foure ensignes of footemen all with targets, & very few horsemen, and few sergeantes that caried the axes and roddes before him: with whom, with such a due & great labor, he got into the right way, when the enemies were almost upon him, and that he was within twelue furlong of ioyning with Octavian. There in hast he had gotten a hill, which was not so steep for horsemen, neither of such strength as the other hills were, called Sinnac: yet vnder them, and ioyning to them by along hill that runneth alonge the plaine, so as Octavian plainly saw the danger Crassus was in. Thereupon he first ran downe the hill, with a few of his men that followed him: but after also came all the rest, saying they were close at hand if they should tary behinde. At their coming they gave such a hot onset upon the PARTHIANS, that they made them geue backe from that hill: and compassing Crassus in the thickest of them, compassing him rounde with their targets, they spake nobly, that neuer arrow of the PARTHIANS should touche the bodie of their Generall, before they were slaine one after another, and that they had fought it out to the last man in his defence. Hereupon Surenus perceiving the PARTHIANS were not so coragious as they were wont to be, and that if night came upon them, and that the ROMANES did once recover the hie mountains; they could neuer possibly be met withall againe: he thought cunningly to beguile Crassus once more by this device. He let certaine prisoners goe of purpose, before whom he made his men geue out this speech. That the king of PARTHIA would haue no martiall wage with him: & promises: but first to order wife, to mother desired their friend happy, by shewing them that he would not as to see Crassus very carelessly. And so geue colour to this treachery. As called his men to the fight, and going him selfe in person towards Crassus, with the chieftest of his millicie of his hand, in good manner, his bow ready: he held out his right hand, and called Crassus to him with him of peace, and sayd vnto him. Though the ROMANES had for the kinde & goodnes of this king, was against his will, for he could do no less but defend him selfe: he thought he would be very willing and desirous to make them taste of his mercie & clemencie, and by no means would make peace with them, and to let them goe safely where they would. All these words he said, Crassus were glad of Surenus wordes. But Crassus that had bene deceiued by this device, considering also no case apparant made upon them, and that they would not haue to it, but first consulted with his friends. His friends considered they would not on him to goe, and fell at wordes with him, saying: that the same sort thought they enemies that were vnarmed. Crassus proued first to pacifie them by fayer meanes, perswading them to beare a litle patience but till night, which was at hande, and then they might safely departe at their pleasure, and recouer the mountaines and straight passages, where their enemies could not follow them: and pointing them the way with his finger, he prayed them not to be faint harted, nor to dispaire of their safety, seeing they were so neere it. But in the end Crassus perceiving they fell to mutiny, and beating of their harnes did threaten him if he were not, fearing then they would doe him some villany: went towardes the enemy, and comming backe a litle, sayd onely these wordes: O Ottianus, and you Petronius, with all you ROMANS gentlemen that haue charge in this armie: you all see now how against my will I am enforced to go to the place I would not, & can witnes with me, how I am driuen with shame and force.

 Yet I pray you if your fortunes be to escape this daunger, that ye will report whereofeuer you come, that Crassus was slaine, not deliuered vp by his one souldiers into the handes of the ene-mious people, as I am: but deceived by the frowde & fustilie of his enemies. Ottianus would not tary behind on the hill, but went downe with Crassus: but Crassus sent away his officers that followed him. The first that came from the PARTHIANS vnto Crassus were two mongrel GAR-CIANS who dismounting from their horse saluted him, and prayed him to sende some of his men before, and Surena would shewe them, that both him selfe and his trayne came vnarmed towardes him. Crassus thereto made them aunswer, that if he had made any accompt of his life, he would not haue put him selfe into their handes. Notwithstanding he sent two brethren before, called the ROSCIANS, to knowe what number of men, and to what ende they mette many together. These two brethren came no sooner to Surena, but they were stayed: & him selfe in the meane tyme kept on his way a horse backe, with the noblest men of his army.
 Now when Surena came neere to Crassus: why, how now (quod he) what meaneth this? A Con-fall and Lieutenante generall of ROME a foote, and we a horse backe? Therewithall he fraight commaunded one of his men to bring him a horse. Crassus aunswered Surena againe In that, they neither of both offended, following the vse and maner of their contry, when any meeting is made for treatie of peace. Surena replied: As for the treatie of peace, that was already agreede upon betwene the king Hyrodes, and the ROMANS: howbeit that they were to goe to the nuer, and there to set downe the articles in wryting. For you ROMANS, sayd he, doe not greatly remember the capitulations you haue agreede upon. With those wordes he gaue him his right hand. As Crassus was sending for a horse: you shall not neede, sayd Surena, for looke, the kinge doth present you this. And straight one was brought him with a steele saddle richly gilt, upon the which his gentlemen mounted Crassus immediately, and following him behinde, lashed his horse to make him runne the swifter. Ottianus seeing that, first layed hand on the bridle, then Petronius Colonell of a thousand footemen: and after them, all the rest of the ROMANS also gathered about Crassus to stay the horse, and to take him from them by force, that pressed him on of either side. So they thrust one at another at the first very angrily, and at the last fell to blowes. Then Ottianus drew out his sword, and slue one of the barbarous noble mens horsekeepers: and an other came behinde him, and slue Ottianus. Petronius had no target, and receiuing a blow on his curaces, lighted from his horse, and had no harte on the other side came Pomaxathres, one of the PARTHIANS, and slue Crassus. Somelyle notwithstanding, that Pomaxathres slue him not, but an other, yet that he cut of his heade & his hand after he fell dead to the ground. But all these reportes are rather coniectures, then any certainty. For as for them that were there, some of them were slaine in the field fighting for Crassus, and other saved them selues by flying to the hill. The PARTHIANS followed them, and tolde them that Crassus had payed the paine he had deferred: and for the rest, that Surena had them come downe with safetie. Then some of them yielded to their enemies: and other dispersed them selues when night came, and of them very few scaped with life. Other being followed and pursued by the ARABIANS, were all put to the sword. So as it is thought they were slaine in this overthrow, about twentie thousand men, and tenne thousande taken prisoners. Surena had now sent Crassus head and his hand vnto Hyrodes, the king his master, vnto ARMENIA: and gaue out a brute as farre as the cite of SERAPVIA, that he brought Crassus head, slue,

A line, & that he had prepared a fight to laugh at, while he called his triumph. Among the RO- mans prisoners there was one called Cassius Papias, who was very like to Crassus, but they clothed in womans apparell of the PARTHIANS, and had taught him to answer in a happy collo-quie him Crassus, or Lord capitaine. Him they put a horse backe, and had many women before him, and great caues upon castells backes, that carried axes before them, and bundles of rapiers, and many purles eyed to the bundles of rapiers, and ROMANS had a head newly cut of eyed to the axes: and after him followed all the trumpets & women in gowns of SERAPVIA who went singing of songes of mockery and derision of Crassus womanish cowardliness. Now for these open shoves, every one might see them; but besides that sight, Surena hauing called the Senate of SERAPVIA together, layed before them Aristides bookes of Riddrie, intituled B the Milesians, which was no fable, for they were found in a ROMANS fardell or trusse, called Ruffius. This gaue Surena great cause to scorne and despise the behauiour of the ROMANS, which was so faire out of order, that euen in the warres they could not be free from doing euill, and from the reading of such vile bookes. Then the Senators of SERAPVIA found that Elipse was a wife man, who sayd that euery man caried a sacke on his necke, and that they put other mens faultes at the sackes mouth, and their owne towards the bottome of the sacke.
 When they considered that Surena had put the booke of the lasciuiousnes of the MILES at the sackes mouth, and a long tale of the PARTHIANS vaine pleasures and delights in the bottome of the sacke, carying such a number of cartes laden with naughtie packes in his army as he did, which seemed an army of ermites and felds myse. For in the vpward and fore-C melt ranckes, all appeared terrible and cruell, being onely launces, pikes, bowes, and horse: but all they ended afterwards in the reuerward with a traine of bagets, instruments of musike, dauncing, singing, banqueting, and ryoting all night with Curtians. With that deny but Ru- ffus deferred blame: but yet withall, I say, that the PARTHIANS were blamelesse to reprove these bookes of the vanities of the MILES, considering that many of their kinges, and of the royal blood of the Asiades, were borne of the IONIAN and MESIAN Curtians. Things D passing thus in this sorte, king Hyrodes had made peace & league with Artabazus king of AR- MENIA, who gaue his siter in marriage vnto Pasorum, king Hyrodes sonne, & made great feastes one to another: in the which were many Greeke verses long, Hyrodes selfe vnderstanding well the Greek tongue, and Artabazus was so perite in it, that he him selfe made certaine tragedies, orations, and stories, whereof some are yet extant at this day. The same night Crassus head was brought, the tables being all taken vp, Isafon a common player of enterludes (borne in the city of TRALLS) came before the kinges, & recited a place of the tragedy of the BAC- CHANTES of Euripides, telling of the misfortune of Agave, who strake of his sonnes heade.
 And as euery man tooke great pleasure to heare him, Sillaces comming into the hall, after his humble duty first done to the king, deliuered him Crassus head before them all. The PARTHI- ANS seeing that, tell a clapping of their handes, and made an outcrie of ioy. The gentlemen hushers by the kinges commaundement, did set Sillaces at the table, Isafon carying of his apparrell representing Pentheus person, gaue it to another player to put on him, & counterfeiting the BACCHANTES posselt with furie, beganne to rehearse these verses, with a leassure tune, E and voyce, of a man madde, and beside him selfe.

Behold, vnto from the forest bring a stag now newly slaine, A vvorsh booty and reward befitting well our paine.

This maruelously pleased the companie: and specially finging these verses afterwarde, where the Chorus both asked, and aunswered him selfe.

What strake this stag?

None else but I thereof may brag.

Pomaxathres hearing them dispute about the matter, being set at the table with others, rose straight, and went and rooke the head him selfe, to whome of right it belonged to say those wordes, and not vnto the player that spake them. King Hyrodes liked this sporte maruelously, F and rewarded Pomaxathres according to the maner of the contrie in such a cafe: and so Isafon he also gaue a talent. Such was the successe of Crassus enterprife and voyage: muchlike vnto

THE COMPARISON OF Crassus with Nicias.

Nicias and Crassus vnclothed.

BVnto to proceede to the comparison: first, Nicias goodes were more lustily gotten, and with lesse reproach, than Crassus wealth: for otherwise a man can not geue any great praise to minnerall workes, which are wrought by lewde and ill disposed barbarous fellows kept in irons, and toyled to death in vnhollsome and pestilent places. In being compared vnto Crassus buying of confiscate goodes at Syllus handes, and vngentle manly bargaines of houses a fire, or in daunge thereof: surely Nicias trade will appeare the better way of gettinge. For as openly did Crassus auow vcery, as tillage. And againe for other fautes, wherewith Crassus many times was burdened, and which he slowly denied: as, that he tooke money of men hauing matters before the Senate at ROME, to winne fauor for their side: and that he preferred matters to the preiudice of the confederates of the ROMANES, only for his priuate profit: and therefore curried fauor with Ladies, & generally fought to cloke all fowle offenders: of all these fautes, was Nicias neuer so much as once suspected. For herto the contrary, was mocked of euery bodie, because for feare he maintained wicked doers by gifts: which perhappes would not haue becommend Pericles, nor Aristides, and yet was meete for Nicias, who was borne a timorous natured man, and neuer had corage in him. Whereof Lycurgus the Orator did vaunte afterwarde to the people, being accused that he redeemed detractions with money: I am glad, sayd he, that hauing delt thus long in affayres of the state, it is found I haue rather geuen than taken. And now touching expences: Nicias was thought the better and more ciuill citizen. For his charge and cost was, in dedicating some goodly image to the goddess, or in making of publicke playes or pastimes to recreate the people. But all the money he spent that way, and all that he was worth besides, was nothing comparable, and but a small parte of that Crassus bestowed in an open feast he made at ROME: feasting so many thousandes at one time, and did finde and maintaine them also for a certaine time after. Now I can not but wonder at those men, that deny vice to be an inequality and disagreement of maners, repugnant in it selfe, seeing men may honestly spend that which is naughtily gotten.

Lycurgus feign.

Nicias and Crassus alters in the common wealth.

Aten. Thus much for their goodes. For Nicias doings in the common weale, he did nothing maliciously, cruelly, nor vniuently, neither any thing of selfe will or stomake, but rather delt plainly and simply. For he was deceiued by trusting of Alcibiades, and neuer came to speake before the people, but with great feare. Crassus, on thother side was reprobous for his vncostancie and lightnes, for that he would easily change frendes or enemies: and he him selfe denied not, that he came to be Consult the seconde time by plaine force and cruelty, hauing hired two murderers to kill Cato and Domitius. And in the assembly the people held for deuiding of the prouinces, many men were hurte, and foure were slaine in the market place: and more then that, Crassus him selfe (which we haue forgotten to wyte in his life) gaue one Lucius Annaeus so force a blow on the face with his fist, for speaking against him, that he sent him going with blood about his eares. But as Crassus in those thinges was very fierce and cruell: so Nicias womanish behavior on thother side, and faint hart in matters of the common wealth, humbling him selfe to the meanest and most vile persones, deserueth great reproache. Where Crassus in this respect shewed himselfe assuredly of a noble minde, not contending with men of small accompt, as with Cleon, or Hyperbolus, but would geue no place to Casars: same and glory, nor yet to Pompeys three triumphes, but fought to goe euen with them in power and authority: and had immediatly before exceeded Pompeys power, in the dignity of Ceafor. For Magistrates, and Governours of the common weale, should make them selues to be honored, but not enuied, killing enuy by the greatnes of their power. But if it were so that Nicias preferred quietnes, and the safety of his persone aboue all things else, and that he feared Alcibiades in the pulpit for orations, the LACEDÆMONIANS in the sorte of Pyle, and Pericles in THRACIA: he had liberty & scope enough to repose him selfe in the city of ATHENS, & might haue forborne the dealing in matters, & (as Rhetoricians say) haue put a hood of quietnes upon his heade very well. For doubtlesse, concerning his desire to make peace, it was a godly minde in him, and an act worthy of a noble person, to bring that to passe he did, appealing all warre: wherein Crassus certainly was not to be compared to him, though he had ioyned all the prouinces to the Empire of ROME, that reach vnto the Caspian sea, and to the great Ocean of the INDIANS. But on the other side also, when one hath to deale with people that can discerne when a man ruleth according to equity and iustice, and that he seeth he is in the prime of his credit and authoritie: he must not then for lacke of corage suffer wicked men to stepp in his roome, nor geue occasion to preferre such to authoritie in the common weale, as are vnworthie for that place and countenance: neither should allowe such any credit, as are altogether of no credit nor trust, as Nicias did: who was the only occasion that Cleon, being before but a prating Orator, was chosen Generall. Neither doe I also commend Crassus, for that in the warre against Spartacus, he made hast to geue him battell, more rashly then safely or considerately. For his ambition spurred him forward, because he was afrayed least Pompeys comming should take from him the glorie of all that he had done in that warre: as Mummius tooke from Metellus the honor of the winning of CORINTH. But besides all this, Nicias fact therein was without the compasse of reason, and can no way be excused. For he did not reigne his honor & office of Generall to Cleon his enemy, when there was hope of good success, or little perill: but fearing the daunger of the iorney, he was contented to saue one, and tooke no care besides for the common wealth. Which Themistocles shewed not, in the time of the warre against the PERSIANS. For he, to keepe Epicides an Orator (a man of no reckoning beside his eloquence, and extremely couteous) from being chosen Generall of ATHENS, least he should haue ouerthrowen the common weale: secretly bribed him with money to leaue of his sute. And Cato also, when he saw the state of ROME in greatest daunger, sued to be Tribune of the people for the common wealthes sake. And Nicias in contrary manner, referring him selfe to make warre with the city of MINO, or with the Ile of CYTHRA, or with the poore vnfortunate MELIAN: if there fell out afterwards occasion to fight against the LACEDÆMONIANS, then away went his Capitaines cloke, and he left the shippes, the armie, and munition to the charge and government of Cleons rashnes and small experience of warre, when the necessitie of the seruice required the wisest and most expert Capitaine: The which he did not, despising the meanes to make him honored: but it was a plaine drawing backe, at time of neede, to defend his contrie. Wherefore, afterwards he was compelled to gainst his will to be Generall, to make warres in SICILIA with the SYRACVSANS: because the people thought he was not so earnest to disswade the iorney, for that he thought it not for the common wealth, but because through his sloth and cowardinesse he would make his contrie lose so good an opportunity to conquer SICILE. Yet was this a great testimony of his honesty and trust they had in him: who though he euer hated warre, & did flie from the office of honor and charge in the common wealth, his contrienmen notwithstanding did alwayes chooſe him, as the most experienced persone, and meekest man of the citie. Now Crassus in contrarie maner desiring nothing else but to be Generall, could neuer attaine to it, but in the warre of the bondmen, and yet was it for lacke of another: (for Pompey, Metellus, and both the Lucullus were then abroad in the warres) although he was otherwise of great estimation and authoritie. Howbeit it seemeth to me, that his frendes that loued him best, thought him (as the comical Poet sayth)

A good man any way else, but in warres.

His ambition notwithstanding & covetous desire of rule, did nothing benefit the ROMANES.
For the ATHENIANS sent Nicias to the warre against his will: but Crassus led the ROMANES thither against their willes. So that the common wealth fell into miserie by the one, and the other through the common wealth was brought into miserie: and yet therein there is rather cause to praise Nicias, than to blame Crassus. For Nicias like a wife man, & a Captaine of great experience, could neuer so much as be brought to thinke they should conquer SICILE: and therefore disswaded his contymen from the iorney, & would geue no place to the vaine hope of the people of ATHENS. But Crassus taking upon him to make warres with the PARTHIANS, as though it had bene an easie matter to overcome them, found him selfe deceived, yet did he aspire to great things. For as Iulius Caesar had conquered & subdued the Imperiall crowne of ROME; all the countries of the West partes, to say, the GAVLES, the GERMANES, and ENGLANDS: euen so did Crassus desire to goe towards the East partes, to conquer all to the great west sea of the INDIANS, and to subdue all the regions of ASIA, whereunto Pompey and Lucullus aspired, being both very noble personages, and such as euer curiously behaued them selues to all men: notwithstanding, prouoked thereunto with the like desire that Crassus had.
For whē the charge of the warres in the East partes was assigned to Pompey, by decree & order of the people: the Senate vtterly misliked it, and were against it all they could. When newes were brought to ROME that Iulius Caesar in battell had ouerthrowen and slaine three hundred thousand GERMANES: Cato perswading with the Senate, was yet still of this minde, that Cæsar should be deliuered into the handes of his enemies whom he had ouercomen, for to be punished: thereby to turne the sharpe reuenge and wrathe of the goddesses from ROME, upon him only, that was the vnjust breaker of the peace. This notwithstanding, the people making none account of Catoes perswasions, made common feastes & processions fiftene dayes together, and open sacrifices to the goddesses with great ioy through the citie, to thanke them for this famous victory. How glad may we thinke would they haue bene, and howe many dayes would they haue feasted and sacrificed, if Crassus had written from BABYLON of his victory, and that he had conquered all the realmes of the MEDES, of the PERSIANS, of the HYRCANIANS, of the SVSES, and of the BACTRIANS, and that he had made new governments and provinces to the Empire of ROME?

If a man will needes doe wrong and iniustice,

As Euripides sayth to them, that can not liue in peace, and be contented with their owne he must not then stick at trifles, (as raising of a castell of Scandia, or of a citie of MENDA, or chasing of the AGINETES being out of their owne naturall contrie, and hiding them selves like birdes without nestes, in an other birdes hole) but must dearely sell the wrong he doth, and not lightly contemne iustice, as a thing of small account. For they that will commend the intent of Alexander the great in his voyage, for the conquestes he made in the East, and doe dispraise Crassus voyage: doe not well to iudge of the beginning, by the euentes and successe of the end. For executing of their offices, Nicias did many noble employes. For he ouerthrow his enemies in diuers battells, and had almost taken the citie of SYRACUSA: and sure they can

A more iustly blame him for all the misfortunes that chaunced in the warre of SICILIA, but pitiely the plague was a cause of it, and partly also the enuie of those towards him that remained at ATHENS. Where as Crassus ranne into so many errors, and committed such foule partes in all his voyage, that he gaue fortune no leasure to do him good: so that I wonder not so much that his folly was overcome by the power of the PARTHIANS, as that it could ouer-come the good fortune of the ROMANES. Sithens it so falleth out the; that they both came to like vnfortunate end, Nicias prognosticating before what things should happen by arte and rule of diuination; and Crassus contrarily disdaining to obserue any thing: sure it falleth out hard in iudgement, which of them two proceeded with most safety. Yet according to the best approved opinions, a fault committed of feare is more excusable, then of rashnes and folly to breake any auncient law or custome. For their deatnes, Crassus end deferred sentre proache: For he against his will did yeelde him selfe, and was neither bound nor mocked, but only persuaded by his frendes; and through his enemies frawde and treason most traitorously decei-ued: where Nicias cowardly, and dishonorably hoping to saue his life, trauelling to the mercy of his enemies, made his deatne more infamous.

THE LIFE OF Sectorius.

PEradventure it is not to be marvelled at, if in long proces of time (fortune altering her effectes daily) these worldly euentes fall often out one like an other. For whether it be that the variety of things are infinite, fortune hath store of matter apt enough to worke to likenes: or be it that worldly matters be comprehended within determinate number: of necessitie one thing must fall out like an other, since they pro-ceede from one cause, ryed to the same meanes it before did vse. But because men doe delight to compare such chaunces together, as they haue seene or heard to haue happened so like, as if they had bene done of purpose, thone by the example of the other: (as that of two men being both named was torne a peeces by his dogges, the other by his louers. That of the two famous Scipios the CARTHAGINIANS were first ouercomen by the one, and afterwards vterly destroyed by the other. That the citie of TROYE was first taken by Hercules, for the horses that Laomedon had promised him: the seconde time by Agamemnon, by meanes of the great wooden horse; and the third time by Cheridemus, by meanes of a horse that fell within the gate, & kept the TROIANS that they could not shutte it in time. And that of two sweete smelling plantes, IOE, and SMYRNA, two cities were named, the one signifying the Violet, and the other Myrre it is sup- posed that the Poet Homer was borne in the one, and that he dyed in the other. We may also adde to this example, that amongst the auncient Captaines, the greatest warriors, and that haue done the noblest exploit by wit and warlike stratagemes, had but one eye: as Philip, Antigonus, Hanniball, and Sertorius also, whom we wryte of at this present. Whom we may truly reporte to haue bene more chaste, than Philip: more faithfull to his friend than Antigonus: more courteous to his enemies than Hanniball: and for wisdom and iudgement to geue place to none of them, but in good fortune to them all. The which, though she shewed her spight more to him, than to his enemies that were all great men: yet in experience he was equall with Metellus, in prowes and valliance with Pompey, and in fortune with Sylla. So that being banished his contrie, a stranger in an other realme, & hauing to gouerne a barbarous nation, he notwithstanding maintained warres for a time, against the power of the ROMANES. Me thinks therefore, that of all the GRECIAN Captaines I can liken none so well vnto him, as Eumenes the CARDIAN. For both of them knew how to commaund, both were very valiant & politike in warres, both were banished men out of their contry, both were Captaines of other strangers, and both of them were traiterously and villanously layne by them, through whom they had before ouercomen their enemies. Now for Sertorius, he came of worthipfull parentes, and was borne in the citie of NYRSTAIN the contrie of the SABINES. His father left him a very childe with his mother, who carefully brought him vp, and whom he singularly loued and reuerenced. Her name as they say was Rhea. His first rising and beginning grew by pleading matters in law, which he could handle very well: inso much as being a young man he came to ROME, and wanne some name by his eloquence. Howbeit, the honor and estimation he achieved afterwarde by his valliant actes, made him imploy all his studie and ambitious care, to armes and warres. The first time of his souldierfare was, when the CIMBRES & TEVTONS invaded GAULE with a mighty army: where, when the ROMANES had bene ouer- come under the leading of Cepio, his horse being slaine vnder him, and him selfe hurt, he notwithstanding swame ouer the riuer of Rone, with his corselet, & target upon him, breaking the fury and rage of the riuer with meere strength, so able and lustie a bodie he had to brooke all paines and hardnes. The seconde time that these barbarous CIMBRES, returned with an infinite number of fighting men, and with prowde and dreadfull threats, the ROMANES were the first afrayed, that they thought him a slowe man that had but the courage to keepe his ranke, and obey his Captaine. At that time was Marius General of the ROMAN armie, and then did Sertorius undertake to goe and discouer the enemies campe. And for the purpose, apparelled him selfe like a GAULE, and learned the common wordes and phrases of their language, to salute one an other when they met, and in this sorte went among them: and hauing partly by fight and reporte learned that he fought for, he returned to Marius, who then gaue him such honorable reward, as was due to his deserte. All the time of the warres after, he did such valliant actes and deedes of armes, that his Captaine had him in great estimation, and committed the chiefe matters to his charge. Whereupon, the warres being ended with the TEVTONS and CIMBRES, Sertorius was sent into SPAYNE, vnder Didius the Prator, with charge of a thousand footemen, with whom he wintered in the citie of CASTULO, in the marches of the CELTIBERIANS: where the souldiers finding plentie of vittells, fell to gluttonie and dronkenness, and committed great insolencie, being ouercome with wine. Inso much as the barbarous people of the citie grew to such a milking and disdaine of them, that they sente night to their nexte neighbours the GYRISANIANS for aide, and as they came by the ROMANES lodgings, slue a great number of them. Sertorius hearing the noyse, went immediately out of the citie with a few of his men, & gathering them together also that fled one after an- other ther to saue them selues, went round about the walles of the citie, and finding the gate open: where the GYRISANIANS came in, there entred he also: who being more careful than they, had shewed them selues, left the gates, & all the partes of the citie well guarded, & then pulled to the sword within: that were of age to carie weapon. Nowe when he had executed this charge, he commaunded all his souldiers to leaue of their owne apparell and weapons, and to take these of the barbarous people whom they had slaine, and to follow him to the city of the GYRISANIANS, from whence they came that had on such a sodaine assailed the in the night. The GYRISANIANS seeing the garments and weapons of their supposed massacre of their king certainly they had bene they: opened their gates, and a number of people went out to meete their frendes and citizens, whom they thought had happily sped of their purpose. Thus were a maruelous number of them slaine by the ROMANES: euen hard at the gates, & in their citie: and the rest putting them selues to Sertorius mercy, he sold for slaves. After this exploit, Sertorius wanne great fame through all SPAYNE, and returning to ROME was made Questor or Treasurer general of GAULE, on this side of the mountaines, by the riuer of Po. A happy chaunce for ROME: for euen at that very present time fell out the warres of the confederates and allies of ITALIE, called the MARIANS warre, in the which he had commaunded to prest souldiers, and to make armor. And therein he shewed such diligence and expedition for quick dispatche of that seruice, in respect of the longe delay and enuie of regard that young men had of the fame before: that he wanne the name to be a carefull and diligent change, and one that afterwarde would achieve great enterprises. Further more, when he came to be a Captaine him selfe, he would not let to venter his persone as valiantly, as any other private souldier whatsoeuer, but did maruelous actes with his owne handes, & thus he great perills and conflicts: inso much as at the length he lost one of his eyes in fight. Whereof he was nothing ashamed, but continually gloried in it: for others, sayd he, doe not alwayes carry the markes about them of their valliant seruice, but leaue them otherwhiles at home, as their chaines, carconets, iauelings, and crownes, geuen them by their Captaines for testimony of their valliance: howbeit that he alwayes caried the markes about him (wherefoeuer he went) of his seruice, so that such as saw the blemish of his eye, did therewithall witness his valliance and courage. The people also did honor him as became them: For when he came into the Theatre, they welcomed him with clapping of their handes, and great praises, which the ROMANES did scanty vnto their oldest Captaines: and which were most honored for their great and noble seruice. Neuerthelesse, when he sued to be Tribune, he was reiected by GESIUS praefect who hindered him: whereupon grew as it seemeth, that grudge & malice which he ever after bare vnto Sylla. For after that Marius was fled being ouercomen by Sylla, & that Sylla was gone out of ITALIE to make warre with Mithridates, and that of the two Consuls, Ostilius tooke parte with Sylla, and Cinna thother Consul (which fought change and alteration) was gathering men together to set vp Marius faction, that was in manner vnderfoot: Sertorius tooke his parte: because he saw that Ostilius was but a slow and lister man, and did not besides trust any of Marius frendes. So was there a cruell conflict betwene them: euen in the market place within the city selfe, where Ostilius had the vpper hand: And Cinna & Sertorius escaped by flying, hauing lost few lesse then ten thousand men in this only overthrow. Neuerthelesse, afterwarde through practise and policy, they got those souldiers together againe that were disperfed here and there through ITALIE, & as in short tyme they made their power equall with Ostilius force. Marius also being aduertised of the same, tooke the sea in company, and returned into ITALIE out of AFRICK, and came to Cinna to seeke seruice: appoynted souldier, vnder his Captaine and Consul. Now they all liked well that Marius should be receiued sauing Sertorius, who was against him all he could: fearing that either his credence and estimation should diminish, Cinna hauing a worthier Captaine then him selfe to serue him, or else that Marius cruely and feuerly (who pardoned none offence) would marre all together hauing no stay in his anger, but bent vterly to all kinde of cruelty to his enemies, if Cinna would tyme to haue the victorie. And thereunto he added this further: that now he had this victory in manner in their hands, if they once receiued Marius vnto them, he would robbe them of all the honor of ending this warre, and being also in authority, he was neither to be trusted, nor commaunded. Whereunto Cinna answered thus: that he thought the words he had alleaged to be true, howbeit that he was ashamed, and besides, could not see with honesty how he might refuse Marium, or send him backe, sithens he had purposely sent for him, to commaunde the charge of these warres vnto him. Sertorius againe replied. Sure I thought Marium had come of his owne good will vnto me, & therefore (as for the best in mine owne opinion) I gaue aduise not to receiue him: but sithence it is so that you sent for him before, and that he is now come vpon your commaundement, you were much to blame to aske counsell whether you should now receiue him or not. And therefore you must needs accept his seruice, that is come upon your worde: for, the bonde of your promises past you, doth now cut off all counsell or other resolution. Thereupon Marium was called for: and when he came, they deuilled their whole army into three parties, and then beganne to charge apon their enemies of all handes, so as they obtained victorie. Howbeit Cinna and Marium committed as horrible cruelty in this victory, as could possibly be shewed: in so much as the ROMANS thought all the miseries they had endured in time of this warre nothing, and but a play as it were, in respect of the great calamities they fell into afterwards. Nowe Sertorius on thother side neuer caused man to be slaine for any priuate malice or quarrell he had with any person, neither did he hurte any man when he had ouercome, but was much offended with Marium infolency & cruell murders: and when he had good opportunity to speake with Cinna a parte, he did qualifie him the best he could, and made him more milde and tractable through his perswasion. In fine, Sertorius seeing Marium garded with a great number of bondmen for lacke of other souldiers in this warre, whom he used as executioners of his slaughter and butchery, alwayes attending about his person as a garde, and suffering them also to make them selues riche, partly with that he gaue them, or commaunded them to spoyle, and partly also with that they violently tooke without his commaundement of their owne masters, killing them when they had done, rauishing their mistresses, & desiling their children: he could no longer abide such wickednes and villany, but made them all to be slaine in their campe where they lay together, being no lesse then foure thousand persons. Afterwards, when he saw that the elder Marium was deade, and that soone after Cinna was slaine, the younger Marium his sonne (against his counsell, and contrary to the lawes of ROME) had by force made him selfe Consul: and that Carbo, Scipio, and Norbanus (which had bene ouercome by Sylla) were come out of GALLIE to ROME wards, partly through the cowardlines of their Captaines, and partly also because they were betrayed and folde of their owne men: and further, considering therewithall, that his person could doe no good in those affayers, which waxed worse and worse, by means of thauthoritie of such as had least wit and vnderstanding, and specially also seeing Sylla campe hard by Seipio, making much of him, and feeding him with hope of a good peace, whilst vnderhand he wanne his souldiers from him, notwithstanding that he was certainly warned and told of it before: Sertorius then vtterly despairing of *ROME*s prosperity and wellfare, departed from ROME, to go towards SPAYNE, thinking that if he could get the first possession and gouernment of that realme, it would at the least be a refuge and receit for all those of their tribe, that should chauce to be banished out of their contrie. Howbeit in his voyage thitherward, he met with foule and rough weather: and passing through a contrie of mountaines, the barbarous people inhabiting the same, demanded tribute of him, for licence to passe through their territories. Thereat the souldiers of his company were maruelously offended, saying that it were too much shame and dishonor for a Proconsull of ROME, to pay tribute to vile barbarous people. Notwithstanding, Sertorius passed not for the shame they sayd it would be him, but answered them thus: that he bought time, which thing he should most reckon of, than spiritch to haughtie enterprises, and so pleased the barbarous people with money. And thus he made such speede, as he quickly recovered SPAYNE, which he found greatly replenished with people, and specially of young men able to weare armor. But now Sertorius perceiving that they had bene hardly delt withall before, through the infolency, pride, and couetousnes of the ROMAN Gouernours, whom they ordinarily sent from ROME, and that therefore they hated all manner of gouernment: first of all sought to winne the good willes of all the whole contrymen one and other. Of the noble men, by being familiar and conuersant with them

A and of the common people, by easing them of their taxe and subsidies. But that which bred him most loue of all men generally was this: that he dispensed with them for lodging of souldiers, and receiuing of any garrison within their cities, compelling his souldiers to set vp their tentes, and to make their cabines without the suburbs of great cities to winter there, & causing also his owne pauillion to be first set vp, and lay in it him selfe in person. This notwithstanding, he pleased not these barbarous people in all things to win their fauor: for he armed all the ROMAN citizens of age to cary weapon, that dwelt in SPAYNE, and made them make all forces of engines for battery, and a number of gallies besides, so that he had all the cities at commaundement, being very courteous to them in matters of peace, but in warlike munition, very deadfull to his enemies. After Sertorius vnderstoode that Sylla kept ROME, and that the B most parte of the tribe of Marium & Carbo was vtterly ouerthrowen, mistrusting that it would not be long before they sent some Captaine with a great armie against him: he sent Julius Salinator betimes to keepe the mountaine Pirenei, with fixe thousande men well armed. Immediately after Caius Annius also came thither, sent by Sylla: who seeing no possibilitie to distresse Salinator in a place of such aduantage, was driue to stay at the foote of the mountaine, not knowing what to determine. But by misfortune, one Calpurnius surnamed Lanarius, traitorously slue Salinator: whereupon his souldiers forthwith forsooke the toppe of the mountaine, and by this meanes Annius had easie passage with his army which was very great, and ouerthrowe them that resisted his further coming on into the contry. Sertorius finding him selfe not strong enough to fight with him, marched away with three thousand men vnto the C cite of new CARTHAGE, and there tooke sea: from thence he coasted out into AFRICKE, and fell with the coast of the MARYSIANS, where his souldiers landed immediately for freshe water, dispersing them selues without keeping any order. Thereupon the barbarous people gaue a charge apon them, & slue numbers of them: in so much as Sertorius was driuen to imbarke againe, and to take his course towards SPAYNE, where he was kept from landing. Then was he driuen to take certaine pirates botes of the *CILICIAN*s, and to saile towards the Ile of PITVVSA, where he landed in despite of Annius garrison, and put them to distresse. But shortly after came Annius thither him selfe with a good number of shippes, and fixe thousand fighting men in them. Him Sertorius determined to abide, and to fight withall by sea, though he had but small barkes, purposely made for swift sayling, & of no strength for fight. But now D the West winde rising very bigge, did swell the sea in such sorte, that it cast the most parte of Sertorius shippes (being weake and very light) apon rocks in the sea, and him selfe with a few being kept from land by his enemies, and from the sea by storme was driuen to ride ten dayes together at anker, working still for life against the daunger of the surging waues & boisterous windes, which continued rough all that time: yet in the ende when it calmed againe he waied anker, and ranne into certaine desolate Iles, where was no water to be had. Then hoisting saile from thence, he passed the straight of Gibraltar, and turning on his right hande, landed apon the coast of SPAYNE, lying towards the great Westerne sea, a litle above the mouth of the riuer of Batis, the which falling into the sea *ATLANTIC*um, gaue name in olde time to that parte of SPAYNE, which was called HISPANIA BÆTICA. There certaine saylers met with him E that were newly arriued, from the Iles of the Ocean Atlantium, which the auncients called the fortunate Ilands. These two Ilandes are not farre one from another, being but a litle arme of the sea betwene them, and are from the coast of AFRICKE only tenne showland furlongs. They haue raine there very seldom, howbeit a gentle winde commonly that bloweth in a lile siluer dew, which moisteth the earth so finely, that it maketh it fertile and lustie, not onely to bring forth all that is set or sowne apon it, but of it selfe without mans hand it beareth so good fruite, as sufficiently maintaineth the inhabitants dwelling apon it, liuing idely, and taking no paines. The weather is sayre and pleasaunt continually, & neuer hurteh the body, the climate and seasons of the yeare are so temperate, and the ayer neuer extreame: bigaule the windes that blow apon that land frō the other side of the coast opposite to it, as the North & Easter, F by winde coming from the maine, what with their long commings, and then by dispersing them selues into a wonderfull large ayer & great sea, their strength is in manner spent and gone before their coming thither. Westerly) they sometime bring litle showers with them which commonly doe but moist the ground a litle, and make the earth bring forth all things very trimmely: infomuch as the very barbarous people them selues doe faithfully beleue, that there are the Elysian fields, the bode of blessed creatures, which Homer hath so much spoken of. Sertorius hearing reports of these Ilandes (vpon a certaine desire now to liue quietly out of tyranny & warres) had straight a marvelous minde to go dwel there. But when the pyrates of Cilicia (who were no men of peace, but geuen altogether to spoyle & pillage) heard that: they by & by forooke Sertorius, & went into Africke, to restore Ascalum the sonne of Sphtha to his realme of Mavritania againe. Sertorius quailed not for all their departure from him, but determined to aide them that made warre against Ascalum, and all to thend that his souldiers seeing matter of new hope and meanes to be employed, should not so leaue him, being faced afterwarde to be discharged of very necessity. The Mavrytians being very glad of his arriuall, he presently went on with his enterprise, ouercame Ascalum in battell, and besieged the cite whereinto upon the ouerthrowe of his armie he was fled for refuge. Sylla being aduertised thereof, sent Paccius thither with an army to aide Ascalum. Sertorius gaue him battell, slue him in the field, and won the rest of his army, which yielded vnto him: then tooke he the city of Tingis, whereinto Ascalum was fled with his brethren. The Libyans wyte that Anteus is buried there. But Sertorius geuing no credit to the tales of the barbarous people of that contrie, by reason of the greatnes of the tombe they shewed: made it to be broken open round, and finding there the body of a man (as they say) of three score cubits long, he marueled at it, and so finishing his sacrifice to honor the memory thereof, caused the tombe to be well closed vp againe. By this act hee did greatly increase the honor of Anteus memory, which the city did vnto him, and thereby confirmed the contry mens reports of Anteus. For the Tingians doe reporte, that after Anteus death, his wife Tinga lay with Hercules; and had a goodly sonne by him called Sophax, who was king of that contrie, and there built this city, geuing it his mothers name. Furthermore, it is sayd also that this Sophax had a sonne called Diodorus, who conquered the most parte of Africke with an army of the Greecian Olbians and Myccians, which Hercules brought thether, to inhabite those partes. We were willing to imbrace the occasion offered vs to speake of this matter as we went, for the honor of Iuba, the noblest historiographer that euer came of royall blood: for it is thought his auncesters were lineally descended from Sophax and this Diodorus. Sertorius as conquerour now, hauing the whole contry in subiection, did in no wise hurt them that yielded vnto him, & put trust in him, but restored them their goodes, cities, and gouernment againe, contenting him selfe with that they offered him of their good willes. But then standing doubtfull what way to determine: the Lvsitanians sent Ambassadors vnto him, to intreate him to be their chieftaine. For they stood in great neede of a worthy personage, and a man expert in warres to defende them against the furies of the Romanes: and therefore they only trusted him, hearing of his honorable behauiour by that that were conuerfant with him. Whose qualities as we finde writtyn, were these. He was neuer greatly moued, with feare nor ioy: but as he was a resolute man without feare in most danger, so was he most temperate in greatest prosperitie. In valliantnes inferior to no Captaine of his time, and very quick of execution in euery imminent danger. For where any present exploit was to be done, any strong place of aduantage to lodge or fight in to be taken, or that he was to passe ouer any riuier, or scape any instant danger, where it stood upon speedy execution, and to shew some stratagem or policie in time and place to floud the enemy: in those matters he passingly excelled. Furthermore, he was both bountifull in rewarding good seruice, and mercifull in punishing of offenders: but this notwithstanding, the fowle murder he did in his latter dayes upon certaine younge children that were pledges with him (which doubtlesse was an act of great cruelty and anger that could not forgoeue) doth manifestly proue, that he was neither mercifull nor courteous of nature: but that he manie times did finely counterfeite it, when both the time and the warres did so require it. But of mine opinion, sure I am perfwaded that no misfortune can haue power to make perfect vertue, grounded vpon good reason, to worke in any sorte contrarie to it selfe: neither doth thinke it impossible also, but that mens good willes and gentle natures being injured without caule,

A cause, may peraduenture change their naturall dispositions. Which then proued true in Sertorius, who finding fortune contrary vnto him, & his good happe changed into ill, grew so crabbed and fierce of nature, that he would take cruell reuenge of them which had villanously betrayed him. But now to our matter where we left. Sertorius departed out of Africke upon the Lvsitanians offer, who chose him for their General, geuing him absolute power and authoritie: and so soone as he arriued, he straight leaued men of warre, and with them subdued the people of Spainne fronting upon their marches, of which the more parte did willingly submit them selues, upon the brute that ranne of him to be mercifull and courteous, and a valliant man besides in pefect daunger. Furthermore, he lacked no fine deuises & subtelties to winne their good willes: as amonge others, the policie and deuise he had of the hynde, which was this. There was a poore man of the contrie called Spanus, who meeting by chance one day with a hynde in his way that had newly calued, flying from the hunters helet the damme goe not being able to take her, and running after her calfe tooke it, which was a young hynde, and of a straunge heare, for she was all milke white. It chaunced so, that Sertorius was at that time in those partes, who was alwayes very glad when any man offered him such manner of presentes: as frutes, fowle, or venison, & would make very much of them that brought them to him, and also reward them well for the same. So, this poore man presented Sertorius with his younge hynde, which he gladly receiued, and which with time he made fo tame, that she would come to him when he called her, and followe him where euer he went, being nothing the wilder, for the dayly sight of such a number of armed souldiers together as they were, nor yet afrayed of the noyle and tumult of the campe. Infomuch as Sertorius by litle & litle made it a miracle, making the simple barbarous people beleue that it was a gift that Diana had sent him, by the which the made him vnderstande of many and sundrie things to come: knowing wel enough of him selfe, that the barbarous people were men easily deceived, and quickly caught by any subtil superstition, besides that by arte also he brought them to beleue it as a thinge very true. For when he had any secret intelligence geuen him, that the enemies would invade some parte of the countries and prouinces subiect vnto him, or that they had taken any of his fortes from him by any intelligence or sodaine attempt: he straight told them that his hynde spake to him as he slept, and had warned him both to arme his men, and put him selfe in strength. In like manner if he had heard any newes that one of his Lieutenantes had wonne a battell, or that he had any aduantage of his enemies, he would hide the messenger, and bring his hynde abroade with a garland and collar of roses: and then say it was a token of some good newes coming towards him, perswading them with all to be of good cheare, and so did sacrifice to the goddess, to geue them thanks for the good tidings he should heare before it were long. Thus by putting this superstition into their heades, he made them the more tractable and obedient to his will, infomuch as they thought they were not now gouerned any more by a straunger wiser than them selues, but were stedfastly perswaded that they were rather led by some certaine god: and so much the more, because that his deedes confirmed their opinions, seeing his power so dayly to increase beyonde the hope and expectation of man. For with two thousand fow hundred souldiers, which he called Romanes (although the most of them in deede were Africans, which came ouer with him out of Africke into Spainne) & foure thousand Lvsitanians, with seven hundred horsemen also, he made warre against foure great Capitaines of Rome, which had the leading of fixe score thousand footemen, two thousand archers and slingers, with a world of cities and contries besides. Where Sertorius at the first had not about twenty at the most: and yet with this small power to maintaine this warre withall, he did not only conquer great countries and many goodly cities, but tooke some of the Capitaines prisoners also, whome the Romanes sent against him. Of which company Cotta was one, whome he overthrew in battell by sea, not farte from the cite of Mellaria. He also ouercame Fidius in battell, being gouernor of Spainne Betica, by the riuier of Betis, where he slue two thousand Romanes. By his treasurer likewise he ouercame Lucius Domitius, Proconsull of the other prouince of Spainne. And an other time he discomfited Toranus an other Captaine, one of the chiefest Lieutenants, whome he slue in fight with all his army. And Sertorius selfe, being taken in the same for one of the most expert men of warre, and chiefe Captaines among the ROMANES: him he put also fo oft to distresse, that Lucius Lollius was faine to come out of GAULE NARBONNE 515 (now Languedocke) to aide. And they were furthermore driuen to fende Pompey the great with all speede from ROME, with a new army. Bicause Metellus knew not what course to take, hauing to fight with a most valliant man, & one whom he could neuer either bring to any set battell, nor yet entrappe in the plaine fieldes, (so easily could he cast him selfe into all kinde of formes) by reason of the dexterity and swiftnes of his spanie souldiers being lightly armed. Where he cleane contrary, was wont to fight a pitched field, without remouing a foote, and to lead an army heavy armed, which could keepe their rankes, and fighting stedeadly could ouerthrow their enemies with handstrokes, and marche apon their bellies. But to clime vp the mountaines, and to be continually (as they were) charged in the rereward with these men armed as light as the winde, and to pursue them in chafe that fled still, and neuer kept place: it was vnpossible for them to doe it, and much lesse to abide hunger and thirst, to liue without a kitchen and fire, and likewise to lye on the bare ground without tentes or pauillions, as Sertorius souldiers did. Furthermore Metellus being grown an old man, (hauing spent all his youth in seruice of the warres, and taken & suffred great paynes and troubles, geuing him selfe now to quiet and pleasure) was matched with Sertorius, being then euen at his best age, and lustiest of body, besides that nature had made him both strong, active, and temperate withall. For he was neuer geuen to his belly, nor to be a great bibber, when he was at most quiet, and out of warres, he was likewise acquainted with paines and hardnes from his youth, could away with long iornes, watch many dayes and nightes without sleepe, ate litle, and content him selfe with any meate that came to hand. And had he neuer so litle leasure, he would continually be on horsebacke, riding a hunting vp and downe the fieldes, which made him very ready and expert to know how to winde him selfe out of daunger when he was distressed, and contrariwise also to compasse in his enemy apon any advantage: and besides, to see where he might enter, and where not. For this cause was Metellus driuen (who was still desirous to fight) to abide the losses and discommodities which they suffer that be vanquished: and Sertorius on thother side refusing battell, and flying before him, had all the vantage of him that they haue, which chafe their enemies whome they haue ouercome. For he cutte of his vittells on euery side, tooke away his water, and kept him in from foraging. When he thought to marche further forwarde, Sertorius stayed him. And when he lay still in his campe, Sertorius came and gaue him alaroms, & draue him to dislodge. Yf Metellus layed siege to any place, Sertorius straight besieged him for want of vittells. So that his souldiers were euen weary of altogether. Whereupon, when Sertorius challenged the combat of Metellus: oh, well sayd, cryed all the souldiers, let Captaine fight against Captaine, and ROMANE against a ROMANE. Howbeit Metellus refused him, and the souldiers laughed him to scorne. Neuerthelesse he did but smile at them, and therein shewed him selfe a wise man: for as Theophrastus sayth, a Captaine must dye as a Captaine, not like a priuate souldier. Furthermore, Metellus considering that the LANGOBERTS (who gaue great aide vnto Sertorius in all seruices) were easie to be taken for lacke of water (hauing but one onely well in all their city) and that whosoever did besiege the same, should straight be master of all the spring heades of the suburbs about it, hoping thereby to make the citie yeelde vnto him within two dayes at thutmost: he commaunded his souldiers to vitrell them selues for fivue dayes only. But Sertorius hauing intelligence thereof, gaue good direction and speedy order to prevent him. For he caused two thousand goates skinned to be filled with water, and promised round summes of money for euery skinned goate brought thither. Many SPANYARDS and MAVRYSIANS straight tooke apon them this enterprise. Thereupon Sertorius choosinge the lustiest men amonge them, sent them away through the mountaine, commaunding them withall, that when they deliuered their goates skinned with water vnto the citizens, they should cause them forthwith to put out all their idle people, that the water might last them the longer which defended the city. Metellus receiuing aduertisement hereof, was much agrieved withall, bicause his souldiers vittells were wel nere spent, which they had brought according to his commaundement: and therefore he sent Aquinius one of his Lieutenants, with six thousand men to get vittells. Sertorius hauing intelligence of his purpose, presently

A presently layed an ambush for his returne in a valley full of wodde, and bestowed there these thousand men to set vpon the rereward, whilst he him selfe gaue charge on the vaward. Thus made he Aquinius flee, & lue the most parte of his men, and tooke the rest prisoners. Howbeit Aquinius selfe the Captaine hauing lost his weapons and horie, by flying recovered Metellus campe: who thereupon was driuen with shame to raise his siege, being mocked of all the SPANYARDS. For these valliant deedes, was Sertorius wonderfully beloued and honored of all the barbarous people, and specially bicause he had made them good souldiers, brought them from their former rude & beastly fight, and had taught them to be armed after the ROMANE fashion, to keepe their rankes when they fought, to follow their ensigne, and to take the signall and word of the battell: in so much as he made them then appeare a goodly army, well taught and trained, being before a confused multitude of theues and robbers. Furthermore, he deuised great store of gold and silver among them, shewing them how they should gild their headpeeces, sette out their shieldes and targettes with fine workemanhippe, and also brauely apparell them selues with riche clokes and sleuelesse callockes apon their armor, teaching them to be fine, and furnishing them with money, whereby he maruelously wanne the hartes of the barbarous people. Yet did he further binde them vnto him, by that he did vnto their children. For he sent generally for all the noble mens young sonnes, through all the countries and prouinces subiect vnto him: and brought them to the goodly citie of OLIVIA, where he prouided them of schoolemasters to teache them the Greeke and Latine tongue, bearing their parentes in hande, that it was to no other ende, but to make them (when they came to be men) meete to be employed in the seruice of the common weale, albeit in deede it was but a fine deuise of him, to haue them as Ostages for their faith and loyalty towards him. Then were the fathers of these children glad men to see their sonnes apparelled like ROMANS, in fayer long gownes garded with purple, to goe ciuilly to the schooles: that Sertorius payed for their learninge: and that oftentimes he went thither to appose them, to see how they profited: and how he gaue rewardes vnto them that were the best schollers, hanging iuelles about their neckes, which the ROMANES call Bulla. In so much, that they hauing a custome at that time in SPAYNE, that such as were about the Prince or their chieftaine should dye with him when he dyed, that custome of voluntarie vowe to dye with their Lorde, being called by the barbarous people, deuotion: there were very fewe of their followers and familiars that would vowe to dye with other Captaines, but on thother side, thousandes commonly followed Sertorius, hauing vowed to loose their liues with him. And for prooffe hereof it is reported, that when his army on a time was ouerthrowen by a certaine citie of SPAYNE, the enemies egerly pursuing him: the SPANYARDS not regarding their owne liues to saue his, tooke him vp on their shoulders, and so passed him from man to man apon them, till they put him into the city, who being safe & out of daunger, they then looked by running to saue them selues the best they could. Thus was Sertorius not only beloued of the SPANYARDS, but of the souldiers also that came out of ITALIE. For when Perpenna Vento, being of the same faction, arrived in SPAYNE full of money, & with a good number of souldiers intending to make waite in his behalfe against Metellus: his souldiers fell out with him, and had none other talke in his campe but of Sertorius. The which spited Perpenna to the hart, being proude & stately by meanes of his wealth and estate, comming of a noble house. Newes being come that Pompey was past ouer the mountaine Pyrenei, the souldiers armed them selues, and plucked vp their ensignes that were fast in the ground, and cried out apon Perpenna to lead them to Sertorius, threatening him that if he would not, they would leaue him alone, and seeke them a Captaine, that could both saue him selfe and them. So was Perpenna forced against his will to followe their mindes, and to leade the three and fiftie ensignes he had with him, to ioine with Sertorius force. Thus became Sertorius army very great, and specially after all the cities on this side the riuier of Ebrus had yeelded vnto him. For then came souldiers to him out of all partes, howbeit they were a rashe confused multitude of Omnigatherum together, hauing no reason for patience to abide time, but cried out in furie, to set apon their enemies. This troubled Sertorius much, seeking first to quiet them by reason and perswasion. But when he sawe they fell to mutinie, and would needes haue their wills, and both without reason and all good order would so goe set upon their enemies: he gaue them the head, and let them goe as they would, knowing well enough they would pay for their folly. But yet tooke such order and direction, as they should not vterly be cast away, hoping after that to haue them the more obedient vnto him. And in dede they had their payment as he coniectured: notwithstanding he went to rescue them, & so brought the safe into his campe. Now to take away the families perplexitie from them, which this ouerthrow perhappes had striken into them: immediately after he caused his whole armie to assemble, as purposing to vie some speeche vnto them: in which time he caused two horses to be brought and set in the middes among them, the one olde and feeble iacke, and thother a goodly lustie horse, which besides other things, had a marvelous lyster thicke taile. Behind the olde leane iacke, he set a lusty tall fellow: and behind the goodly horse also, he placed a little wearish man, & seeming to fight to haue but small strength. Now upon a signe geuen them which he had made them priuy to, the strong man tooke the leane horse by the taile with all his might, as if he would haue plucked it off by the stumpe: and the other wearish man fell to plucking of heare by heare from the great horse taile. So when the strong man had tugged and swet a great while in vaine at the leane horse taile, thinking he haue pulled it off, and in thende did nothing else but make the lookers on laugh: and that the wearish wretch on thother side in a short space, (& at ease) had left the great horse taile with neuer a heare on it: Sectorius then rising vp, spake in this sorte to his souldiers. Doe ye nor (my frendes and companions) sayd he, how time and perfeuerance exceedeth force? and that things vnlke at the first to be overcome by force, are yet in time, by lile and lile obtained. For continuance ouercometh all things, and there is no force nor power, but proceesse of time consumeth and bringeth to nought, being a most certaine helpe to them, that can take oportunitie, and abide time: as in contrariwise haft and rafines is as dangerous an enemy as may be, to them that doe things of a head without regard. By these common deuises wherewith Sectorius daily acquainted the barbarous people, he taught them to abide the oportunitie of time. But of all the stratagemes he vsed in warre, that only exceeded all other, which he shewed vnto a people called the CHARACITANIANS. The people doe dwell on the other side of the riuer of Tagus, and haue neither cities nor villages for their common abode, but only a great high hill, full of hollow caues and deepe holes among the rockes, looking towards the North. At the foote of this mountaine the valley is a great litle ground and so rotten, that it is not able to beate a man, but being troden on, crummeth like white lyme, & turneth vnder his fete. And therefore, by means of the same, when those people were afrayed of any enemies, or that they had conueyed the goodes they had robbed & stollen from their neighbors into those caues, they thought them selues safe, if they were once gotten into them: for it was vnpossible to compell them to come out. Nowe it chaunced that Sectorius flying from Metellus, came and encamped hard by this hill which these barbarous people inhabited, who made no reckoning of him, imagining Metellus had ouerthrown him. But Sectorius being in a rage with them, and because he would faine that he fled not: tooke his horse backe the next morning, and rode as neere to the hill as he coulede, to viewe the nature and situation of the place: and when he saw there was no way to bring a man into it, he fretted, and walked vp and downe, vainely threatening them to no purpose. Yet going and comming to and fro, he perceived the winde raised a great dust, of that bridle earth we haue spoken of, and carried it full into the CHARACITANIANS holes, the mouthes wherof as we sayd before, lay full upon the North. This Northen winde, which some call Cæcias, is the only winde of all other that most keepeth in that quarter, and isfeth from the moores and mountaines thereabouts, which be continually couered with snow, and then in the hart of sommer is nourished and enforced by the melting of the ice and snow, and so bloweth a ioly coole winde, which refresheth the barbarous people and beastes all the day long. Sectorius marking this with him selfe, and vnderstanding by the inhabitants therabouts, that this winde blew commonly among them: commaunded his souldiers to gather a great quantitie of this light bridle earth together, & to raise a mount of it, right against the other hill. The barbarous people made a mockery of it at the first, thinking Sectorius would haue made a mount to haue fought with them upon it: howbeit he went on with his worke till night came, and then brought his souldiers backe againe into his

his campe. The next morning by breake of day there was a pretty litle winde stirring, that onely blew of the toppes of his forced mount, & the highest parte of that masse of earth, as chaffe when they winnowe corne: and as the llyane beganne to haue any power, the North winde also rose, which soorthwith filled all the hill with dust. And withall, came Sectorius souldiers who threw downe the hill to the bottome, which they had gathered the day before, and brake all those drie clots of clay in peeces. The horsemen on thother side, they still maintained their horses vp and downe in it, to raise vp the greater dust, which the winde carried as soone as it rose, and blow into the caues of these barbarous people, full in their faces, through their holes and cleftes of the rockes: So they haue no other vent nor ayre any way, but there where the winde blew in upon them: it did so blinde fold their eyes, and filled their caues with such a thicke stuffing ayre, that they were almost choked withall, not able to take breath. For when they should drawe their breathes, this stuffing ayre and dust came in at their mouthes so fast, that they had much a doe to hold out two dayes, and on the thirde yielded them selues vnto Sectorius mercy: the which thing did not so much increase his power, as it wanne him honor, by policie to haue wonne such an vnlkely conquest, which by force could neuer haue bene gotten, and where to fight was matter impossible. So longe therefore as he made warre with Metellus alone, he commonly had the aduantage of him, because Metellus was an olde man and heauy, & could not resist Sectorius lusty youth, that led a light army, like rather to a company of theues and robbers, than to an army of men of warre. But afterwarde when Pompey came oute from the mountaines Pyrenai, and that both of them being encamped eche before the other, and that Pompey had shewed him all the stratagemes and policies of warre possible for a good Captaine to deuise, & he the like vnto Pompey: and found that Sectorius had the better of him both in laying his ambushes, & also in foreseeing to intrap him: then grew the fame of Sectorius to be so great, that euen in Rome it selfe he was thought to be the noblest Captaine, & of best conduction of any man in his time. Yet was Pompey at that time of great fame and reputation, which afterwarde also waxed greater, by the noble actes he did vnder Sylla, who gaue him the surname of Pompey the great, for that he had deserved honor of triumphe, before his beard was grown. So, when he was comen thus into Spain, diuers townes and cities subiect vnto Sectorius, were halfe in minde to yeelde vnto Pompey: but afterwarde they altered againe, upon the chaunce that happened vnto the cite of LAVRON, beyond all expectation: For Sectorius being gone to lay siege to it, Pompey in haft went thither with his armie to raise the siege. Neere vnto the city there was a litle hill very commodious to lodge a campe in, and also to distresse them of the cite: whereupon thome made haft to get it, and thother to keepe him from it. Notwithstanding, Sectorius was the first man, and got the hill: and Pompey came euen as he had taken it, who was very glad it had so fallen out, thinking to haue made Sectorius sure at that time, being kept in on the one side with the cite of LAVRON, and with his army on the other. Thereupon he sent vnto the citizens, and bad them care for nothing, more then to stand upon their walles at their pleasure, to see Sectorius straightly besieged, who thought to haue besieged them. This message being brought to Sectorius, he smiled at it, and sayd, that he would teache Sylla young scholler (for so in mockerie he called Pompey) that a wife Captaine should rather see behinde then before him: and therewithall he shewed the LAVRONITANS fixe thousand footemen well armed, which he had left in his campe when he came to take the hill where he was, to thend that if Pompey came by chaunce to assaile him, they should geue a charge upon his rereward. Pompey hauinge founde this to lye, dust not offer Sectorius battell, fearing to be compassed in behinde: and on thother side he was ashamed to forsake the LAVRONITANS, whome he was driven in thende to see vnto the spoiled and destroyed before his eyes, and durst not once sturre to helpe them. The barbarous people of the contrarie part (seeing no hope of aide by him, yeelded straight vnto Sectorius, who did not onely pardon them, but also suffered them to goe whether they would. Howbeit he burnt the cite, for no anger or crueltie (being a Captaine that neuer shewed crueltie in anger) but to thend that Pompey withall, and to stoppe their mouthes that made such accomptes of him: and that this brute might runne among the barbarous people, that Pompey him selfe being present, might in manner haue warned him by the fire that burnt a goodly city of his confederates, fight.

neither durst nor could helpe them. In dede Sertorius in continuance of this warre suffered much losse and great hurt, howbeit it was alwayes through the fault of his Lieutenants, as touching him selfe, he was neuer ouerthrowen, nor thofe he led. And yet he cared more honor in recouering of those battells which his Captaines lost, than his enemies did that had put them to the worke. As in the battell he wanne against Pompey, by the city of Syracusa and in another he wanne against Pompey and Metellus both, by the citie of Tyrrhus. And for the ouerthrow of Syracusa, it is thought it came through Pompeys ambition, makinge more haile for feare Metellus should be partaker of the honor of his victorie: and that was the thing Sertorius looked for, to fight before Metellus came to ioine with him, and therefore he fought the battell with Pompey towards night, supposing the darkenesse of the night would trouble his enemies much, be a helpe to saue them selues if they were overcome, and allowe chase the enemies if so it happened they had the vpper hande, because they were strangers, and knew not the contrie. When both battells came to geue charge, Sertorius at the first was not directly against Pompey, but against Afranius, who led the left wing of Pompeys battell, and him selfe was in the right wing of his owne battell. Howebeit Sertorius being aduised that the left wing of his owne army against the which Pompey fought, was in such distresse, they gaue backe, and could abide no longer, if they were not presently aided: straight left the leading of the right wing, which he assigned ouer to other of his Captaines, and ranne with all speede possible vnto the left wing, which were then euen as good as flying. And first be-chered them together againe which had turned their backes, and after put those also in good order that were yet a fighting: and so hauing encouraged them both with his wordes, and the presence of his person, he gaue a new charge againe upon Pompey, more courageously than before, (who thinking he had already wonne the field, was then a chafing such as fled) and caute so, fiercely upon him, that he put all the whole army of the ROMANES to flight: in the which Pompey him selfe escaped killing in the field very hardly being sore hurt, & saued by a strange meane. For the AFRICANS of Sertorius hauing taken Pompeys horse (which was richly trapped with harnessse of gold and other precious furniture) falling out among them selues, and fighting for deuotion of the same: in the meane time let Pompey goe, and neuer followed after him. Afranius againe on thother side, whilest Sertorius was gone to helpe the other wing of his battell, made them flie all that stood before him, & followed killing of the euen into the trenches of their campe, entring in amongst them that fled, and spoiled the campe being darke night. Knowing nothing of Pompeys ouerthrow, neither could he withdraw his men from spoyle. Sertorius also comming thither upon the instant, finding Pompeys men in disorder, slue a number of them: and the next morning betimes armed his men againe, and brought them out into the field, to fight once more with Pompey. But receiuing intelligence that Metellus was at hand, he founded the retreat, and dislodged from the place he encamped, saying: had not that old woman comen, I would haue whipped that young boy to ROME with roddes. Now was Sertorius very heauy, that no man could tell him what was become of his white hynde: further by all his furtletie and finesse to kepe the barbarous people in obedience was taken away, and then specially, when they stood in neede of most comforte. But by good happe, certaine of his souldiers that had lost them selues in the night, met with the hynde in their way, and knowing her by her colour, tooke her, and brought her backe againe. Sertorius hearing of her, promised her a good reward, so that they would tell no liuing creature that they brought her againe, and thereupon made her to be secretly kept. Then within a few dayes after, he came abroade among them, and with a pleasant countenance tolde the noble men and chiefe Captaines of these barbarous people, how the goddess had reuealed it to him in his dreame, that he should shortly haue a maruelous good thing happen to him: and with these wordes fate downe in his chayer to geue audience. Whereupon they that kept the hynde nor fere from thence, did secretly let her goe. The hynde being lost, when the had spied Sertorius, ran straight to his chayer with great ioy, and put her head betwext his legges, & layed her mouth in his right hande, as she before was wont to doe. Sertorius also made very much of her, and of purpose appeared marcelous glad, shewing such tender affection to the hynde, as it seemed the water stood in his eyes for ioy. The barbarous people that stood there by & beheld the

At the same, at the first were much amazed therewith: but afterwards when they had better be- thought them selues, for ioy they clapped their handes together, and waited vpon Sertorius to his lodging with great and ioyfull shewtes, saying, and stedfastly beleuing, that he was a heavenly creature, and beloued of the goddess: whereupon they were maruelously pleased in their mindes, and certainly hoped that their assayes should prosper daily better and better. Another time hauing straighted his enemies with scarcety of vittells, in the territorie of the SAGYNTINES, he was by force compelled to fight against his will, for that they sent great troups of men to forrage the contrie, to get vittells. Upon the encounter it was valiantly fought of either side, where Metellus was slaine, (the valliantest Captaine Pompey had) cora- giously fighting in the midst of the battell, Sertorius finding him selfe the stronger, followed his first wing, making great slaughter of those that withstood him, vntill he came vnto Metellus selfe, who taried his comming, defending him selfe more valliantly than was either ho- ped, or looked for, in a man of his yeares: in so much as he was at the last hurt with a partizan. Which was such a dishonor to the ROMANES, nor vnto them only that saw it, but vnto such also as heard of it, that being all ashamed to forsake their Captaine, and turning their shame into anger against their enemies: they couered Metellus rounde about with their shieldes and targets, & getting him out of the presse and furie of the fight, gaue such a fierce onfet, as they draue the SPARTARDS to flie. This fortune changing the victory, Sertorius to geue his sca- tered men time to saue them selues, and leasure also for a new supply (which he caused to be presently leauied) to come at their pleasure: fled of purpose into a citie of the mountaines of strong situation, and there setting a good face of the matter repayed the rampers, and forti- fied the gates, thinking nothing lesse then to abide there to be besieged, but only to lay a baite for his enemies, comming to besiege the citie, hoping they should easily winne it, and in the meane time left pursuing of the barbarous people which had therby good leasure giuen them to saue them selues. Furthermore, they tooke no order to suppress the new supplye that was comming to Sertorius, who had sent out his Captaines to the next cities & thieres adioyning, to leaue men, with expresse commendement, that when they had mustered a conuenient number together, they should sende them vnto him, as they did. So when he vnderstoode of their comming, he easily passed through his enemies to meete them, and with them sodainly came backe againe, and harried his enemies worse then before: sometime cutting their vi- D talls from them by land, through his ambushes and continuall furtle policies, being quickly in euerie place whether they thought to go, with his light army: and on the sea also with cer- taine pirats pinnelles, with the which he scored all the coast upon the sea side. By this meanes, both the Captaines his enemies were compelled to seuer the selues farre one from the other, in so much as Metellus went to winter in GAULE, Pompey remained in SPAYNE (in great scarce- tie of all things for lacke of money) to winter in the territories of the VACCIAIANS, and wrote to the Senate at ROME, that he would returne with his armie into ITALIE, if they sent him not money out of hande, for that he had spent all his owne daily fighting for the defense of ITALIE. Thus it was certainly thought at ROME, that Sertorius would be in ITALIE before Pompey: because he had through his valliancie and great skill brought two of the most famous E Captaines of their time, to great extremitie and distresse. Then did Metellus shewe how much he feared Sertorius, and how he thought him a great and dreadfull enemy. For he pro- claimed by sounde of trompet, that if any ROMANE could kill him, he would geue him an hundred silver talentes, and twentie thousand Lugera of land: and if he were a banished man, he promised he should be restored to his contry and goodes againe, buying his death by trea- son, whome he could not overcome by force. And furthermore, being his chaunce once to winne a battell of Sertorius, he was so ioconde and provide for this victorie, that he would needes therefore be called Imperator, to say, Prince, or soueraine Captaine: and was con- tented the people should sette vp altars and doe sacrifices vnto him in euerie citie where he came. And it is furthermore reported of him, that he wore garlandes of flowers on his head; and would be bidden to dissolve bankets, sitting at the table in a triumphing robe: and they made images of victory goe vp and downe the hall, moued by certaine secret engines carying triumphes of golde, and crownes and garlandes of triumphe, and daunfers of goodly young boyes and fayre gines following of them, with longes of triumphe in his praise. Whithin A double he deferred to be laughed at, shewing him selfe so much caried away with ioy and vaine glory, for one ouerthrowe geuen vnto him, whom him selfe was wont to call Sylla his gitiue, and the remnant of the banished men of Carbo. On thother side, Sertorius noble courage was easily discerned, first, for that he called the banished men which were escaped from Rome, and comen to him, Senators: and hauing them about him, called them the Senate, making some of them Treasurers, others Pretors, directing and ordering all things according to the manner of his contrie. And in this also, that making warres with the souldiers of the cities of SPAYNE, and defeating the same at their owne charges, yet he neuer gaue them any authoritie, so much as in word, but ruled them alwayes with ROMANE officers and Captaines: saying still, that he fought for the liberty of the people of ROME, and not to increase the glorie and power of the SPANYARDS, to the hurt and dishonor of the ROMANES. For to say truly of him, he euer loued his contrie well, and longed much to be sent for home againe: and yet in his greatest troubles, when thinges thwarted him most, then was his minde greatest, yielding no manner of shewe or appearance to his enemies, of any faint hart or discouragement in him. Againe, when he was in best prosperitie, and had most aduantage of his enemies, he sent vnto Metellus and Pompey both, letting them vnderstand that for his parte he was contented to lay armes aside, and to lue at home like a priuate man, so that he might be lawfully restored and called home by edict: and that he had rather be counted the meanest citizen in ROME, then being a banished man out of his contrie, to be called Emperor of the world. And it is said, that one of the chiefe causes which made him desire so much to be called home againe, was the tender loue he bare vnto his mother (that had brought him vp from the time of his fathers death) vpon whom he cast all his loue and delite: in so much as after that his friends in SPAIN had sent for him to come to be their Captaine, and that he had bene a while among them, receiuing newes that his mother was departed out of the world, it so strake him to the hart, that he had almost dyed for sorrowe. For he lay seuen dayes together continually on the ground weeping, & neuer gaue his souldiers the watch word, nor would be fene of any of his friends vntill that the other noble men and Captaines of his owne estate, came to him to his tent, and were so importunate of him by intreaty and perswasion, that they gotte him out of his tent, and shew him selfe to his souldiers, to speake to them, & to take order for his affayres which prospered very well. By these signes many haue iudged, that he was of a courteous and pityfull nature, and that naturally he was geuen to be quiet and peaceable: howbeit, that he was forced of necessity to take charge of men of warre, because he could not otherwise lue quietly nor safely, being pursued by his enemies, which would neuer let him rest, and thereupon entred into warre, for his owne gard and safety. The treaty selfe he made with king Mithridates, argued his noble minde. For when Mithridates whome Sylla had ouercomen, was recouered againe (like a wrestler that being ouerthrowen getteth vp on his feete to trye an other fall with his enemy) and tooke apone him toinade ASIA: Sertorius fame was then so great, that he was spoken of through the world, by marchauntes comming from the West, who blew abroad the reporte thereof al the East partes ouer, euen into the realme of PONT, like to marchandises which they went to seeke for in straunge contries. Whereupon Mithridates being perswaded by the vaine vauntes of his fauored courtiers, who compared Sertorius to Hannibal, and him selfe vnto king Pyrus, saying that the ROMANES being set apone by them both, could not withstand two such excellent natures, & great powers together, when the noblest Captaine of the world should be ioyned with the greatest and most puissant Prince that euer was: sent thereupon his Ambassadors into SPAYNE vnto Sertorius, with full power and commission to promise him money and shippes towards the maintenance and charge of this warre, in recompence whereof he desired that Sertorius would redeliuer him the possession of ASIA againe, the which he had surrendered vp vnto the ROMANES apone the peace made between him and Sylla. Sertorius hereupon called his counsell together (which he termed the Senate) to consult apone this matter. And when they were all of opinion that he should accept Mithridates offers, and were exceedingly glad of the same, considering that they asked them nothing but a tale in the ayer, and a name of thinges which were not in their power, offering them therefore things present, Mithridates sent Ambassadors vnto Sertorius in Spayne.

A present, whereof they had greater neede, yet would Sertorius neuer agree therunto. Howwithstanding, thus much he graunted Mithridates, that he should enioy CHAPADOCIA, & Bithynia, which had euer bene contries subiect vnto kings, & whereunto the ROMANES had neuer any right, excepting this specially: that he would neuer suffer him to vspurie any contrie vnto the which the ROMANES had any iust title, and the which he had lost in warres by force of armes vnto Fimbria, & had afterwarde also willingly surrendered: by agreement made between him and Sylla. For he sayd he would enlarge the Empire of Rome through his victories, but not impyre or hurte it by his conquestes. For, a valiant man (sayd he) should rather conquer with honor, but in no wise desire life with dishonor. His answer being reported vnto king Mithridates, did much amaze him: and some haue written, that he then sayd vnto his familiars. What would Sertorius commaund vs then, if he fate among the in the Senate at Rome, who being an exile now, and remaining in the furthest parte of the world by the sea Atlanticum, doth take apone him to bounde the certaine confines of our kingdome, threatening vs all so with warres, if we attempt any thing against ASIA? All this notwithstanding, they were agreed apone other things betweene them, that Mithridates should enioy the contries of CHAPADOCIA and Bithynia, and that Sertorius should send him one of his Captaines with aide of men of warre, and that apone performance thereof, the king should geue him the summe of three thousand talents, and fortie shippes of warre. So Sertorius sent thither one of his Captaines called Marcus Marius, a Senator of Rome, who fled to him for succour: vnto whom Mithridates distressed certaine cities of ASIA. And when Marius entred into them, with his sergeantes carying the bundells of rodde and axes before him, as before a Proconsul full of the ROMANES: Mithridates gaue him the vpper hande, as his better and followed after him. Furthermore, Marius did set certaine cities at libertie, and wrote vnto others, declaring vnto them, that Sertorius of his grace and goodnesse did release them of their taxes and customes they payed: so that poore ASIA which had bene oppressed by the couetousnes of the Treasurers and farmers of the ROMANES, and also by the pride and insolencie of the souldiers which lay in garrison among them, beganne to haue some hope of chaunge; & to desire that alteration of government, which Sertorius offered. But on thother side, the Senators of Rome that were in SPAYNE as banished men in Sertorius armie, and of the like dignitie and estate that him selfe was of, they hearing say that all was well againe at Rome, and perswading them felues that they should be stronge enough for their enemies, hauinge no cause to feare any more daunger: beganne then to enuie Sertorius greatnesse and authoritie, but Perperna specially amonge other, who by reason of his nobilitie being putt vp with a vaine presumption and ambitious selfe will, practised to make him selfe chiefe of all the armie; and to that ende threwe forth amongest his frendes and familiars such kinde of feditious wordes. What cruel fortune (quod he) my frendes doth daily haunt vs worse then others making vs that were vnwilling to obey Sylla (commaunding at this day both lande and sea at his will) to chooseth rather to forsake our landes and contrie? And nowe being come hither in hope to lue at libertie, we willingly make our felues slaues, becomminge Sertorius garde for defence of his persone in his exile: who to requite vs withall, payeth vs with fayer wordes, calling vs the Senate, whereas euery man laugheth to heare vs so called, and in fine we must abide this dishonor to be at his commaundement, and drudge and take as much paines, as the SPANYARDS and LYSIANIANS doe them felues. Hereupon the more parte of them being caried away with these mutinous wordes, durst not yet shew them felues in actual rebellion against Sertorius, being afear of his authoritie: howbeit secretly vnderhande they ouerthrowe his doinges, by shewing extreame crueltie vnto the barbarous people, by pretext of iustice, imposing great paymentes apone them, geuing it out it was Sertorius commaundement. By which their lowde practises, many cities reuolted against him, and put them felues into his enemies handes: and they daily also raised new mutinies and rebellions apone him. Furthermore, those whome he sent to pacifie the tumultes did handle them felues in such sorte, that where they founde haue quieted the grudges and rebellions of the people, they let them farther out, and procured new tumultes. Hereupon was Sertorius gentle nature and former goodnes so altered, that he committed a most cruell act apone all the noble mens children of that land, which he brought vp at schoole in the city of O S C A : for some of them he put to death, and others he solde as slaues. Thus Perpenna hauing many associates in his wicked conspiracie against Sertorius, brought into his confederacie also one called Manlius, who had chiefeft charge in all the army. This Manlius loued a young boy exceedingly, & bicause he would let him know he loued him well, he told him on a time the whole plat of this conspiracy, willing him not to reckon any more of others loue but of his, and to loue him only : for he should see him a great man before it were long. The younge boy louinge an other better than him, called Aufidius, went & reuealed vnto him all that Manlius had told him. Aufidius marueled to heare the boy made priuie to it, seeing him selfe also was of the confederacie, and knew not yet that Manlius was one of them. And when the boy also named Perpenna, Gracianus, & some other whom Aufidius knew well to be of counsell, he was worse afayed then before, but yet seemed to make litle of it, and tolde the boy : for that matter it was nothing, and counselled him not to credit Manlius wordes, who was but a vaine man, and boasted of that which was not true, and did it onely but to deceiue him. This notwithstanding, departing thence, he went forthwith vnto Perpenna, and tolde him how their practise was discovered, declaring further what danger they were in, if it were not speedily put in execution. All the confederates agreed it was true that he sayd, & thereupon they deuised this treason. They had suborned a messenger to bring counterfeite letters to Sertorius, saying in the same that one of his Lieutenantes had won a great battell, in the which he had slaine a maruelous number of his enemies. Sertorius being very glad of the good newes, made sacrifice vnto the goddes to geue them thanks. Whereupon, Perpenna taking the present opportunity inuited Sertorius to supper to him, and all other of his frendes that were present (euery one of the conspiracie with him) and was so importunate with Sertorius, that in the end he promised him to come. Now Sertorius did euer vse great modestie at the bourde, and would suffer no dissolute talke nor light partes at his meate, and had acquainted them also that vsed his table, to talke of graue and wise matters, and yet one to be honestly mery with an other, without any playing or vncomely talke. In the middelt of supper, they that sought occasion of quarrell, beganne to speake lewde wordes, counterfeiting to be drunke, and to play many vile partes of purpose to anger Sertorius. Whereupon Sertorius, whether it was that he coule not abide to see those villanous partes, or that he mistrusted their ill will towards him by fumbling of their wordes in their mouthes, and by their vnworsted irreuerent maner shewed vnto him : fell backwards apon the bed where he fate at meate, seeming no more to marke what they did or sayd. Perpenna at that instant tooke a cuppe full of wine, & making as though he dranke, let it fall of purpose. The cuppe falling downe made a noyse, and that was the signe geuen among them. Therewithall Antonius that fate aboute Sertorius at the table, stabbed him in with his dagger. Sertorius feeling the thrust, strove to rise : but the traitorous murderer got vp on Sertorius brest, & held both his handes. And thus was Sertorius cruelly murdered, not able to defend him selfe, all the conspirators falling apon him. Sertorius death being blowne abroad, the most parte of the SPANYARDS sent Ambassadors immediatly vnto Pompey and Metellus, and yekled them selues vnto them : and Perpenna with those that remained with him, attempted to doe some thing with Sertorius army and preparation. But all fell out to his vter destruction and ruine, making the world know that he was a wicked man, who could neither commaund, nor knew how to obey. For he went to assaile Pompey, who had ouerthrowen him straight, and was in the end taken prisoner. And yet in that instant of his calamitie, he did not vse him selfe like a valliant minded man, and one worthy to rule : for, thinking to saue his life, hauing Sertorius letters and writings, he offered Pompey to deliuer him all Sertorius letters sent him from the chiefeft Senators of ROME, written with their owne handes, requestinge Sertorius to bring his armie into ITALIE, where he should finde numbers of people desirous of his comming, and that gaped still for change of gouernment. But here did Pompey shewe him selfe a graue and no younge man, deliueringe thereby the cite of ROME from great feare and danger of change and innouation. For he put all Sertorius letters and writings on a heape together, and burnt them euery one, without readeing any of them, or suffering them to be red. And moreover, he presently put Perpenna to death, fearing he should name some, which if they were named, would breed

THE LIFE OF Eumenes.

Darius the Historiographer wryteth, that Eumenes was borne in the cite of CARDIA in THRACIA, being a carriers sonne of the same contrie, (who for pouertie earned his liuing by carying marchaundises to and fro) and that he was notwithstanding honestly brought vp, as well at schoole, as at other comely exercises. And furthermore, how that he being but a boy, Philip king of MACEDON chaunsing to come through the city of CARDIA, where hauing nothing to do he tooke great pleasure to see the young men of the cite handle their weapons, & boyes to wrestle : and among them, Eumenes shewed such actiuitie, and performed it with so good a grace withall, that Philip liked the boye well, and tooke him away E with him. But sure their reporte seemeth truest, which wryte that Philip did aduaunce him for the loue he bare to his father, in whose house he had lodged. After the death of Philip, Eumenes continued his seruice with king Alexander his sonne, where he was thought as wife a man, & as faithfull to his master, as any : and though he was called the Chaunceller or chiefe secretary, yet the king did honor him as much as he did any other of his chiefeft frendes & familiars. For he was sent his Lieutenaut generall of his whole army, against the INDIANS, and was Perdiccas successor in the gouernment of his prouince, Perdiccas being preserued vnto Hephestions charge after his death. Nowe bicause Neoptolemus (that was one of the chiefe Squiers for the body vnto the king) after the death of Alexander told the Lordes of the counsell of MACEDON, that he had serued the king with his shield and speare, and howe Eumenes had followed with his penne and paper : the Lordes laughed him to scorn, knowing that besides many great honors Eumenes had receiued, the king esteemed so well of him, that he did him the honor by marriage to make him his kinsfeman. in ASIA, was Barfine Artabazus daughter, by whom he had a sonne, & called his name Hyeron & of two of her sisters he married the one of them called Apamavnto Ptolomey, & her other sister also called Barfine, he bestowed vpon Eumenes, when he distributed the PERSIAN Ladies among his Lordes and familiars to marrie them. Yet all this notwithstanding, he often fell in disgrace with king Alexander, & stood in some danger by means of Hephestion. For Hephestion following Alexander courte on a time, having appointed Enius a phiphe player a lodging, which Eumenes seruantes had taken vp for their maister: Eumenes being in a rage, went with one Mentor vnto Alexander, crying out that a mā were better be a phiphe & a common plaiyer of Tragedies, then a souldier, since such kinde of people were preferred before men of seruice that ventured their liues in the warres. Alexander at that present time was as angrie as Eumenes, & roundly tooke vp Hephestion for it howbeit immediately after hauing chaunged his minde, he was much offended with Eumenes, because he thought him not to haue vsed that franke speeche so much against Hephestion, as of a certaine presumptuous boldenes towards him selfe. And at an other time also, when Alexander was lending Nearchus with his army by sea to cleere the coastes of the Ocean, it chaunced the king was without money: whereupon he sent to all his frendes to take vp money in prest, and among others, vnto Eumenes, of whom he requested three hundred talentes. Eumenes lent him but a hundred, and sayd he had much a doe to get him so much of all his tenants. Alexander sayd nothing to him, neither would he suffer them to take his hundred talentes: but commaunded his officers to set Eumenes tent a fire, because he would take him tardy with a lye, before he could geue order to cary away his gold and siluer. Thus was his tent burnt downe to the ground, before they could make shift to saue any thing: the which Alexander repented afterwarde, and was sorie it was burnt, because all his letters and wrytings were burnt withall. Howbeit, after the fire was quenched, they found in niggots of gold and siluer mingled together, aboue a thousand talentes, and yet Alexander tooke none of it away: but more then that, he sent vnto all his Lieutenantes, Captaines, and Gouernors of contries, wherefoeuer they were, that they should send him copies of all the letters which they before had sent vnto him, because all those which he had were burnt, and commaunded Eumenes to take them againe. After that, Eumenes and Hephestion fell at variance againe, by reason of a gifte that was geuen him, inso much as very fowle wordes passed betwext Hephestion and him: yet did not the king geue Eumenes any ill countenance at that time. Notwithstanding, shortly after Hephestion was dead, the king taking his death grieuouly whom he loued so derely, gaue no good countenance (and was very brieft besides) vnto those whom he knew bare any grudge vnto Hephestion while he liued, & that he thought were glad of his death, but specially vnto Eumenes of all other, whose malice towards Hephestion was known to him well enough: inso much as he would ofte twyt him withall, remembring him of the iniuries he had offred Hephestion. But Eumenes being very wise, and one that could take his time, procured his helpe by the selfe same meane that did him hurte: and deuised (to further Alexanders desire, seeking to honor Hephestions funeral with all pompe possible) newe inuentions to set forth the fame, of more magnificence then had before bene seene, sparing for no cost, laying on money bountifully, to make him a rich and stately tombe. Again, when Alexander was dead, there fell out great variance betwext the MACEDONIAN footemen, and the noble men that had bene neereft about him: and in that quarrell, Eumenes in good will stucke to the Lordes, but in wordes he seemed a newter and friend to both partes saying, it was not for him being a straunger to thrust him selfe into the quarrells of the MACEDONIANS. And when the other Lordes were departed from BABYLON, Eumenes tarying behinde pacified the greatest parte of the souldiers, and made them more tractable and ready to agree with the Lordes. Whereupon, after the Lordes and Captaines had consulted together, and taken order for the contentions, they deuised the gouernment of the prouinces amonge them which they called Satrapaes: in which partition Eumenes had CAPPADOCIA, PAPHLAGONIA, and all that coast vpon Mare Ponticum, vnto the citie of TRAPEZYNTE, the which at that time was not subiect to Thempire of MACEDON, for Ariarathes kept it then as king. Howbeit it was sayd, that Leonatus and Antigonus would put him in possesion of it, with a great and puissant armie, and make him Gouernor there. Yet afterwarde Antigonus made

A none account of Perdiccas letters vnto him, putting him in the head of great imaginations to conquer all, despising all other. And Leonatus also came downe into PHRYGIA, and vnderooke the iorney of this conquest for Eumenes sake. But when he was in iorney, and afterwarde, Hecateus, tyrant of the CARDIANS, went to him to his army, & prayed him rather to goe helpe Antipater and the other MACEDONIANS, which were besieged in the citie of AMANI. So Leonatus being willing to take sea, and go thither, went about to perswade Eumenes also to like of it, and to reconcile him with Hecateus: for they were not frendes one with another, by reason of a quarrell that Eumenes father had with this Hecateus, about the gouernment of their citie. Besides that, Eumenes had many times complained of him openly vnto king Alexander, saying, that he was a tyranne, and besought the kinge that it would please him to sette the CARDIANS at libertie. And therefore Eumenes refusing that iorney against the GRACIANS, alleging that he was afrayed of Antipater, who had bene his enemy of long time, doubting that for the olde grudge he bare him, & also to gratifie Hecateus, he would put him to death: Leonatus then revealed him selfe and his purpose to him, and how he made as though he would passe ouer the sea to ayde Antipater, where in dedde his meaning was to take the kingdom of MACEDON. Thereupon he shewed him letters sent him from Cleopatra, willing him to come to the citie of PALLA, and there she would marry him. When Eumenes was made priuy to his purpose: either because he feared Antipater, or els for that he had no great good opiaion of Leonatus, knowing him to be a sonde man, and very rashe and vnconstant in his doings, he stole away from him by night, with those fewe men he had (being about three hundred horsemen, and two hundred footemen well armed) taking all his gold with him, which amounted to the summe of fise thousand talentes, and fled with them vnto Perdiccas, vnto whom he betrayed all Leonatus intent and minde: whereupon he was immediately of great credit about him, and called to counsell. Shortly after, Perdiccas brought him into CAPPADOCIA, with a great armie which he him selfe did leade. Where Ariarathes was taken prisoner, and Eumenes established Gouernor of the contrie, who deliuered the charge of the great cities vnto his frendes, and left them there Captaines of garrisons which he appointed, placing euery where, Iudges, Receiuers, Gouernors, and all such other officers necessarie as he thought meete, Perdiccas meddling with nothing at all. Notwithstanding, Eumenes went away with Perdiccas againe, as well to wayte apon him, as also because he would euer be about the kinges. But Perdiccas thinking with him selfe that he alone could wel enough performe thenterprise he went about, and considering also that the realme he left behinde him stood needefull of a wife and skilfull Gouernor, whom he might trust with the safety of his state: when they were in CILICIA, returned Eumenes backe againe, vnder colour to send him to his gouernment, but in dede to keepe the realme of ARMENIA in obedience, the which confined apon the frontiers of his contrie whereof he was Gouernor, because Neoptolemus did vnder hand practise some alteration. Now though Neoptolemus was a prowde and insolent person, yet Eumenes still deuised to hold him in, and kept him from attempts, by gentle and fayer wordes. Furthermore, perceiuing also that the regiment of the MACEDONIAN footemen were growen exceeding stowe & insolent: he for a strength & defense against them, set vp a copany of horsemen, & to bring it to passe, released all the contriemen from paying of tribute or taxe, being meete to serue a horsebacke, and bought a great number of horse of seruice, which he gaue amongs them that were about him, in which he put his most trust and affiance, making them coragious, by honors and giftes he gaue to them that serued well, and so by continuall exercise and often removing them from place to place, made them very ready and seruiceable. Thus were the noble men of MACEDON, some much amazed, some others very glad when they sawe how by this diligence Eumenes had in so shorte a time gotten about him such a number, as fise thousand three hundred horsemen. About that time, Craterus and Antigonus hauing subdued the GRACIANS, came on with their army into ASIA to ouerthrow Perdiccas & greates and powers: and newes also, that shortly they would inuade CAPPADOCIA. Whereupon Perdiccas being otherwise occupied in warres, fighting against Ptolomey, made Eumenes his Lieutenaut general, and gaue him commiffion and full authoritie ouer all his souldiers that were for him, either in CAPPADOCIA, or in ARMENIA: and wrote letters vnto Neoptolemus and Alcetas, commanding them by the same that they should be obedient vnto Eumenes, and suffer him to order all matters according to his discretion. Now for Alcetas, he flarty answered, that he would not be at this warre: for the MACEDONIANS vnder his charge were ashamed to take armes against Antipater, and moreover they would not fight against Craterus, but contrarily were bent to receiue him for their Captaine, so much good will they bare him. Neoptolemus on thother side, was as ready to play the traitor, and to doe Eumenes a shrewde turne, as Alcetas was. For being sent for by Eumenes to come to him, where he should haue obeyed him, he set his men in battell ray to fight with him. There did Eumenes reape the first fruite of his wife foresight of the horsemen, which he had set vp to make head against the footemen of the MACEDONIANS. For when his owne footemen were broken and ouerthrowen, he ouercame Neoptolemus, and put him to flight with his horsemen, and tooke all his cariage. Then he made them march in order of battell against the MACEDONIANS, who were disperfed euery where, following the chafe of his footemen, whom they had ouerthrowen. Thus coming upon them in this disorder, he draue them to throw away their weapons, and to yeelde vnto him: and moreover, euery man to take his othe to serue him faithfully in this warre, wherefoeuer he would lead them. Now Neoptolemus gathering a few together that fled, went with them vnto Craterus and Antipater: who sent vnto Eumenes to pray him to take their parte, with condition that he should not onely enioy the contries and prouinces still which he had in gouernment, but furthermore that they would geue him others vnto them, and make him stronger thence: uer he was: besides that by thacceptation of thoffer, he should be taken for Antipaters good friend, where before he was euer reckoned his enemy. Whereunto Eumenes made answer, that hauing alwayes bene Antipaters enemy, he could not of a sodaine become his friend, specially seeing him vse his frendes as enemies: howbeit otherwise that he was very willing to make Craterus peace with Perdiccas, and to restore him againe to his fauor, upon reasonable & indifferent condicions. And furthermore, that if he ment to assaile him, that then he would aide him so longe as he had any breath in his bodie, and would lose life before he would breake his promise. This answer being brought vnto Antipater, they fel to consult at lesure what was to be done. In the meane space, Neoptolemus that fled upon his ouerthrowe, was come vnto them: who told them how the battell was fought, and besought them both venie instantly, (but Craterus chiefly) to geue him aide if it were possible. For the MACEDONIANS were so farre in loue with him, that if they did but see his hatte, and heare him speake, they would all arme them selues and follow him. For, to speake a troth, Craterus was had in great estimation amog the MACEDONIANS: insomuch as after Alexanders death, he was more desired of the common souldiers, than any other Captaine, remembering how often he had for their sakes incurred Alexanders disgrace and displeasure, because he went about to perswade him to leaue the king of PERSIAS maner, whereunto Alexander by lide and lide gaue him selfe: and also for that he maintained and defended the customes of the cuntry of MACEDON, the which euery man through pride and excefse beganne to forsake and contemne. At that time therefore Craterus sent Antipater into CILICIA, and he him selfe with Neoptolemus, went against Eumenes with the best parte of his army, hoping to take him tardy and altogether vnprouided, supposing he would geue him selfe to pleasure and pastime, after so laue a victorie. But Eumenes like a wife and vigilant Captaine had taken such order, that he heard newes time enough of his enemies coming, and had thereupon prepared his men in readines to resist him. Yet was not this the chiefeft point of his skill in warre. For he looked so precisely to his doings, that he did not onely kepe his enemies fro knowledge of any thing that he did, but making his men also to kill Craterus in battell, before they knew against whom they should fight, and to keepe also so dreadfull an enemy from their knowledge: that of all others shewed the passing skill of an expert Captaine. And to worke this feate the better, this was his policie. First, he made a rumor to be spred in his host, how Neoptolemus & Pigres were againe come against him, with certaine horsemen of all forties gathered together, CAPPADOCIANS and PAPHLAGONIANS. And when he thought to haue remoued in the night, a great desire of sleepe came upon him, in the which he had a maruelous strange dreame. For it seemed vnto him that he saw two Alexanders preparing to fight one with an other, either of them leading a batell a batell of footemen, ranged after the MACEDONIAN facion: who coming to geue charge thone upon the other, came the goddess Minerva to aide the one, and Ceres likewise to aide the other. Then him thought that after they had fought a long time together, he whom Minerva aided was ouerthrowen, and that Ceres had gathered eares of corne and made a crowne of them, to geue him that had wonne the field. Hereupon Eumenes perswaded him selfe that this dreame made for him, and promised him victorie, for that he fought for a fertile contrie of corne, where was great plenty of it. For all the fields were sown with corne in euery place, that it was a pleasure to behold it, shewing the benefit of long peace, so see all the corne fields how greene they looked. But whē he vnderthode that the enemies had giuen their souldiers for the signall of battell, Minerva and Alexander then was his first imagination confirmed more then before. Whereupon, he gaue Ceres and Alexander for signall of the battell to his souldiers, and commanded euery man to make them a garlande of wheate eares to weare on their heades, and that they should wreath flowers and nosegayes about their pikes. He was in amide many times to make his trustiest Capitaines priue against whome they should fight, and not alone to trust him selfe withall, to keepe so necessary a thing as that secret: yet in fine, he kept his first resolution, thinking in the safest way, not to commit this danger, but to him selfe. Now when he came to geue battell, he would place neuer a MACEDONIAN directly against Craterus, but set two companies of men of armes that were strangers against him, the which Pharabazus (Artabazus sonne) and Phenix Tenidius did lead. Then he specially commanded, that so soone as they saw the enemies before the, they should straight geue charge, geuing them no leasure to speake nor retire, neither to hearken to any Heraulde or tromper that they should send vnto them: for he feared much that the MACEDONIANS would turne against him, if they once came to know Craterus. Now for him selfe, he led the right wing of his battell, with a troupe of three hundred men at armes, the chiefeft men of all his army, where he should meete full with Neoptolemus fronte. When they had passed a litle hill that stood betwene both battells, Eumenes horsemen following his commandement, ranne with full carriere to fet upon their enemies. Craterus seeing that, was amazed withall, and banned and cursed Neoptolemus that had deceived him in that sorte, informing him that the MACEDONIANS would turne of his side, if they might but once see him: notwithstanding, he prayed them that were about him, to shewe them selues like valliant men that day, and therewithall fiercely set spurres to his horse to meete with his enemies. The encounter was very cruell on either side, and their stauies being broken, they fell straight to their swordes: but that day did not Craterus dihonour the memory of Alexander, for he slue many of his enemies round about him; valliantly repulled them that did assaile him, and many times ouertrewe them. Yet in fine, one of the men of armes of THRACIA gaue him such a blow on the side, that he turned him of his horse, and when he was downe, many passed ouer him. But Gorgyas, one of Eumenes Capitaines knowing him, lighted from his horse, and appointed men about him to garde him: howbeit it was too late, for he was drawing on, and euen in the very pang of death, Eumenes and Neoptolemus on thother side, which had bene mortall enemies of long time, being a fire with an old malice, they fought vp and downe thone for the other. So at the two first courses they could not one light upon thother, but at the third meeting, when they knew one another, then they set spurres to their horses, their swordes drawn, and with great cries gaue charge upon eche other. And their horses met so fiercely together, as if two armed galles had met with their prowes: and both the Capitaines laying the bridles in their horse neckes, closed together, and with both hands strued to plucke of eche others headpeeces, and to rent their polsons from their shoulders. Whilest they were thus tearing eche other, their horses ran from them, and they fell to the ground, one holding the other fast as if they had wrightled together. Neoptolemus got vp first: but as he rose, Eumenes cut the hamme of his legges, & raised him selfe vp withall. Neoptolemus laying him selfe upon one knee, his other legge being very sore hurt, defended him selfe on the ground the best he could, from Eumenes that was on F his feete, but he could geue him no deadly wound: neuerthelesse him selfe had a blow on the necke, that layed him flat on the ground. Then Eumenes inflamed with choller against him, went about to stricke him, and fell a reuiling of him, and being in that furious mood, remem-bred not that Neoptolemus had his sword yet, who hurt him vnder his cuirasses, euen about the groyne, not farre from his priuie partes: howbeit the wounde made Eumenes worse abrayed, then there was cause of hurt, for that Neoptolemus strength was gone before the stroke came, dying presently apon it. Eumenes hauing stripped him found him self very ill, (by reason of his woundes) on his armes and legges, which had many a fore gashe: notwithstanding, he got vp on his horse againe, and rode towards the other wing of his battell, thinking his enemies should bene fighting still. But there being told that Craterus had his deethes wound, he went straight to the place where he lay, and found him yet alive, not past knowledge. Then Eumenes brought him from his horse, and wept, and taking him by the right hande, accursed Neoptolemus that had brought him to that pitiefull state, and had also forced him to be in battell against one of his deereft frendes, to make him the instrument of his vnderdoing. This second battell Eumenes wanne tenne dayes after the first battell obtained, which got him great honor, for that he had discomfited one of his enemies through wisdom, and the other by valiantnes. Buryer this bred him much ill will, not onely of his enemies, but of his frendes also that tooke his paine, when they bethought them, that he being a stranger, had with the weapons and power of the MACEDONIANS them selues, slaine the greatest and most famous Capitaine among them. Now if Perdiccas had bene so happie, as to haue liued and receiued that aduersifement of Craterus death: no doubt he had bene the greatest person of all the MACEDONIANS. But as ill lucke would haue it, within two dayes after that Perdiccas was slaine in a mutinie of his men in BYZANTION, newes came to his army of Eumenes victorie, and also of the death of Craterus. Whereupon the MACEDONIANS were so offended with Eumenes, that incontinently they condemned him to dye, & gaue Antipater and Antipater commission to execute the reuenge. When Eumenes passing by mount Ida (where the king kept a race and brede of horses) had taken away with him as many horses as he would, and had sent letters of aduersifement thereof to the kings ryders: Antipater, as it is reported, smiled, and in mockerie sayd, that he marueled to see Eumenes great care, to thinke that he should either geue or receiue any account of the kings goodes. So Eumenes thought good to fight in the great plaines of LYDIA, especially neere vnto the chiefe citie of SARDIS, because he was the stronger in horsemen, and for that he would make Cleopatra see the power of his armie. Howbeit, being intreated by her (who feared blame of Antipater) he went further into his PHRYGIA, and wintered in the citie of CLABES. But there Polemon, Aleas, and Docius, fell in conuention with him for leading of the army, saying, that they had as much right to leade the army as he. Eumenes answered them, truly here is euen the comon saying vp and downe: desperate men regard no daunger. Now Eumenes hauing promised his souldiers pay within three dayes, to keepe his promise, sold them all the farmes & castles of that contrie, together with the men and bestes of the same, whereof the prouince was fully replenished. Thereupon his Lieutenantes of the bandes hauing bought certaine of them, went and tooke them perforce, through Eumenes engines of battery which he suffred them to carie with him: and hauing taken them, they wear and deuiled the spoyle, paying euery souldier ratably his wages due. This deuise brought him againe in fauor among his souldiers. For certaine papers being founde in his campe cast abroad by his enemies, promising great offices, and a hundred talents besides to any man that killed Eumenes: the MACEDONIANS that serued vnder him were so offended withall, that they presently set downe an order, that from that time forward a thousande of the best souldiers amongst them (which also had charge vnder them) should alwayes garde his person, keeping watche euery night about him, as fell out by turnes one after another. Whereunto they all agreed: & Eumenes gaue them those honors and rewardes, which the kings of MACEDON were wont to geue vnto their frendes, and which they gladly receiued. For through their graunt he had authoritie to geue purple clokes and hattes to whom he thought good, which was the honorablest gift the kinge of MACEDON could geue. It is true that prosperitie maketh simple men high minded, whereby they seeme (though they be not) very honorable, but specially when fortune hath raised them to honor & wealth. But in deede he that is of a noble minde & stout corage is best discerned in aduersitie: for he neuer yeeldeth to any troubles, as appeareth by Eumenes. For when he had lost a battell among the ORONTIANS, in the realme of CAPPADO- any lesure to flie to his enemies for safety, but tooke him, & trusted him vp. And after he had fled for a time, he turned his horse head vpon a sodaine, and leauing his enemies side hand of him that had him in chace, he closely stole by them without their knowledge, & held on ior-nyng so long, vntill he came to the selfe same plaine, where the battell was fought. There he camped, and gathering vp the dead bodies, (the Capitaines by them selues, and the souldiers aparte) he burnt them with the dores, gates, and windowes of all the villages & towncs thereabouts that he could get together: and in steede of tombes for them, he raised vp great heapes of earth. In so much as Antigonus comming thither immediately after, he wondred much at this valiantnes & inuincible corage. Remouing thence, he met with Antigonus cariage, & might easily without daunger haue taken a number of prisoners, as well free as bonds, & haue gotten all the riches & treasure which they had spoyled in so many sundrie warrs, towncs, and countries: howbeit he was afraied that if his souldiers were laden with that spoyle, it would make them more heauy to march, and vnable to flie, but specially more tender to abide to run from place to place a long time together, being the only meane wherein he trusted to come to end this warre. For he made account that Antigonus in the end would be weary of following him so long a time, & therefore that he would turne some other way. Moreover he perceived, that it was vnpossible for him by his authority to keepe the MACEDONIANS from taking for the spoyle, as offered it selfe vnto them: whereupon he commanded them to stay awhile, & baire their horse first, and then that they should go straight to spoile the enemies cariage. But in the meane time he secretly sent a messenger to Menander (who had the charge and conduct of all the cariage) to will him to flie with all speede out of the plaine, and to get him to the hanging of a hill not farre from thence, and safe from horsemen, where they could not be enuironned, and there to fortifie him selfe: sending him word also, that he sent him this aduersifement, for the old frendship & acquaintance that had bene betwene them afore. Menander hearing what daunger he was in, made his men trusse vp their cariage straight. Thereupon Eumenes openly sent certaine light armed men to discouer, & to bring him newes: and therewithall commanded them to arme, and bridle their horses, as if he had ment to haue led them against the enemies. His skowtes were nowe returned, and told him that it was vnpossible either to disfreffe or take Menander, for that he was fled into a place of such strength, & therefore he was not to be come by. Eumenes seemed to be very sory for it, howbeit he led his army from thence notwithstanding. Menander afterwards reported this matter to Antigonus, & the MACEDONIANS that were in his army, who did greatly commend Eumenes, & after that loued him better then euery they did before: because that hauing their child in his hands whom he might haue made slaves, & their wiues also whom he might haue defiled, he spared them all. Howbeit Antigonus to put them out of this humor, told them, ye are deceiued, my frendes: for it was not for your sakes, nor yet to pleasure you, that Eumenes tooke not your wiues, your children, & your goodes, but only for the feare he had to haue shackles on his heeles, to let him from speede flying. So Eumenes departing from thence, fled still before Antigonus, & wandring vp & downe, did him selfe with his souldiers to get them somewhere else, either in deede for that he was careful of them, or for that he was vnwilling to haue such a number about him, being too fewe to fight a battell, and too many to hide his flying. In fine, he went to a strong place of situation called Nora, in the confines of LYCAONIA & CAPPADOCIA, with five hundred horsemen, and two hundred footemen well armed. And when he was come thither also, he gaue euery one leaue to depart that asked him licence, because they could not haue abidden the discomfort of the place, which was very straight, & the lacke of necessary vittells which they must needs haue wanted, if the siege did continue long: & thus departed from them with very good words and louing countenance. Shortly after came Antigonus before the forte, but would not besiege it, before he sent for Eumenes to come to him apon his word. Eumenes answered him, that Antigonus had many of his frendes about him, that after him might come to be the heades of his tribe, & that him selfe on choicer side had not a noble man for whom he fought. And therefore if Antigonus would haue him come and speake with him, that he should send him one of his chiefe frendes in hostage. Again Antigonus being earnest with him, and telling him it was reason he should come to him, for that he was the better man, and of greater power: Eumenes answered him, I will acknowledge none better then my selfe, so long as I can hold my sword in my hand. In the end, Antigonus (according to Eumenes request) sent his owne newe Phylomy into the forte, and then came Eumenes out. At their meeting they both embraced and saluted eche other, as frendes of old acquaintance and familiaritie: and so fell in talke of diuers matters: but all this while Eumenes neuer once made request to departe in safety, neither yet demanded pardon, but only desired the confirmation of his charge & government, and that he might be restored to that which was geuen him. They that were present at their meeting marueled much at Eumenes, & greatly commended his stownes. Now whilest they were thus in talke together, the MACEDONIANS came out of all partes of the campe, to see what manner of man Eumenes was: bicause that after the death of Craterus there was no talke among the MACEDONIAN souldiers, of any Captaine, but of Eumenes. Neuerthelesse, Antigonus fearing they would do Eumenes some mischief, commaunded them alowde to geue backe, and made stones to be throwen amonge them to keepe them of him. All this notwithstandinge he was sayne in the end to put them of with his gard, and to take Eumenes in his armes, and had much a doe to deliuer him safely into his forte againe. After this imparlance, Antigonus compassed this forte of Nora round about with a wall, and left a sufficient number of men to continue the siege, and so went his way with the rest of his army. In the meane time Eumenes remained besieged within this forte, where there was plenty of wheate, water, and salt, but of no other thing that was good to eate, nor swete of taile, to susteine them with their bread. Yet with such as he had, he kept them in good liking that were in house with him. For he made them euey one after an other sit at his bourde with him, and withall did facion out that manner of dyet, with a certaine life and familiarity of pleasaunt deuises to entertaine them at their meate. For besides that he fought to shewe them as pleasaunt a countenance as he could, yet naturally he had a swete fayer face, not looking like a man of warre, that all the dayes of his life had bene trained vp in it: but like a fresh youth, being of such a constitution of bodie, that the excellentest workman that euer was could not better set out all the partes and proportion of a man, then were naturally to be seene in him. His speeche was not harsh nor churlishe, but very mylde, and pleasaunt, as appeareth by the letters he wrote. Now for the siege, there was nothing that more annoyed the besieged, then the narrownes of the forte wherein they were, which was not about two furlonges compass about, and their houses so litle and narrowe, that they could scant turne them in them: and did eate and drinke without any manner of exercise for them selues, or their horse. Now Eumenes to take away the sluggishnesse that groweth by idleness, (a thing most hurtfull to them that are acquainted with trauell and paines) to keepe them in breth, and to make them the lighter to sie, if occasion were offered: put his men into the longest & widest hall he had in his house, (being foureene cubits long to walke vp and downe in) and taught them first of all to march fayer and softly, and then by litle & litle to hasten their pace. For the horses he had, them he made to be girt before, one after an other, & then did softly trife them vp with long pulleyes fastned to the beames: their hindmost feet standing on the ground, & their foremost being aloft. The horses being trified vp in this maner, their riders came with lowde cries behinde them, & some with whippes in their hands to lash them, that the horse being mad withall, yerked out behind, & sprang forward with his foremost legges to touch the ground, that they did but euen raise it a litle, so as euery vaine and sinew of them were strained by this meanes, that they blue, and were all of a some withall, so good an exercise to the it was, as well to put them in breth, as to keepe their legges supple to run. After that, they had their otes very cleane pickt & dressed, that they might digest them the sooner. Antigonus hauing long continued this siege, newes came vnto him that Antipater was dead in MACEDON, & that the realme was in a great broyle, through the factions of Cassander & Polyperchon, Antigonus whose head was straight full of great imaginations, greedily coueting with him selfe the whole kingdom of MACEDON: thought good to make Eumenes his frende, that through his helpe he might attaine his desired purpose. Thereupon he sent Hyeronimus vnto him to treat of peace, and gaue him the forme of the othe which he would haue him sweare vnto him. When Eumenes had seene it, he would not be sworne in that maner, but corrected it, and

A & sayd: that he did referre him selfe to the iudgement of the MACEDONIANS which kept him besieged, to iudge which of those two formes were most meetest: that which Antigonus had sent him, or the same which he had corrected. For in Antigonus forme of othe, there was a litle mention only made at the beginning of the blood royall, but in all the rest following, he bound Eumenes particularly to him selfe. But Eumenes in his forme of othe, did first of all put Olympias the mother of kinge Alexander, and the kinges his sonnes afterwards: and for the rest, he sware he would be frende of the frendes, and enemye of the enemies, not of Antigonus onely, but of the kinges, and of Olympias. The MACEDONIANS being at the siege before Nora, did better like the forme of Eumenes othe, than they did that of Antigonus. So hauing geuen Eumenes his othe, & made him sweare according to that forme: they raised their siege, B and sent also vnto Antigonus to take his othe. All this accomplished, Eumenes redeliuered the CAPPADOCIANS their hostages, (which he had kept in Nora with him) and they that came for them, gaue him in their steade, horse of warre, bestes of cariage, tentes and paultions. Thus he beganne to gather his men againe together, which were disperfed abroad after his ouerthrowe, so that in fewe dayes he was about a thousande horsemen, with whom he fled, fearing yet Antigonus, and he did wisely. For Antigonus had not onely commaunded them to hurte him vp againe straighter then he was before: but besides that wrote sharpe letters and verie angrily vnto the MACEDONIANS, which had accepted the correction of the othe. Whilest Eumenes wandered vp & downe flying still, he receiued letters from certaine in MACEDONIA (fearing Antigonus greatnesse) and specially from Olympias: which sent vnto him C to come into MACEDON, to take the charge and gouernment of her young sonne Alexander, whome they fought to put to death. Furthermore, he likewise receiued letters from Polyperchon and from king Philippe, who commaunded him to make warre with Antigonus with his armie he had in CAPPADOCIA, and to put in his purse of the kinges, five hundred silver talents (which had bene taken from him before) which were in the citie of CYNOPS, and besides, to defraye the charges of the warres, as much as he thought meete. And therewithall also they wrote vnto Antigenes and Teutamus, the two Captaines of the Argyrasides: to wit, the souldiers with the silver shieldes, or shieldes siluered, which were of the olde bandes of Alexanders armie. These two Captaines hauing receiued these letters, did vfe Eumenes with very good wordes, & shewed him great countenance: yet a man by their looks might D easily coniecture that they eniued him, for either of them both thought them selues men sufficient, and worthe to commaunde Eumenes, not to aide him. Howbeit Eumenes behaued him selfe very wisely. For as touching their eniue, he pacified that, bicause he tooke not the money which he was comaunded to take for his owne vse, for that he had no neede of it. And as for their ambition and presumption, disdaining to be commaunded by him, though they could neither tell howe to commaunde nor obey: he did reclaime them, by a superstition he layd before them, which was this. He made them beleue that Alexander did appeare to him in his sleepe, and that he shewed him a paultion sumptuously sette out in the state and magnificence of a king, in the which was a royall throne: and tolde him, that if they would keepe their counsell place in that paultion, he would be present among them, and ayde them E in all their counells and conduct of their warres, so that they would alwayes begimme by him. He easily perswaded Antigenes and Teutamus to beleue that which he spake, who would not geue to him to consult of any matters: neither did he thinke it honorable for him selfe to be seene to go to other mens gates. Wherefore with all their consents they incontinently set vp a goodly rich paultion, which was called Alexanders paultion: and there they kept their counells and assemblies for dispatch of all their weightiest causes. After this, they went towards the hie contries and met with Pencestus on the way, (Eumenes very great frende) who ioyned with them, and other great pieres of the realme, with all their power besides. This did greatly strengthen the armie of the noble men of MACEDONIA, as touching the number of men, and their braue armors and furniture: but for their owne persones, bicause they had no man F to commaunde them since the death of Alexander, they were growen selfe willed by diffolue libertie, and effeminate in their maner of life: and moreover they had gotten a tyrannicall fiercenesse, nourished & increased by the vanities of the barbarous people. So that many of them being then together, could not be quiet one with an other, but shamefully flattered the old bandes of the MACEDONIAN souldiers, geuing them money, and making them banquettes and feastes of sacrifices. And thus in shorte time, of a campe they brought it to be a dissolute rauerne, where the noble men got the souldiers fauor that they might be chosen chieftaines of all the armie : like as the common peoples voyces are bought in free cities (where the people doe rule) to be preferred to honorable states and offices of the common wealth.

Now Eumenes found straights that these pieres of the realme disdained one another, howbeit that they all feared and mistrusted him, and fought but for oportunitie to kill him. Wherefore to preuent this, he made as though he had occasion to occupie money, and so borrowed a great summe of the especially, whom he knew most hated him : to the end that from thenceforth they should no more distrust, but trust him, standing in feare to lose the money they had lent him. And thereof followed a straunge thing : for other mens money and goodes, was the safetie of his life. For where others geue money to saue their liues, he by taking of money saued his owne life. Now for the souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, whilest they sawe they were without danger of enemies to make them afraied, they stil hong upon them that gaue them, being desirous to be made Generall : and came euery morning to their vprising to waite upon them, and follow them whersoever they went. But when Antigonus was come to campe hard by them with a great and puissant army, and that their case required then a valliant Captaine and skilfull leader : not the souldiers alone, but all the pieres and states besides, (which in peace did braue it out) did then willingly (without motion made) submit them selues vnto Eumenes, to be at his commaundment. For when Antigonus assailed all the wayes he could to passe ouer the riuier of Pastigris, the pieres which were layed in diuers places to let him from passing ouer, heard nothing of it, so that there was none but Eumenes onely that resisted him, and fought with him : where he slewe such a number of his men, that he filled the riuier with them, and tooke foure thousande of them prisoners. Againe, when Eumenes was sicke, these olde bandes did more plainly shew, what opinion they had of him, and of others : to wit, that they could banquet them, and make them good cheere at their houses, yet that Eumenes onely of all other was worthiest to be their Capitaine, and to commaunde them. For Pencestus havinge feasted them in the kingdom of PERSIA, and geuen euery souldier a mutton to sacrifice, thought he had wonne great fauor & credit among them. But shortly after, as the army marched against their enemies, Eumenes by misfortune fell dangerously sicke, & therefore would needes be caried in a litter farre from the campe, to be out of the noyse, because he could take no rest. But they had not gone farre, before they saw their enemies, which hauing passed ouer certaine litle hills betwene them, were comming downe into the valley. When the souldiers sawe the glistering of the gilt armors of their enemies, that glared in the sunne, and the good order they marched withall in battell ray, the Elephanes with the towers upon their backs, and the men at armes with their purple coates upon their armors : (which was the apparell they wore when they went to fight with their enemies) then the foremost stayed upon it, and cried out, willing them to send for Eumenes to lead them, for they would els goe no further if they had not him for their Generall. And therewithall they raised their pykes, & layed downe their shieldes at their feete, calling from one to another to stay, & to their priuate Capitaine also, and told them plainly, that they would not flurre a foote from thence, nor fight at all, vntill Eumenes were among them to lead them. Eumenes hearing of it, came to them with great speede, hastening his slaues and littermen to bring him thither : and then opening his litter on euery side, he held out his right hand to the souldiers, and tolde them he was very glad of the good opinion they had of him. The souldiers also so soone as they saw him, saluted him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, and tooke vp their shieldes, clapping them against their pykes with a great shoute, bidding their enemies come when they would, they should be fought withall, now that their Capitaine was among them. Antigonus on thother side, being informed by certaine prisoners which his souldiers had taken in skermish, that Eumenes was fallen very fore sicke, and by reason thereof was caried in a litter : thought now he should haue no great a doe to discomfit the rest of the army, and therefore made all possible speede he could to fight. But when he came so neere, that he might easily see the order and countenance of his

A his enemies, who were set in such good order of battell, that it could not any wayes be amended : he was much amafed withall, and pawled a great while, and in the meane time spied Eu-menes litter a farre of, caried from one end of the battell to the other, wherat he laughed out allowed, as his maner was, and turning him selfe to his frendes, sayd. See, sayd he, I beleue it is that litter that maketh warre with vs, and doth offer vs battell. But with those wordes, he founded the retreat, & brought his men backe againe into his campe. When this feare was a litle passed ouer, the MACEDONIANS fell to their olde trade againe, the pieres to flatter the souldiers, and the souldiers to waxe braue and stowte against their Capitaines : so that when they came to take their garrisons for the winter time, they deuided in maner among them the whole contrie of the GABENIANS, the first from the last being lodged almost a shewland furlonge of. Which Antigonus vnderstanding, determined to set upon them, they mistrusting nothing. And so went sodainly towards them, by a shorter way then that he had already commen, but the worse way a great deale, and where no water was to be had : in hope that if he met them thus disperfed asunder, their Capitaines could not readily assemble them all together. But while he was in this iorney, in the desert crooked way, he was so ouertaken, and with such boysterous windes and extreame bitter cold, that his souldiers could go no further, but were forced to tary stil, to provide them present remedy against the fury of the time. Now the onely remedy they had, was to make numbers of fires : and by them their enemies knewe of their comming. For the barbarous people inhabiting the mountaines towards the desert, being amafed to see such a number of fires in the valley, sent presently with speede upon two Camells light laden, to aduertise Pencestus, who being nereft vnto the mountaine was so scared with these newes, that he was at his wittes end, not knowing what to doe. For, seeing his other companions as much afraied as him selfe, he fled upon it, and caried all them with him which he met in his way. But Eumenes quieted this great feare, assuring them that he would stay the sodaine attempt of their enemies, and that they should come three dayes later than they looked for : which they beleued. Then did Eumenes sende messengers into euery quarter to all the Capitaines, commaunding them speedily to put their men in readinesse, and to meete him at a certaine place which he appointed. Him selfe in the meane time went with other Capitaines to choose a fit ground to lodge a campe, the which might easily be seene from the toppe of the mountaines, which they must passe that come from the desert : & there D fortified the same with trenches, and deuided it out into quarters, making fire in euery place, such a distance of one from another, as they vse commonly to make in a campe. It was no sooner done, but Antigonus came to the toppe of the mountaines, and sawe these fires a farre of, which grieved him much : for he thought that his enemies had longe before knownen of his comming, and that they came against him. Being afraied therefore least his enemies would compell him to fight, comming fresh upon him, his owne men being weary and done with the paines they had abidden, comming through that desert contrie : he tooke his way to lead backe his armie, not the neereft way by the which he came, but through the contry richly inhabited and replenished with great cities and good townes, to refresh his ouerwearyed people. Yet seeing he had none alarmes geuen, nor any skermishes offered him, (as they vse commonly when both armies are neere together) and that the valley men told him that they had seene none other armie but his, sauing that round about there was store of fires : then he straight mistrusted that it was one of Eumenes stratagemes of warre, wherewith he had decei-ued him. And therewithall he was in such a rage, that he went straight to the place where he thought to finde him, determining no more to steale upon him, but to put all to the hazard of a battell. But in the meane time, the most parte of the hoast was gathered about Eumenes, for the great estimation euery man had of his wisdom and sufficiency : in so much that they agreed and ordained, that he only as their Lieutenaunt generall should commaund the whole army.
This spited the two Capitaines of the Argyraspides, Antigenes & Tentamus, who bare him such an inward grudge, that from that time forth, they practised his death : & assembling together F with many of the states & particular Capitaines, they sat in counsell to know when, & in what forte they should kill him. Howbeit the most voices assembled in this counsell, were whole of opinio, that they should take the benefit of his seruice in leading the battell, & that immediatly after they should put him to death. This being thus resolved upon, Eudamus Captaine of the Elephants, and another called Phedimus, went secretly and told Eumenes what they had concluded upon in the assembly against him, not for any good will that they bare him, or for that they fought to pleasure him, but only because they were afraid to loose the money they had lent him. Eumenes gave them great thanks, and commended their fidelity, and then reported it vnto his best frendes, and tolde them: you see howe I am enuironned with a troupe of wilde and brutish beastes. That done, he made his will, and tare all the letters and writings that had bene sent him, because he would not haue them suffer for him after his death, that had sent him secret aduertisements. Afterwards when he had disposed of all his priuate matters in this sorte, he stooode in a doute whether he should lose the battell geuing his enemies the victorie, or whether it were better for him to flie into CAPPADOCIA, through MEDIA and ARMENIA. Howbeit he resolved of nothing before his frendes. But when the mischief he was in had put diuers thoughtes into his head, in fine he determined to fight, and did fet his army in battell ray, perswading the GRÆCIANS as well as the barbarous people to stand to it like men. And as for the olde fouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, they so litle needed exhortation, that they them selues did exhorte Eumenes to be of good corage, saying: that their enemies would neuer abide them, because they were all the oldest fouldiers, and of greatest experience, that had bene in all the conquestes of kinge Philippe, and of his sonne Alexander, and that it was neuer heard that they had bene ouerthrowen in any sette battell, the most of them being three score and tenne yeares olde, and the youngest no lesse then three score. Whereupon, when they ranne with great furie to geue charge upon their enemies, they cried out a lowde speaking to the fouldiers of the MACEDONIANS that were vnder Antigonus: Ah wretches, come ye to fight with your fathers? And so assailing them with a lustie corage, and in a rage withall, in a shorte space ouerthrew the squadron of their enemies, & slue the most parte of them in the field. Thus was Antigonus armie cleane ouerthrowen on that side: but on the other side where his men of armes were, through Peucestus cowardlinesse (that handled him selfe very ill at that battell) he had the vpper hande, and wanne all their cariage, through his foresight in the greatest furie of the battell, and the strength of the place where the battell was fought. For it was a maruelous great plaine of length, neither too deepe, nor yet to hard vnder foote, but couered ouer with a small fine sand, much like to the drie sand the sea casteth vp, & leaueth upon the shore. This sand being scattered abroad by riding and going to & fro of so many thousandes of men and horses during the time of the battell foughten, had raised such a mightie dust and white smoke in the element, as if they had sturred or tempered white lime together, which troubled their sight so fore, as they could see nothing before them: in respect whereof Antigonus might easily lease all their cariage, them selues being neuer a whit the wiser. The battell being cometo this passe you haue heard, Tentamus sent presently vnto Antigonus, to pray him to redeliuer them their cariage againe, which he had taken & caried into his campe. Antigonus made him aunswere, that he would not only redeliuer the goods vnto the ARGYRASPIDES, but would moreover vie them with all the fauor he could, so farre forth as they deliuered Eumenes into his handes. Whereupon the ARGYRASPIDES tooke presently a wicked resolution, to deliuer him aliuie into the handes of his enemies. And with that determination they came neere vnto him, not makinge any countenance as though they would lay handes on him, but rather seeming to garde and defend his person as their manner was: some of them lamenting that their goods were gone: others telling him that he cared not now that he had wonne the battell: and others accusing the noble men of cowardlines, saying that the fault was in them that they had not the whole victorie. But in fine, one of the hauing spied his time, flew to him, and tooke his sword out of his hande: the others straight layed hold of him, and bound both his handes behinde him with his owne girdle. Antigonus vnderstanding it, sent Nicanor thither to take him out of their handes, and to bring him to him. Then Eumenes hauing made request vnto them to suffer him to speake, as they brought him through the bandes of these olde MACEDONIAN fouldiers: it was granted him with condition, that he should make no motion vnto them to turne from that they were determined to doe, but to tell them of thinges, which (as he sayd) tended greatly to their benefite. Whereupon silence

of Eumenes:
to the maister Argyraspides

A being made, he got vp vpon a litle hillocke, and there spake vnto them, putting forth his handes being bound: O wretched and faithlesse men, the wickedest that euer made mans bred. What so great triumphe, or victorie, hath euer Antigonus wonne of you, hauing sought it such infinite wayes: and you your selues doe now put into his handes, deliueing him your Capitaine bound and manacled? Will not this be to your great shame, that being masters of the field, you will graunt the honor of the victory vnto your enemy, only for a litle courtesies sake of money and paltry stuffe which you haue lost? And yet is not this all, but the worst behinde: to send your Capitaine as you do to pay the ranfome of your baggage. For my selfe, though now they lead me bound, yet doe I remaine free vntoercome, vanquisher of mine enemies, & sold by them that should be my frendes. Well, yet this request I only make vnto you, in the name of Iupiter, protector of armes, and for the honor of the goddess, (vnto whom all vowed othes ought faithfully to be kept) I pray and coniuere you, to kill me your selues in this place. For all cometh to one end. To be slaine in Antigonus campe by the hands of mine owne enemies, will euer be counted your deede: and you may be assured he will not be angrie withall, for he only desireth Eumenes death, and not his life. If you will needes hold your handes from this attempt, vnlesse yet one of youe only: that shall suffice to doe the feate. And if for feare ye will not put a sword in my hande, throw me bound yet handes and fettes vnto wilde beastes: which if ye performe, then doe I discharge you of your othe taken betwene both my handes, which ye haue sworne vnto your Capitaine as holily and perfectly performed. Upon this speeche of Eumenes, all the rest of the army had compassion of him, that they wept for tender affection. But the ARGYRASPIDES cried out to carry him away, and not to geue eare to his preaching: and that it was a good deede to punish this wicked CHERRONSIAN, according to his desertes, considering that he had turneoyled the MACEDONIANS with endless warre and battell. And moreover, that it were too much shame that the worthiest fouldiers that euer serued kinge Philippe & Alexander, so painfully in all their warres, should for recompence of their seruice in their olde age be turned a begging, their wiues hauing now lyen three nightes with their enemies. With those wordes, they violently draue him on towards Antigonus campe, who fearing least the multitude of people that ranne to see him, would smother him in the prease, because euery man ranne out of the campe: he sent thither tenne of the strongest Elephanes he had, and a good number of men of armes of the MEDES and PARTHIANS, to make way for him in the prease. When Eumenes was now come into Antigonus campe, his hart would not serue him to see him in that miserable state, for that they had once bene so familiarly acquainted together. Whereupon, such as had him in their custodie, came to Antigonus to aske him, how he would haue him kept. Who answered them: like a Lyon, or an Elephant. Yet within a while after he tooke pite of him, and discharged him of his weightiest irones, and sent one of his household seruants to him to see him well vied, and suffered his frendes to come & bring him any thing he lacked. Thus did Antigonus deferre many dayes, before he would determine ought of Eumenes, hearing euery man speake, and pondering their purposes and severall opinions. Nearchus CRETAN, and his owne sonne Demetrius spake for Eumenes, and made sure to save his life, contrarie to all the other Lorde and Captaines that were about Antigonus, who would in any case haue him dye. Eumenes standing in these termes, asked his keeper Onomarchus one day, what Antigonus ment, that hauing his enemy in his handes, he did not quickly tie him out of his paine, or nobly deliuer him? Onomarchus chushtly answered him againe, that the time was past now to shewe his corage, as though he feared no death: and that he should haue shewed it in the field at the battell. So helpe me Iupiter (quod he) so haue I done, and if thou beleuest not me, aske them that set apon me: for I neuer met with anyer more strong then my selfe. Onomarchus replied againe: sith now therefore thou hast found a stronger than thy selfe, why then canst thou not abide his pleasure? In fine, when Antigonus had reloued of his death, he commaunded them to geue him no more meare: and thus taking his steuenance from him, Eumenes was three dayes a dying. In the meane time came such newes: that sodainly the campe remoued: and therefore before their departure, a man was sent to Eumenes to dispatch him out of his paine. Antigonus licensed his frends to take his body and burne it, and then to gather his ashes and bones to send them to his wife & children. Eumenes:

being slaine in this manner, the gods appointed some other iudges to reuenge the disloyaltie and treason of the ARGYRASPIDES and their Capitaines, for betraying of Eumenes, but Antigonus selfe: who desirring them as cruell murderers, and periuering persones to the gods, appointed Thyrinus Gouvernor of the prouince of ARACHOSIA, to kill them euery one his owne sonne what way he coulede, that none of them might euer see MACEDON againe, nor the Greekes the sea.

THE COMPARISON OF Eumenes with Sertorius.

Here haue we set downe the thinges worthe memorie of Eumenes and Sertorius: Nowe to compare them together, in this they were both alike: that they being strangers in a straunge contrie, and banished out of their owne, had alwayes bent Capaines of diuers nations, and chieftaines of great and warlike armies. But this was proper to Sertorius, that all those of his faction gaue him the chieftest place of authoritie, as the most sufficientest man among them, and worthiest to commaund: where Eumenes hauing many that contended against him for the chiefe rule and conduction of the armie, through his noble deedes, obtained the chiefe place and authoritie in the same. So that they obeyed the one, desiring to be gouerned by a good Capaine: & for their owne safety gaue place to the other, seeing them selues vnable to commaund. For Sertorius being a ROMANE, gouerned the SPANYARDS and LVSITANIANS: and Eumenes a CHERONESIAN, the MACEDONIANS. Of the which, the SPANYARDS of long time had bene subiect to the Empire of ROMES: and the MACEDONIANS at that time had subdued all the worlde. Furthermore, Sertorius beinge then of great estimation for that he was a Senator of ROMES, and had had charge of men of warre before, came to the dignitie & estate to be chieftaine of a great army. Where Eumenes came with small reputation, disdained for that he was but a secretarie: and when he began to come forwardes, had not only lesse meanes to preferre him then Sertorius had, but greater lets & impedimentes also, to hinder his rising and estimation. For many openly ffooded against him, and secretly conspired his death: and not as Sertorius, whom no man contrariied from the beginning, vntill his latter ende, when certaine of his companions secretly conspired against him. Therefore Sertorius ende of all his daungers, was to overcome his enemies: where Eumenes greauest daungers came through his victories, which he wanne of his owne men, through the malice of them that enuid his honor. Nowe for their deedes of armes, they are both in manner alike: but on the other side for their conditions, Eumenes naturally loued warre and contention: and Sertorius embraced peace & quietnes. For Eumenes that might haue liued in safety with honor, if he would but haue geuen place to his betters, and forsaken the warres: liked

A better with the daunger of his life to followe martiall feates; with the greatest personages of MACEDON, and in the end so came to his death. Sertorius contrarily being vnwilling to come in trouble, was forced for the safetie of his person to take armes against them, that would not let him liue in peace. For had not Eumenes bene so ambitious and stowe to strive against Antigonus for the chieftest place of authoritie, but could haue bene contented with the seconde, Antigonus would haue bene right glad thereof: where Pompey would neuer so much as suffer Sertorius to liue in rest. So, the one made voluntary warre only to rule, and the other against his wil was compelled to rule, because they made warres with him. Whereby it appeareth that Eumenes naturally loued warre, preferringe the courtois desire of a better estate, above the safetie of his life: and the other as a right souldier, vied the warres only for a meane to faue his life by valiant defence of armes. Furthermore, the one was slaine, mistrusting no treason against him: and the other, looking euery howe for present death threatened him. Whereof the one argued a noble minde, not to mistrust them whom he thought his frendes: and the other shewed a faint hart, being taken when he ment to flie. So Sertorius death dishonored not his life, suffering that of his owne companions, which his deadly foes could neuer make him suffer. The other hauing no power to auoide his destinie before he was taken, and hauing sought meanes to liue being in prison and captiuitie: could neither patiently nor manfully abide his death. For, begging life at his enemies handes, he gaue him his hart with his body, who before had but his body in his power.

Sertorius death more honest, then the death of Eumenes.

THE LIFE OF Agessilavus.

Archidamus the sonne of Zeuxidamus, hauing honorably reigned in LACEDEMON, left two sonnes behind him: Agis which he begate of that noble Lady Lamprido, & Agessilavus a great deale younget, which he had by Eupolia, Melissippidas daughter. So the kingdom falling by succession vnto Agis the elder, the younger sonne Agessilavus remaining a priuate person, was brought vp after the LACONIAN manner, which was a straight kind of life: but withal it taught children how to obey. Whereof it is thought the Poet Simonides calleth SPARTAN, Damagambrosos to wit, making men ciuill: for that by continuance of custome, it frameth the citizens to be obedient to the lawes, as much, or more, than any other city that euer was in the world, taming them from their childhoode, as they doe young colts. The law dispensed with the heires apparant to the crowne, from that straight subiection & hard life: but Agessilaus had that excellencie in him aboue all others of his estate, that he came to the dignity and honor to commaund, hauing from his youth learned to obey. The which undoubtedly was the cause, that he knewe better than any other king, howe to please and beare with his subiectes, helping his royall estate & princely behavior, grafed in him by nature, with that curtesie and familiarity which he had attained by education. At that time when he went in company with the boyes which were brought vp together, Lysander fell in loue with him, wondering at the modesty of his wit. For hauing better spirit, and being more constant in his opinion, than any of the other children, struing euer to excell in all things, with such a vehemency he tooke all trauels in hande, that it was vnpossible to ouercome him, much lesse to compell him. He was on thother side so milde & gentle, that euery courteous word wrought in him better obedience, than any feare could doe: because it grieved him more to be reprovued, then to take upon him any paine or labor. And for the deformitie of his legge, the one being shorter than the other, in the flower of his youth, through his pleasaunt wit, he vsed the matter so pleasantly and patiently, that he would merily mocke himselfe: which maner of mery behavior did greatly hide the blame of the blemish. Yea further, his life & courage was the more commendable in him, for that men sawe that notwithstanding his lamenes, he refused no paine nor labor. Of his person we haue drawn no counterfeate, because he would not in any wise haue it drawn, and did exprefly commaund by his will, that they should neither draw his picture, nor make any mould or image of his body. Howbeit we finde that he was of small stature, wherby his presence promised no great matters to them that beheld him. Yet for that he was euer mery and pleasaunt, and neuer pensiue nor troublesome in word nor looke, euen to the last ende of his life he was better loued, then the most fayer creature that liued. Notwithstanding, the Ephori (as Theophrastus writeth) did condemne king Archidamus in a summe of money because he married a liue woman: saying that he would beget them deny kinges, no kinges in deede. In the time that his eldest sonne Agis reigned king, Alcibiades being banished Athens, fled out of Sicily into Lacedæmon, and had not long remained in Sparta before they suspected him, that he kept king Agis wife, called Timea: for which cause Agis would not acknowledge the child (she brought to be his soone, saying that Alcibiades had begotten him. But Timea cared not much for it, as Durandus writeth: for otherwhile as the fate amongst her women, softly she called him Alcibiades, not Leotychides. On thother side they report, that Alcibiades him selfe sayd, it was for no hurt he ment to any man, that he lay with Queene Timea, but only for the desire he had that some of the kinges of Lacedæmon should be gotten of his seede. Neuertheles at the length he was driuen to forsake Lacedæmon, mistruing king Agis, who euer after doubted of the child, & thought him a bastard: vntill such time as being on his death bed, Leotychides falling on his knees, wept, and so behaued him selfe, that Agis before many witness, said he did acknowledge him for his sonne. This notwithstanding, when king Agis was dead, Lysander that had then ouercome the Athenians by sea, & was more in credit & authority in the city of Sparta, than any other practised to put the crowne upon Agessilaus head, saying, that Leotychides had no interest vnto it, because he was a bastard. The like did diuers other citizens say of him, which loued Agessilaus vertue, and liked him passingly, for that he had bene brought vp from his childhoode amongst them. But on the contrary parte also, there was a Soothsayer or wisard in Sparta, called Diopithes, that had a number of old prophecies without booke, & was accounted a very skillfull man touching prophecies and diuinations. He maintained that it was not lawfull for any lame man to be king of Sparta: and for prooffe thereof he told this auient oracle before the counsell.

As statels as thy stomake is o Sparta take good heede,

And stand vpon thy gard, and looke about thee I thee reede.

For halting one day downe vntill cast thine Empire to the ground,

By meane of vvarres and troubles great that shall inclose thee round.

Lysander replied against it, saying, that if the Spartans were afrayed of this oracle, they should rather beware of Leotychides. For the goddes cared not, if any man lame of a foote aspired

Aspired to be king: but rather if he were a bastard, and not lineally descended of the race of Heracles. For that, sayd he, were to make the kingdom halte. Agessilaus furthermore alleaged, that the god Neptune him selfe had witnessed, that Leotychides was a bastard: for he draue Agis by an earthquake, to runne out of his wiuces chamber, and that tenne monethes after that, and more, Leotychides was borne. So was Agessilaus upon these allegacions not onely proclaimed king of Sparta: but he had geuen him moreouer, as lawfull heire, all his brother Agis goods, and Leotychides reiecte as a bastard. Notwithstanding, considering that his parentes by his mothers side were very poore, (yet honest men) he left them the moyty of all the goodes: by which act, Agessilaus wanne all their good willes, where else they had enuied him for his succession in the kingdom. And (as Xenophon sayth) by obeying his contrie, he grew to such power that he might doe whatsoeuer he would. The Ephori and Senatours at that time bare all the sway and government of the common wealth, the Ephores office chaunging yearly, the other being for life: the which Ephori were only ordained to bridle the insolency of the kings, for that they should not (as we haue more amply writen in Lycurgus life) haue absolute power in their handes. Vpon this occasion, the kinges that succeeded in the government, had (as it were) by inheritance, a present grudge and malice against them. This notwithstanding, Agessilaus tooke a contrary course to all his predecessors. For where others presently quarrelled with the Ephori and Senatours, Agessilaus did honor and reuerence them, and would neuer dispatche any matter without their priuaty, but was alwayes ready to goe when they did send him. When he was set in his chaire of state to geue audience, if any of the Ephori chaunted to come in, he would rise vp vnto them: and at the election of any new Senatour, he would for honors sake present him a gowne, and an oxe. And thus cunningly seeming to honor and increase the dignity of the Senatours, winning their good wills, he made his power great, & the realme much greater. Furthermore, his behavior towards the rest of his contymen was such, as his enmity was lesse faulty the his frendship. For he did neuer hurt his enemies without iust cause, but he aided his frends euen in vniuall causes. And whereas he thought it a shame not to honor enemies, when they had done well: he could not finde in his hart to rebuke his frends when they did amisse, but rather gloried in succoring & helping of them in their euill doings. For he thought it no shame to serue his frends turne, howe soeuer it were. Again, when any of his aduerfaries offended, he was as sory for it as any man, and as readie to beare with it if he were intreated: whereby he allured and wanne the hartes of all men. The Ephori seeing that, and fearing his power, punished him in money for that he made the common loe of his contrie priuate to him selfe. For, as naturall Philosophers holde opinion, that if contention and strife were taken out of nature, it would come to passe that the heavenly bodies should stand still, and also that the generation of all things should be at a stay, by reason of the mutuall agreement betwene the worlde and them: euen so, the lawemaker of Lacedæmon seemeth to haue allowed ambition & strife in the common wealth, as a spur to vertue, by procuring alwayes some contention and emulation amonge great persones. And his reason was that this base and effeminate fauor, in winking one at another, when men are to be rebuked, ought not of right to be called by the name of concord. And sure some thinke that Homer also law the same, for he would neuer else haue made Agamemnon to haue reioyced to see Phylis and Achilles at great wordes together, if he had not bene of opinion, that enuy and contention amonge great men, were very available for the common wealth. Yet is not this thus simply to be allowed: for contentions are hurtfull to cities, where they are violent: and doe bring great daungers with them. Nowe when Agessilaus was entred into his kingdom of Lacedæmon, newes were brought him out of Asia, that the king of Persia prepared a great navy to conquer the Lacedæmonians signory by sea. Lysander being glad of this occasion, longing to be sent againe into Asia to succour his frends whom he had left there as Gouvernors & Lieutenants of cities & provinces (of the which, some of them were driuen away by their citizens, others also put to death for abusing of their authority & ruling ouercruelly) perswaded Agessilaus to goe into Asia, to make warre upon this barbarous king, farre from Greece, before his army were gathered together. And to cōpasse this the easilier, he wrote vnto his frends in Asia that they should send vnto Sparta, to require Agessilaus for their Captaine, and so they did. Thereupon Agessilavus going to the assembly of the people, accepted the charge, with condition that they would geue him thirtie Capitaines of the SPARTANS to be countellers & assistants to him in these warres, two thousand free IOTES, & six thousand of the confederates of LACEDÆMON. All this was immediately granted through Lysander's frendshippe towards him, and he was sent away straight with the thirty Capitaines which he had requested: of the which Lysander was the chiefeft, not only for his riches and authoritie, but also for the good will he bare vnto Agessilavus: who thought him selfe more beholding to him for procuring him this charge, than for his frendship he shewed him in bringing him to be king. Now Agessilavus army being assembled at the haufen of Geræstæ, him selfe with certaine of his frends went vnto the cite of AVLIDE, where in his sleepe he drempt that one sayd vnto him: O king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, thou knowest that neuer none but Agamemnon, & now thy selfe, was chosen Generall of all GREECE, considering therefore that thou commaundest the same people he did, that thou makest warres with the selfe same enemies, departing from the selfe same place to goe thither, it is reason that thou make the selfe same sacrifice vnto the goddesse, the which he made at his like departure. Agessilavus straight upon this vision, remembered that Agamemnon through the perswasion of the Soothsayers did sacrifice his owne daughter in the same place. Yet this made him not afrayed, but the next day he told it to his frendes, and said he would sacrifice that vnto the goddesse, which he thought would please her well enough, and that he would not followe that cruell deuotion of this auncient Capitaine Agamemnon. And with that, he brought a hynde crowned with a garland of flowers, and commaunded his Soothsayer to sacrifice her: and would not suffer him to haue the honor to doe the sacrifice, that was appointed for the same purpose by the Governours of BOEOTIA, according to the custome of that place. The Governours of BOEOTIA vnderstanding it, were much offended, and sent their officers to will Agessilavus not to doe any sacrifice there, contrary to the law and custome of their contrie. The officers that were sent, performed their commission: and finding that the beast was slaine, & the quarters of it upon the altier, theyooke and flong them of the altier euery way. This vexed Agessilavus being readie to imbarke, and departed thence in choller against the THEBANS, and mistrusted much his good successe by this vnluckie prediction, which seemed to prognosticate vnto him, that he should not preuaile according to his desire. Furthermore, when he was arriued at EPHEVS, he presently misliked the honor he sawe done vnto Lysander, and the great traine that waited on him. For all the contriemen there repaired continually to his house, that when he came abroade, they all followed him wherfoeuer he went: as though Lysander had in deede bene in authority to doe what he would, and that Agessilavus only had but the name to be general, so appointed by the law of LACEDÆMON. For in troth there was neuer GREEKIAN Capitaine in those partes that had won him such estimation, nor that was more feared than he: nor there was neuer man that was more beneficial to his frends, neither also that was more hurtfull to his enemies. All these things being fresh in memorie, the contriemen of that contrie perceiuing the simplicitie of Agessilavus, and howe he was geuen to please the people, and caried no great maiestie nor countenance with him, and obseruing in Lysander that wanted roughness and sharpe speech wherewith they had bene acquainted before: euery man obeyed him, and nothing was done but what he commaunded. This first of all made the other SPARTANS angrie, for that it appeared they were come as it were to serue Lysander, and not as to counsell the king: but after that, Agessilavus him selfe also grew discontented, although of his owne nature he was not enuious nor forie to see others honored besides him selfe. Yet being a man ambitiously geuen, and of a noble courage, fearing if he should doe any noble exploit in this warre, that they would impute it vnto Lysander, for the great estimation he was of: he first beganne to deale in this sorte with him. First he contrariet all his counsell: and what matters soeuer he preferred, which he was desirous should haue taken effect, Agessilavus would none of that, but tooke some other in hand. Furthermore, if any of Lysander's followers came to make fute to him for his fauor, perceiuing that they did leane vnto Lysander: he sent them away without any thing done for them. In like case also in matters of iudgements, if Lysander were against any, they were fure to haue the matter passe on their side. On the contrarie parte also, if Lysander bare good will to the partie, and fauored Agessilavus dremes in Avlide.

Lysander's glory diminisheth.

Agessilavus grudges vnto Lysander.

A the cause to gratifie him: they hardly escaped from setting a fine of their heades. Agessilavus continuing these shewes ordinarily of purpose, not by chaunce to one or two, but indifferently to all: Lysander looking into the cause, dissembled not with his frendes, but told them plainly that it was for his sake they had those repulses and wronges, and therefore did counsell them to waite upon the king, and those that had more credit then him selfe. Now Agessilavus supposed he gaue that aduise to make euery man to malice him: wherefore, to despise him the more, he made him distributor of his vittells, (& hauing done so) some say that he spake these words in open presence of many: nowe let them goe and honor my flesh distributor. Lysander being grieved withall, sayd vnto the king: my Lord, you know how to oppresse your frendes. And to doe I sayd Agessilavus, how to keepe them vnder, that would be greater than my selfe. It may be yet, replied Lysander, I haue not done as your grace doth say: yet if you so conceiue of me, put me I beseeche you in some place of charge or office, where I may doe you good seruice without offence. After this talke betwene the, Agessilavus sent him into HALLESPONT, where by practise he tooke prisoner a noble man a PERSIAN, called Spithridates, out of the harmabazum prouince whereof he was Gouernor, and brought him to Agessilavus with a great summe of golde and siluer, and neere about two hundred horemen with him. All this notwithstanding, he forgate not his grudge to Agessilavus, but being offended still, sought opportunitie and meanes to deade the two houses of the priuilege of the kingdome, and to bring it in common to all the other houses of SPARTA: and surely he had made great broyle (in my opinion) in the city of SPARTA, had he not bene preuented by death, in a iorney he made into BOEOTIA. Thus we see, that ambitious mindes obseruing no meane, are in a common weale oftentimes more hurtfull, than beneficial. For though Lysander was in deede intollerable, to shew him selfe so ambitious, and out of time: yet was not Agessilavus ignorant neither, that there were diuers other meanes leafe reprochfull to punish such a noble man, that offended only by greedines of honor. But to tell you my opinion, they were both blinded with one selfe passion: the one not to know his Princes power, & the other not to beare with his frendes imperfection. Now Tisaphernes at the first being afrayed of Agessilavus, made league with him, colourably letting him vnderstand that the king would be content to set the cities of GREECE in ASIA at liberty. Notwithstanding, when he thought he had gathered force sufficient to fight with him, he proclaimed warre. Agessilavus was very well content withall: for the expectation was great of him through all GREECE, that he would doe some noble exploit in this iorney. Moreouer he thought him selfe dishonored for euer, that the tenne thousand GREECIANS which were returned backe from the furthest parte of ASIA, euen vnto the sea Maior (vnder the conduct and leading of Xenophon their Capitaine) had overcome the king of PERSIAES army as oft as they listed the selues: and that he which was the Lieutenant generall of the LACEDÆMONIANS (who at that time commaunded both sea and lande) should not doe some deede worthe memorie among the GREECIANS. Presently therefore to reuenge Tisaphernes periturie by iust deceit, he made a countenance as though he would first invade the contrie of CARIA. Whereupon, this barbarous person Tisaphernes, gathered all his power together. But Agessilavus on a sodaine returned backe againe, and entred into PHRYGIA, tooke there many cities, and swanne great spoyle, making his men see by experience, that to infringe & breake a league made & scattered by othe, was a sacriledge, and contemning of the goddes. On the other side also, that to beguile his enemies, it was not only iust and honorable: but also profitable and pleasant. Now Agessilavus being weaker in horemen than his enemy, and finding the liuers of the beastes which he had sacrificed, without heades, returned into the cite of EPHEVS, and there gathered horemen together, letting the rich men vnderstand (which would not them selues seruise in person) that he did dispense with their persons, so that they did set out a horse and man furnished for seruice in their place. Many of them tooke that course, & by this meanes Agessilavus within few dayes had leauied a great number of men of armes, in steade of footemen that could doe small seruice. For they that were vnwilling to goe to the warres, did hier them that were willing to serue in their place: and such also as would not serue a horsebacke, did geue them pay that were desirous to serue in their steades. In this he wilyly followed king Agamemnon's example, who did dispense with the person of a riche coward for going to the warres, by taking a good

mare of him. Then Agessilav had commaunded them that sold the prisoners by the dromed taken in the warres, that they should strippe them naked, & so sell them: which they did. And sundry persons willingly bought their spoyles and rayment, but they scorned their bodies, because they sawe them white skinned, soft, and delicate: so that fewe men would outbid the price for them, for that they thought those men vnprofitable and good for nothing. Agessilav also being present at this sale of purpose, sayd thus vnto his men. See, my frendes, quod he thesē be the men against whom ye are to fight, and here be the spoyles for the which ye shall fight. Time being come now to put him selfe into the field, and to invade his enemies count againe, he gaue it out that he would enter LYDIA, not meaning to deceiue Tisaphernes againe, but Tisaphernes deceiued him selfe. For he being deceiued before by Agessilav, gaue no credit to this second rumor, but perswaded him selfe that doubtlesse Agessilav ment then to enter into CARIA, & the rather for that it was a woddie contrie, very ill for horsemen, in the which he was the weaker. This notwithstanding, Agessilav invading (as he had geuen it out) the champion contrie, in the which stode SARDIS, the capital city of LYDIA: Tisaphernes was compelled to come to reskue it in hast, and being come thither with great speede with his horsemen, he stale upon many of his enemies whom he found straggling out of order, spoyleing the contrie, & put the most of them to the sword. Agessilav hauing intelligence of this, imagined with him selfe that the footemen of his enemy could not yet be arriued, & considering also that he had his army whole about him: thought it best forthwith to bid him battel, rather the to delay time any longer. Thereupon he thrust in among the horsemen his light armed footemen, and commaunded them straight to charge the enemy, whilst he caused the heavier armed men to follow at their heeles, as they did. But the barbarous people fled upon it immediatly: and the GRECIANS lustely following the chase, tooke their campe, & made great laughter of them that fled. After this field foughten, they had leasure enough not only to spoyle & ouerrun the kinges contrie at their pleasure, but also to see the reuenge taken of Tisaphernes, that was a vile man, and a cruell enemy to the GRECIANS. For the king of PERSIA made an other his Lieutenant immediatly in his roome, called Tithraustes: who strake of Tisaphernes head, and sent vnto Agessilav to pray him to take peace with them, and to offer him store of golde and silver to departe out of his contrie. Thereto Agessilav answered, that for peace, it was not in him to make it, but in the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that for his owne parte, it was an easer manner to enriche his souldiers, than him selfe. And furthermore, that the GRECIANS thought it dishonor to them, to take any gift of their enemies, other then spoyles. This notwithstanding, to gratifie Tithraustes somewhat, for that he had taken reuenge of a common enemy of all the GRECIANS: for the summe of thirtie talentes geuen him to defray his charges, he withdrew his army out of LYDIA, and went into PHRYGIA. In his iorney he received from the counsell of LACEDÆMON, the Scytala, or scrolle of parchment wreathed about, aduertising him that the citizens had made him also their Generall by sea, as he was by lande. Agessilav onely of his time, as Theopompus witnesseth: and yet gloried rather to be commended for his vertue, than for the greatnes of his authority. In this notwithstanding he was to be blamed, when he made choise of one Pisander his wiues brother, to be Lieutenant of the navy, & forsooke other Captaines of better experience and elder yeares: seeking rather to please his wife, and to aduance one of his kinne, than to regarde the weale and safety of his contrie. Afterwards he led his army into Pharnabazus contrie which he had in charge, where he founde not onely plenty of all sortes of vittells, but gathered together also a wonderfull masse of money. From thence he went into the realme of PAPHLAGONIA, and made league there with kinge Corys: who for his vertue and constant fidelity, was very desirous of his friendship. The like did Spithridates, forsaking Pharnabazus, and came vnto Agessilav: and after he was come to him, he neuer went from him, but alwayes followed him wheresoeuer he went. Spithridates had a young sonne that was passing faier, called Megabates, (of whom Agessilav had great liking) and likewise a fayer young woman to his daughter, of age to be married, whom Agessilav caused king Corys to marry. So, taking of king Corys a thousand horsemen and two thousand footemen, light armed, he returned backe into PHRYGIA, and there destroyed Pharnabazus contrie which

But there did Erippidas shewe him selfe so hard and cruell, ouerstraghtly teaching our parte of the spoyle that had bene imbecaeled, compelling the barbarous people to deliuer it againe, ransacking euery corner for it: that Spithridates was so offended withall, that on a sodaine he tooke the PAPHLAGONIANS with him, and went backe vnto the cite of SARDIS. This more grieved Agessilav, than any thing that happened to him in all his iorney: for that he had lost so valliant a man as Spithridates, and such a number of good souldiers as he caried away with him. Moreover, he was afayed least he should detect him of miserable couetousnes, a thing which he euer was careful to auoid, not onely in his owne persone, but also to keepe all his contriemen from it. But besides these known causes, the loue he bare to Spithridates sonne pinched him neerely: though when the boy was with him, he strued with his owne nature to subdue that naughty affection and desire he had of him. For when Megabates on a time came to make much of him, & to kisse him: Agessilav turned his face from the boy. The boy being ashamed of the repulse, durst no more come so familiarly, but saluted him aloofe of. Agessilav then repenting him that he had not suffered Megabates to kisse him, made as though he marueled why he did not kisse him as he was wont to doe. Then answered some of his familiars about him: your selfe, O king, is in faulte, because you durst not tarie, but were afayed to kisse so fayer a boy. For if he knewe your minde, he would come againe, so that you turned your face no more away. When Agessilav had heard them, he pawled a while, and said neuer a word, but in fine answered them: It shall not neede you say any thing to him, for it would doe me more good I could refuse such an other kisse againe, then if all that I see before me were golde. Thus was Agessilav disposed whē Megabates was with him: but in his absence he did so loue him, that I dare scanty say, that if the boy had come againe into his presence, he would haue refused a kisse at his hands. After that, Pharnabazus sought to speake with him, and one Apollophanes a CYZICENIAN brought them together, that was a frende vnto them both. Agessilav was the first that met at the place appointed with his frends, and tarying for Pharnabazus comming, he layed him downe vpon the depe graffe in the shadow, vnder a fayer great tree. Pharnabazus also came thither, & they did spread soft skinnes long heared, and tapestry excellently wrought of diuers colours, for him to sit on upon the ground. But being ashamed to see Agessilav laied on the bare ground in that sorte, he also layd downe by him, though he had vpon him a maruelous riche gowne, of excellent tisse & passing colour. Now when they had embraced one another, Pharnabazus began first to speake, and lacked no good perswasions & iust complaints, for that he hauing bene (as he was) a frende vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in the warre against the ATRENIANS, was then spoyled and sacked by them. Agessilav then finding that the SPARTANS that were about him at that meeting, hong downe their heades for shame, not knowing how to aunswere him, considering that Pharnabazus had iniury offered him: began to speake in this manner. Heretofore when we were frendes with the king (my Lord Pharnabazus) we haue vsed his goodes like friends, but now that we are his enemies, like enemies we vse them: and sence we see that thou wilt needes be a slaue of his, maruell not though we hurt thee for his sake. But when thou shalt like rather to be a frend of the GRECIANS, then a slaue to the king of PERSIA: then make account, that all these souldiers, this armor, our shippes, and all we are to defend thy goodes and liberty against him, without which, nothing that is honest can be looked for of mortall men. Thereupon Pharnabazus told him his minde plainly: surely, sayd he, if the king doe sende hither any other Captaine to be his Lieutenant, before I will then take your parte straight. But on thother side, if he make me his Lieutenant in this warre, trust to it, I will do him the best seruice I can against you. This aunswere passingly pleased Agessilav, who taking him by the hand, and rising vp with him, sayd vnto him. I would with (my Lord Pharnabazus) hauing so noble a minde as thou hast, that thou were rather our frend, then an enemy. So Pharnabazus departing from thence with his men, his sonne being left behinde, ranne to Agessilav, and smiling told him. King Agessilav, I will make thee my frend: and there with gaue him a dart he had in his hande. Agessilau tooke it of him, and liking well the beawtie of the young youth, and the curtesie he had offred him, looked about him if any man in his company had any proper thing that he might bestow on him. At the last he spied his secretarie Adens horse, which had a rich capariffon on: he straight tooke it be him, and gaue the horse & furniture to this liuely youth Pharnabazus sonne, who neuer after forgate it. For it chaunced afterwards that being driuen out of his contrie by his brethren, and flying into PELOPONNESVS, Agessilau made very much of him, and did not sticke to further him in his loue abroad. For he had a great fancie and liking to a boy of ATHENS, whome they brought vp in wrestling, one day to play for the best games. But when he was growen a bigger man and strong, and that he came to offer him selfe to be billed with them that should wraitle at the games Olympical, being in some perill to be vtterly refused: this PERSIAN that loued him, went vnto Agessilau, and besought his helpe, that this wraitle might not receiue the foyle to be reiected. Agessilau being desirous to pleasure him, performed his request with some difficultie. Thus Agessilau in all things else was a straight obseruer of the law: but in his frendes causes to be straight laced in matters of iustice, he sayd that was but an excuse for them that would do nothing for their frendes. To this effect, they finde a letter of his wrytten vnto Idrian, Prince of CARIA, for the deliuerie of his frende. If Nicias haue not offended, lette him goe: if he haue offended, then pardon him for my sake. But howe soeuer it be, let him goe. This was Agessilau manner in the most parte of his frends causes. Notwithstanding, occasions fell out oftentimes, that he rather inclined to the benefit of the common wealth. As appeared one day when he was driuen to remoue in haste on a sodaine, and to leaue one sicke behinde him whome he loued deere: he the sicke man callinge him by his name as he was going his way, besought him that he would not forsake him. Agessilau (as Hieronymus the Philosopher reporteth) turned backe againe, and sayd: O howe hard is it both to loue, and to be wife. Nowe had Agessilau spent two yeares in this warre, and was spoken of throughout ASIA, beinge maruelously commended to the kinge him selfe, for his great honestie, his continencie, his curtesie and plaine dealing. For when he rode out into the contrie with his owne traine onely, he would euer lye in the holiest temples of the goddess: because he woulde the goddess them selues shoulde be witnesses of his priuate doings, whereas commonly we are lothe that men shoulde see what we doe. Furthermore, amongst so many thousande souldiers as were in his campe, there coulde hardlie be founde a worse matrisse, then that him selfe did lye apon euerie night. And as for heate and colde, he coulde as easilie awaie with either of both, as if by constitution of bodie he had bene borne to abide anie weather and season. But aboue all, it was a pleasaunt sight to the GREECIANS that dwelt in ASIA, when they sawe the great Lordes, the kinges Lieutenantes of PERSIA, (which before were proude, cruell, riche, and geuen to all lust and pleasure) to honor and feare a man that went vp and downe in a poore cape, beinge affrayed of euerie shorte worde that he spake like a LACONIAN: inmuch as many of them called to minde Timothews the Poetes verses, who sayd,

As Mars hath no mercie, so Greece skorneth gold.

Now all ASIA being vp and in garboile, they willingly yielding to him in euery place, after he had taken order with the cities, & had stablished the liberty of their comon weale, without any bloodshed, or banishment of any person: he determined to goe further, into the land, and transporting the warres from the sea coastes of GREECE, to fight with the king of PERSIA in proper person, and with the wealth & happines of the EBRATANIANS and the SYSTIANIANS, and by that means to take his pleasure from him, who sitting still before, made the GREECIANS make warre one with an other, by force of money, corrupting the Gouernours of euery cite. In the meane time came Epycidas a LACONIAN vnto him, and brought him newes how SPARTA was grieuouly troubled with warres, enforced on them by the other GREECIANS: & that therefore the Ephori did send for him home, and commaunded him to returne to defend his contrie.

Oh wretched Greece, how cruell slaughters hath Thou brought vpon thee, for to lay thee waste?

A For how should a man otherwise call this enuie, treason, and ciuill conspiracie among the GREECIANS? Who ouerthrow their good fortune that made them happy before, turning their warres against the barbarous people, out of GREECE, and now to bring it against themselves. I am not of Demaratus opinion the CORINTHIAN, that sayd the GREECIANS delight was taken from them, which sawe not Alexander the great sitting in Darius royall throne: but rather I would thinke they should haue wept, to haue left this honor vnto Alexander and the MACEDONIANS, fondly losing so many famous Captaines of GREECE, at the battells of ISOTROES, of CORONEA, of CORINTH, and of ARCADIA. Neuertheless, Agessilau neuer did better ge in his life, nor euer shewed better example of obedience and iustice due to his contrie, than he did in his returne home. For sithe Hannibal that beganne to haue ill success in his warres, being in manner driuen out of ITALIE, thought neuer (but compelled) to returne againe into his contrie, to obey his contrienemen: which called him home to defend the warre the ROMANES made at their owne dores: and that Alexander the great also being sent for home vpon the like occasion did not onely refuse to returne into MACEDON, but made a iellatist, when newes was brought him of the great battell which his Lieutenant Antipater had fought with kinge Agis, saying, me thinks when I heare these newes, whilst we are ouercomming of kinge Darius here, there hath bene a battell of rattes fought in ARCADIA. Sith then (I say) these two famous Captaines haue made so litle account of their contrie, may we not thinke the cite of SPARTA blessed to haue had such a kinge; that so much reuerenced his contrie and obeyed the lawe as receiuing onely a litle scrolle of parchement commaunding him to returne, he forooke a worlde of goodes and wealth that he quietly enjoyed (with assured hope and certaintie of more) and unbarkeed forthwith, leauing all the alies and confederates of his contrie verie sorrowfull, for that he had geuen ouer to noble an enterprife, which he had so happily begonne? Yes sure. Nay furthermore, he passed not for the saying of Demostratus PHACIAN, who sayd, that the LACEDEMONIANS in publicke matters were the worthiest men, and the ATHENIANS in priuate causes. For as he had shewed him selfe a good king and an excellent Captaine to the common wealth: so was he alwayes courteous priuately to his familiar frendes. And because the PERSIAN coyne was stamped on the one side, with the print of an archer: Agessilau beinge ready to departe, sayd, that tenne thousand archers draue him out of ASIA. For so much was brought vnto THEBES and DATHENS, and distributed among the Orators and Gouernours there, who through their Orations made both those great cities to rise, and make warre against the SPARTANS. In his returne, Agessilau hauing passed the straight of HELLESPONT, tooke his way through the contrie of THRACIA, and neuer intreated barbarous kinge nor people to suffer him to passe, but only sent vnto them to know whether they would he should passe through their contries as a frende, or an enemy. All contries and nations else receiued him very honorably to their power, saue the people called the TROCHALIANS, vnto whom king Xerxes him selfe gaue presentes that he might passe friendly through their contrie: who sent vnto Agessilau to demand a hundred silver talentes, and a hundred women to suffer him to passe through their contrie. But Agessilau laughing them to scorne, answered againe: why, how chaunceth it that they came not them selues to receiue them? So therewithall he marched forward against these barbarous people who were ranged in battell raye to stoppe his passage: howbeit he ouerthrowe them, and slue a great number of them in the field. The like demand he made vnto the kinge of MACEDON, whether he should passe through his contrie as a frende, or an enemy. The king made him aunswere, he would confider of it. Well, let him thinke of it, quod Agessilau: we will goe on in the meane time. The king then wondering at his great boldenes, and fearing least he would doe him some hurte as he went: sent to pray him that he would passe through his contrie as a frend. Now it chaunced fo that the THESSALIANS at that time were in league with the enemies of the LACEDEMONIANS: therefore as he passed through their contrie, he did spoyle and forage it as his enemies contrie, and sent Xenocles and Scythas to the cite of LARISSE, hopeinge to perswade them to take parte with the LACEDEMONIANS. These two Ambassadors were retained there as prisoners. The SPARTANS were maruelously offended withall: and thought good that Agessilau should besiege LARISSE with his army. But he answered them, he would not lose one of those men, to winne all THERACIA and therefore found means that he redeemed them againe by composition. Peradventure this is not to be marveled at in Agessilau, that newes being brought him on a time, that in a great battell fought by the citie of CORINTHE, where were many worthie and valliant Captaines slaine of the enemies, and but few of the SPARTANS: he seemed not to reioice at it, but rather to fetch a grievous sigh, saying, O poore GREECE, how vnfortunate art thou to haue slaine with thine owne handes so many valliant Captaines of thine owne people, as ioyning together, might at one field haue overcome all the barbarous people. The PHARSALIANS haryng and troubling the rereward of Agessilau armie, he put forth five hundred horsemen which gaue them to lustie a charge, that he ouerthrew them by force. For this victorie, he let vp tokens of triumphe upon the mountaine called Narthacium, and this victorie pleased him above all the rest, bicause with the small number of horsemen which he had gotten together of him selfe, he had ouerthrowen the glory & pride of the enemies horsemen in battell, where they had vaunted many yeares before. Thither came Diphridas one of the Ephores vnto him, sent of purpose from SPARTA, to commaund him immediatly to inuade BOEOTIA with his armie. Nowe though Agessilau intended some other time with a greater power to enter BOEOTIA, yet bicause he would not disobey the counsellis commaundement of SPARTA: he told his men straight, that the battell for the which they returned out of ASIA, was at hande, and therefore he sent for two companies of them which lay in campe by CORINTHE. The LACEDEMONIANS that were at SPARTA, to honor Agessilau for that he had obeyed their commaundement so readily: proclaimed in the citie, that as many young men as were desirous to goe aide the king, should come and enter their names. Notwithstanding, they onely chose but fiftie of the valliantest among them, and sent them vnto him. In the meane time, Agessilau passed through the contrie of THERMOPILES, and coasting ouer the lande of PHOCIDE, confederates to the LACEDEMONIANS, he entred into BOEOTIA, and camped by the citie of CHERONEA: where immediatly after his arriuall, he sodainly saw the sunne eclipsed, and darkened in the facion of a new moone. Euen withall, came the newes of the death of Disander vnto him, who was slaine in a battell which he lost by sea, fighting against Pharabacum and Conon, hard by the Ile of GNIDOS. These newes were very heauie vnto him, both for respect of the person his kinsman whom he lost, as also for the great losse that happened to the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, fearing his souldiers would be discouraged with the newes, and become faint hearted, being ready to ioyne battell: he commaunded them that came from the sea, to brute abroade a contrarie tale to that they tolde him, and he him selfe to make good their speache, came out among them, with a garland of flowers on his head, and did sacrifice to the goddess, as thanking them for the good newes, sending to euery one of his friends a peece of flesh sacrificed, as he commonly vsed to doe, in any publike cause of ioy. Then marching forward, he straight discovered his enemies farre off, and they likewise him: & therupon put his men in battell ray, and gaue the left wing vnto the ORCHOMENIANS, leading him selfe the right wing. The THEBANS on thother side, placed them selues in the right wing of their armie, and gaue the left vnto the ARGIVES. Xenophon being at that battell on Agessilau side, wryeth that he neuer knewe of the like fildes fought. At the first onser, the conflict was not great betwene both, neither helde long, bicause the THEBANS brake the ORCHOMENIANS straight, and Agessilau the ARGIVES. But when either side vnderstoode that the left winges of their battells were in great distresse, and that they turned their backes: they returned sodainly againe. And where Agessilau might easily haue had the victorie without any daunger, if he had suffred the squadron of the enemies to passe by him, and afterwards to haue charged them in the rereward: of a noble corage to shew his vallianties, he gaue charge upon the vaward, to haue honor in ouercoming them. The THEBANS on the other side no lesse valliantly received him, & fought lustily on all hands: but the cruellst fight was about Agessilau person, with the fifty young men that were sent to gard him, who shewed the selues very valliant. Agessilau was sore hurt, notwithstanding their valliant resistance, his armor being passed thorow with their f pikes & swords in sundry places: whereupon they enuironned him round amongst the, & kept him from the enemies, killing a great number of the, & many of them selues also being killed.

In

A In fine, finding the THEBANS too strong in the vaward they were forced to do that which they refused at the first: and opening them selues, gaue them passage thorow them. So when they were passed them, the SPARTANS perceiuing howe lowely and disorderly they marched, as thinking them selues out of all daunger, followed them, and gaue charge upon their flanke. But all this could not make the THEBANS flie: for they reioicing for their victorie at this battell, retired fayer and softly vnto the mountaine Helicon. But Agessilau, notwithstanding he was very sore hurt, with many a grievous wound, would not go into his paviilion to be dressed before he had bene first at the place where the battell was fought, and had seene his men that were slaine brought away in their armors. As many of his enemies as were fled into the temple of Minerva Itonian, which was not farre from thence: (where also were sette vp tokens of triumphe offered vnto her long time before by the THEBANS, when they had overcome the armie of the ATHENIANS, vnder the conduct of Sparton their Capitaine, and had slaine also Tolmides their Capitaine in the fildes) he commaunded his men they should lette them goe where they would. The next morning by breake of day, Agessilau desirous to see if the THEBANS had any corage to comedowne to fight againe: commaunded his souldiers to put garlandes upon their heades, and his musitians to founde their shalmes or pipes, whilest he did sette vp a token of triumphe as victorior. Moreouer, his enemies sendinge to him to aske leaue to take away their dead men, he graunted them truce for the time, and thereby confirmed his victorie. After that, being caried to the citie of DELPHES, where the Pythian games were played, he made a solemne proceffion and common sacrifice vnto Apollo, and offered him the tenth parte of all his spoiles which he had brought out of ASIA, which amounted to the summe of an hundred talentes. This thing done, he returned into his contrie, where he was greatly honored and esteemed of all his citizens and contrie men, for his orderly life and noble behauiour: for he was no chaungeling, but the selfe same man in state & condicion that he was before he tooke his iorney. He transformed not him selfe into strangers manners, as commonly other Capitaines doe, that returne out of a farre contrie where they haue made warres: neither did he scorne his contrie facions, or shewed him selfe disobedient to the lawes thereof, but alwayes kept and obserued them, without any manner of alteration in his meate or drinke, in walhing or bathing, in his wiues apparell, in his armory, or any way else in his householde stuffe, as if he had neuer passed ouer the riuier of Eurotas. D Yet further, he left his olde gates standing that were of so great continuance, that they were thought to be those which Aristodemus had set vp. Xenophon also sayeth, that his daughters Canathrum was nothing more lumpitious than any others were. A Canathrum in LACEDEMON, is a kinde of coche or charret after the likeness of griffins, hartes, or goates: upon the which they caried younge wenches in solemne proceffions in the citie. Xenophon wrote not what was the name of this daughter of Agessilau: and Dicaearchus also was much offended, that they neither knewe Agessilau daughters name, nor yet the mother of Eupaminondas. Yet we finde in the LAONIAN Chronicles, that Agessilau wiues name was Clora, one of his daughters called Apolia, and the other Prolyta. Moreouer, Agessilau speare is seene to this day in the citie of SPARTA, euen like vnto others, and no manner of difference. E Now Agessilau perceiuing certaine citizens of SPARTA to stand vpon their reputation, and esteeming them selues above others, bicause they kept horse in their stable: perswaded his sister Cynisca to lend her coche and coche horses to the Olympian games to runne for the best prize, only to let the GREECIANS see that it was no act of any vertue, but simply of riches and cost. Furthermore hauing Xenophon the Philosopher about him, whome he loued and made great account of, he perswaded him to send for his sonnes to LACEDEMON, that they might be brought vp there, where they should learne the noblest science that men coulde possible learne, to witte: to obey, and to commaunde. When Lysander was dead, Agessilau as his returne out of ASIA, founde a great faction and conspiracie raised by his meanes against him in SPARTA: and bicause it might appeare what manner of citizen Lysander was when he fled, he was likely to haue openly shewed and declared an Oration which he founde among his wrytinges (the which the Orator Cleon Halicarnassus had wrytten for him, and Lysander should haue cunne without booke, to haue spoken in open assembly) that was to stirre inno-uation, and in maner haue made a change of the whole gouernment of the common wealth A of LACEDÆMON. Howbeit there was a graue counsellor that hauing red the oration, and douting the apparant reasons and perswasions alleaged, tolde him, that he would wishe him not to plucke vp the dead againe out of his graue, but rather to burie this oration together with his bodie. Agessilau liked the counsellor, and proceeded no further. And for them that either were, or had bene his enemies, he did the no hurt openly: but found the meanes to make some of them to be sent as Lieutenants of army, or otherwise to haue charge in the warres. In fine, he made it openly known, what courteous and wicked men they had bene in their charges: so that when they were accused of it before the counsellor, he would than helpe & intreate for them. By this meanes he made them againe his frendes, where they had bene his enemies inso much as in the ende, he had not one enemy at all. For the other king Agessipolis his colleague, whose father had bene banished: he being a very young man, and of gentle nature, medled not greatly with gouernment of the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, he so behaued him selfe vnto Agessilau, that he made him his verie good frende: for both the kings when they were in the citie, did eate together in one halle. Then Agessilau knowing that Agessipolis (as him selfe) was geuen to loue, would euer minister talke to him of the goodly young boyes of the citie, intising him to loue some one of them, which he him selfe did loue: and therein he was both his companion and helper. For in these LACONIAN louses there was no manner of dishonestie offered, but a true affection and honest regarde to frame the boy beloued vnto vertue and honest condicions: as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lycurgus. Agessilau by this meanes hauinge the whole authoritie (about all men in the citie) in his hands: C made his halfe brother Telenias General by sea, and him selfe with the armie by land went to besiege the citie of CORINTHE, where with his brothers helpe by sea he tooke the long walls of the same. The ARGIVES which kept CORINTHE at that time, at Agessilau arrivall there were solemnising the feast of the Isthmian games: who made them flie, euen as they came from sacrificing vnto the god Neptune, driuing them to leaue all their preparation and solemnity. Then diuers banished men of CORINTHE that were in his armie, besought him that he would keepe these Isthmian games. But he denyed them, yet was contented they should themselves solemnize them, and so him selfe remained there, during the time of the feast, for their safetie. Afterwardes when Agessilau was gone thence, the ARGIVES returned, and did celebrate the Isthmian games: and there were some of them which hauing wonne the game D at the first, did also winne it at the second time: and others that were victours before, were this second time overcome. Whereupon Agessilau sayd, that the ARGIVES shewed them selues rancke cowardes, that esteeming so much (as they did) these playes and sacrifices, they durst not once offer to fight with him for defence of the same. For him selfe, touching such like sportes and games, he euer thought it good to keepe a meane, & not to be too curious. For he was contented to honor such solemne assemblies and common feastes with his presence, as were commonly vsed in SPARTA, & tooke great pleasure to see the sportes betwene the yong boyes and girles of SPARTA: howbeit touching the games, he seemed not to be acquainted with some of them, wherein others had great delight. As we read, that Callipides an excellent stage player (wonderfully esteemed of among the GRECIANS for a singular man in that arte) E meeting Agessilau on a time, at the first did his dutie to him, and then arrogantly thrust him selfe amonge them that walked with him, thinking the king would haue made much of him: but perceiuing he made no countenance to him, in the end he asked him: O king Agessilau, doe you not know me? Agessilau looking upon him, answered: what, art not thou Callipides the stage player? And so made no further account of him. An other time beinge desired to heare a man that naturally counterfeited the nightingalls voyce: he would not heare him, saying, I haue oftentimes heard the nightingall it selfe. An other time also when Menecrates the Phisitian (hauing by good fortune cured a desperate disease) called him selfe Jupiter, and arrogantly vsurped that name, presuminge in a letter he wrote vnto Agessilau, to subscribe it in this manner, Menecrates Jupiter, vnto king Agessilau, greeting: Agessilau wrote againe vnto him, Agessilau vnto *Menecrates health. So, whilst Agessilau was in the territorie of CORINTHE (where he had taken the temple of Iuno) beholding his souldiers forraging & spoiling the

A the contrie rounde about: Ambassadors came to him from THEBES, to pray him to make peace with the THEBANS. But he that alwayes hated the THEBANS, and besides that thought it then very requisite for the good successe of his doings, to make light of it: seemed as he neither heard nor saw them that spake vnto him. But euen at that very instant, as by diuine reuenge to crie quittance, there fell a great mishap vpon him. For before the Ambassadors were gone from him, he had newes that one of their bandes called the mothers, were slaine euery man by Iphicrates: which was the greatest losse that they in long time before had sustained. For they lost a great number of valliant souldiers, all naturall LACEDÆMONIANS: who being well armed euery man, were slaine by naked or light armed hirclinges. Thereupon Agessilau went straight into the field with hope to saue them, or at the least to be reuenged. But B receiuing certaine intelligence by the way that they were all slaine, he returned againe to the temple of Iuno from whence he came, and then sent for the Ambassadors of the BOEOTIANS, to geue them audience. But they, to requite his former disdain vnto them, made no manner of speache of peace, but onely requested him to suffer them to enter into CORINTHE. Agessilau beinge offended, answered them: if it be to see your frendes triumphe of their victorie, ye may safely do it to morrow. Thereupon the next morning taking the Ambassadors with him, he destroyed the CORINTHIANS contrie, euen to the wallies of their citie. And when he had made the Ambassadors see, that the citizens of CORINTHE durst not come out into the field to defend their contrie: he gaue them leaue to depart. Then taking the remaine of that band that was ouerthrowen, which by flight had escaped: he brought them into LACEDÆMON againe, alwayes removing his campe before day, and neuer encamped till darke night, because the ARCADIANs (their mortall enemies) should not reioyce at their losse. After this voyage, to gratifie the ACHAIANs, he entred in with them into the contrie of A CARBANTIA, & brought great spoyles from thence, after he had ouercome them in batell. Moreover, when the ACHAIANs besought him to remaine with them all the winter, to keepe their enemies from sowing of their grownd: he made them answer he would not. For, sayde he, they will be afraide of warre the next year, when all their fieldes shall be sowne with corne: and so in deede it came to passe. For the army returning againe, they made peace incontinently with the ACHAIANs. About that time, Pharnabazus and Conon, with the king of PERSIAES army, being Lordes of the sea without let of any, destroyed and spoyled all the coast of LACONIA. Moreover, the city D of ATHENS did reare vp her walls againe by helpe of Pharnabazus money, wherewith he had furnished them. Thereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS thought good to make peace with the king of PERSIA, and to that ende sent Antalcidas Ambasadour vnto Tiribazus, most shamefully and cruelly betraying to the king, the GRECIANS inhabiting in ASIA, for whose libertie Agessilau had made warres with him before. So it was Agessilau hadde not to be foyled with any part of his shame: for Antalcidas that was his enemy, fought all the meanes he could to conclude this peace, for that he saw warre did daily increase the authoritie, honor, and fame of Agessilau. Notwithstanding, he answered one then, that reproued him for that the LACEDÆMONIANS did fauor the MEDES: no, sayd he, they do not so, but the MEDES doe play the LACEDÆMONIANS. Neuertheles, threatening warre to all the GRECIANS, which would not agree E to the condicions of this peace: he compelled them to yield vnto that the king of PERSIA liked. But surely he did this chiefly for respect of the THEBANS, to thende that they beinge enforced by the capitulations of the peace, to set the contrie of BOEOTIA at libertie againe, should be so much the weaker. This plainly appeared soone after by that that followed. For Phobidas hauing committed a fowle acte, in open peace to take the castell of the citie of THEBES, called Cadmea, offending thereby all the other GRECIANS (and the SPARTANS them selues also not being very well pleased withall, and those specially which were Agessilau enemies) Phobidas beinge asked in great anger, at whose commandement he had done that sodaine enterprife: to lay all the supsition of the acte upon him: Agessilau for Phobidas discharge, letted not openly to say, that the qualitie of the acte was to be considered of, whether it were profitable for F the common wealth or not: and that it was well done of him, the thing fallinge out profitable for his contrie to do it of his owne head without commandement. All this notwithstanding, he was wont to say in priuate talke, that iustice was the chieftest of all vertues, and therefore that valiantnes without iustice was of no validity, and that if all men were iust, valiantnes were of no estimation. And to them that tolde him, the great king will haue it so: Why, sayd he, and wherein is he better then my selfe, if he be not iust? Iudging very wisely therein, that they should esteeme a king (whether he were of great or small power) by his iustice, as by the beame of princely balance. When peace was concluded, the king of PERSIA hauing sent him a priuate letter desiring his frendshippe, Agessilau refused it, saying that common frendshippe was enough betwext them, and that they should neede none other, so long as that was kept. But this notwithstanding, when it came to the poynt of performance, he went from his first good opinion, and gaue place to his will & ambition, specially against the THEBANS, at that time when he did not only saue Phabidas, but also procured the citie of SPARTA to take the fault upon them which he had committed, and to iustifie it, by keeping the castell of Cadmea still, and making Archias and Leontidas Gouvernours of the citie of THEBES, by whom Phabidas came by the castell of Cadmea, and possessed it. Thereupon euery man thought straight, that Phabidas was he that had put the matter in execution, & that Agessilau gaue the counsell to do it: as things falling out afterwarde, did manifestly proue the suspicion true. For, after that the THEBANS had driuen the garrison of the LACEDEMONIANS out of the castell of Cadmea, and restored their citie againe to libertie, burdening them that they had traiterously slaine Archias and Leontidas (who in deede were tyrannes, though in name Gouvernors) he made warre with them: and Cleombrotus, reigning then king with him after Agessilau's death, was sent before into BOEOTIA with an armie, Agessilau was dispensed with by lawe for going any more to the warres, by reason of his age, for that he was fortie yeare olde from the first C growth of heare on his face, & therefore went not that iorney: being ashamed that the THEBANS should now see him fight to reuenge the tyrans deathes, who had but a litle before taken armes for the banished men, against the PHILISTIANS. At that time there was a LACONIAN called Sphodrias, of the contrarie faction vnto Agessilau, and was then Gouverneur in the citie of THEBES, a valliant and stout man of his handes, but euer fuller of vaine hope, than of good iudgement. He desiring fame, and supposing that Phabidas came to dignitie and great estimation through his valliant enterprise at THEBES: perswaded him selfe that he should winne much more honor, if of him selfe he tooke the haue of Piræa doainly stealing upon the ATHENIANS by land, cutting them off by that meane from al trade by sea. It was thought commonly that this was a practise deuised by Pelopidas and Gelon, Gouvernours of BOEOTIA, who had allured certaine men to faime them selues very deuout and frendly to the LACEDEMONIANS. These men praising and extolling Sphodrias to his face, put him in the head that they knew none so worthe as him selfe alone, to take in hand so noble an enterprise. Thus by their perswasions they trained him on to this attempt, which for vilenes was nothing inferior vnto that trecherous winning of the castell Cadmea at THEBES: although it was attempted with lesse hardines and diligence. For day was broken when he was yet in the plaine of Thirasiu, where he made account to haue bene at the walles of Piræa by night. Furthermore it is reported, that the men he brought with him seeing certaine fires from the temples of the city of ELEVSIN, were all affrayed and amazed: yea he him selfe also fainted perceiving he was discouered, and so returned backe with shame and dishonor to the citie of THEBES, without any exployt done, sauing only a litle spoyle taken. Thereupon accusers were straight sent from ATHENS vnto SPARTA, who upon their arruall found that they needed not to accuse him, for that the counsell and Gouvernours of the citie had already sent for him to come vnto them, to condemne him of his treason. But he durst not returne to SPARTA, fearing the furie of his contriemen, thinking in deede that they would seeme as though the wrong had bene done to them, because it should not be thought that they had caused it to be done. This Sphodrias had a sonne called Cleonymus, a very fayer boy, with whome Archidamus (Agessilau's sonne) was farre in loue: who then was maruelous sorie to see this boy he loued, in so great daunger to lose his father, & yet durst not be seene to helpe him, because Sphodrias was one of Agessilau's aduersaries. Notwithstanding, Cleonymus making his mone to him with the teares in F his eyes, and praying him to pacifie his father Agessilau (whome they feared about all men else) Archidamus followed his father three or foure dayes together, and durst not breake the

A matter to him: in fine, the day of the next session being at hand, when iudgement should be giuen of Sphodrias, he boldly ventured to tell him, howe that Cleonymus had prayed him to be an humble suitor to him touching his fathers fact. Agessilau vnderstanding that his sonne loued Cleonymus, would not withdrawe him from louing of him, because the boye was from his childehoode gaue alwayes good hope that one day he would see him make as honest a man as any other whatsoeuer: neither made he any countenance to his sonne, as though he would doe any thing at his sute, but onely answered him, for that, he would doe as became him in such a case. Whereupon, Archidamus being baflesall, left comming any more to Cleonymus, where before he would see him oftentimes in a day. This made Sphodrias frendes dispaire of his life more then before, vntill Etymoetes, one of Agessilau's familiars talking with them, tolde them that for the facte it selfe, Agessilau thought it a shamefull deede, and as much disliked it as might be: but for Sphodrias selfe, that he tooke him for a valliant man, & saw that the common wealth had neede of men of such seruice. This was Agessilau's common talke to please his sonne, when any man came to speake to him of Sphodrias's accusation. Incomuch that Cleonymus found straight that Archidamus had delt as faithfully and frendly for him as might be, and then Sphodrias frendes also tooke hart againe vnto them, to sollicite his cause, and to be earnest suiters for him. Agessilau among other had this speciall propertie, that he loued his children deely: and a tale goeth on him, that he would play with them in his house when they were litle ones, and ride upon a litle cocke horse, or a reede, as a horsebacke. Incomuch as a frende of his taking him one day with the maner, playing among his children: he prayed him to say C nothing, till he had litle children him selfe. In fine, Sphodrias was quit by his iudges. The ATHENIANS vnderstanding it, sent to proclaime warre with the LACEDEMONIANS. Whereupon Agessilau was much reprobued, because that to please the sonde affection of his sonne, he had hindered iustice, & brought his citie to be accused among the GRECIANS for such grieuous crimes. Agessilau perceiving that king Cleombrotus his companion went with no verie good will to make warre with the THEBANS, he breaking the order set downe for leading of the army, which was kept before, went to the warres him selfe in person, & so inuading BOEOTIA he both receiued and did great hurt. Whereupon Antalcidas seeing him hurt one day, now truly (sayd he) the THEBANS haue payde you your deserued hier, for teaching them against their wills to be souldiers, that neither had will nor skill to fight. For in dede they say the THEBANS became better souldiers and warriours than they were before, being daily trained and exercised in armes, through the continual inuasions of the LACEDEMONIANS. Loe, this was the reason, why the olde father Lycurgus in his lawes called Rhetra, did forbid them to make warre too oft with one selfe people, because that by compulsion they should not be made expert souldiers. For this cause did the confederats of LACEDEMON hate Agessilau, saying, that it was not for any known offence to the state, but for very spite & priuate malice of his owne, that he sought to vndoe the THEBANS in this manner: and that to follow his humor, they consumed them selues going yearly to the warres one while this way, an other while that way, without any necessitie at all, following a few LACEDEMONIANS, them selues being alwayes the greater number. Then it was, that Agessilau desiring to make the fee what number of men E of warre they were, vsed this deuise. On a time he commaunded all the allies to sit downe together one with an other by them selues, & the LACEDEMONIANS also by them selues. Then he made a herauld proclaime that all pottemakers should stand vp on their feete. When they were vp, he made him crie to the brasiers to rise also. After them in like maner, the carpenters: then the masons, & so consequently all occupations one after an other. So that at the length the confederates obeying the proclamacion, were all in maner on their feete. The LACEDEMONIANS, not one of them rose: because all base mechanicall crafteres were forbidden them to occupie. Then Agessilau laughing at them, loe, my frendes sayd he: doe ye not see now that webring more souldiers to the field, than ye doe? At his returne from this iorney of THEBES, passing by the city of MEGARA, as he went vp into the counsell house within the castell, there F doainly tooke him a great crampe in his left legge, that swelled extremely, and put him to great paine, men thinking that it was but blood which had filled the vaine: a Phisitian of SYRACUSA IN SICILE being there, straight opened a vaine vnder the ankle of his foote, which made the paine to cease: notwithstanding there came such abundance of blood, that they could not stanche it, so that he sounded off, & was in great daunger of present death. In fine, a way was found to stoppe it, and they caried him to LACEDÆMON, where he lay sicke a long time, so that he was past going to the warres any more. The SPARTANS in the meane time receiued great ouerthrowes both by sea and land, and among other, their greatest ouerthrow was at the battell of LEUCTRES, where the THEBANS ouercame and slue them in plaine battell. Then the GRÆCIANS were all of one minde to make a generall peace, and thereupon came Ambassadors from all the cities of GRÆCE, & met at LACEDÆMON to that end. One of these Deputies was Epaminondas, a notable learned man, and a famous Philosopher, but as yet vnskillfull in warres. He seeing how the other Ambassadors carried his uor with Agessilavus, only he of the rest kept his grauity to speake freely, and made an Oration, not for the THEBANS alone, but for all GRÆCE in general, declaring to them all, how warres did only increafe the greatnes & power of the citie of SPARTA, and contrarily did minish and decay all other cities and townes of GRÆCE: and for this cause, that he did counsell them all to conclude a good and perfit peace indifferently for all, to the ende it might continue the longer, when they were all alike. Agessilavus perceiuing then that all the GRÆCIANS present at the assemblie gaue him good eare, and was glad to heare him speake thus boldly of peace asked him openly, if he thought it mete and reasonable, that all BOEOTIA should be set cleare at libertie againe? Epaminondas presently & boldly againe asked him: if he thought it iust and requisite to set all LACONIA cleare againe at libertie? Agessilavus being offended therewith, stood vpon his seate, and commaunded him to aunswere plainly, whether they would set all BOEOTIA at libertie or not? Epaminondas replied vnto him with the selfe speache againe, and asked him whether they would set all LACONIA at liberty or not. That nettled Agessilavus so, that besides he was glad of such a cloke, for the old grudge he euer bare vnto the THEBANS, he presently put the name of the THEBANS out of the bill of those, which should haue bene comprised within the league, and cried open warres apou them in the market place. For the rest, he licensed the other Deputies and Ambassadors of the people of GRÆCE to departe, with this conclusion: that they should louingly take order among the selues for the controuersies betwixt them, if they could peaceably agree together, and they that could not fall to such a greement, that then they should trie it by warres, for that it was a hard thing to take vp all quarells among them. King Cleombrotus by chance was at that time in the contrie of PHOCIDE with his armie, vnto whom the Ephori wrote that he should forthwith spoyle the THEBANS contrie: and therewith also they sent to all their confederates to come and aide them, which had no great fanisie to the iorney, and were loth to make warre with them, but yet durst not refuse to goe, nor disobey the LACEDÆMONIANS. And notwithstanding that there were many signes prelagging ill lucke, as we haue wrytten in the life of Epaminondas, and that Prothous LACONIAN was against the enterprise of this warre all that he could: Agessilavus would needes forward, hoping he had now found opportunity to be reuenged of the THEBANS, sith all GRÆCE besides was in peace and at libertie, them selues onely exempted from treatie of peace. If there had bene no other thing in it but the very thornes of time, that made it manifest enough that this warre was begonne in a geere, without any manner of reason. For the general peace amongst the GRÆCIANS was concluded at SPARTA the fourteenth of May, and the LACEDÆMONIANS were ouercome at the battell of LEUCTRES the fifteene of Iune so as there was but twentie dayes between them. There were slaine a thousand LACEDÆMONIANS with their king Cleombrotus, and the choicest of the valliantest SPARTANS about him. Amongst them was also slaine that goodly young man Cleonymus, Sphodrias sonne, of whom we spake before: who hauing bene beaten downe thrise at the kings foote, three times got vp againe, but at the length was slaine, valliantly fighting against the THEBANS. This great ouerthrowe chaunting to the LACEDÆMONIANS vnlooked for, and withall so glorious a victorie vnto the THEBANS, as GRÆCIANS fighting with GRÆCIANS had neuer the like: the vanquished citie of SPARTA notwithstanding deserued no lesse honor and commendation for her fortitude and worthinesse, than did the victorious citie of THEBES. For as Xenophon wryteth, that as amongst good men euen in table talke, and in their sportes & mirth there falleth out

A euer some thing of wit worth the noting and bearing away: euen so in like case, no lesse, but rather more, ought noble mens wordes to be weyed, and their countenances marked as well in aduersitie as in prosperitie. At that time by chaunce there was a common feast day in the citie of SPARTA, which was full of straungers that came to see the daunfies & sportes of them that shewed naked in the Theater, when as the messengers arriued that brought the newes of the battell lost at LEUCTRES. The Ephori knowing then that the rumor straight ranne all about, that they were all vndone, and how they had lost the signorie and commaundement of ouer all GRÆCE would not suffer them for all this to breake of their daunfe in the Theater, nor the citie in any thing to change the forme of their feast, but sent vnto the parentes to euerie mans houle, to let them vnderstande the names of them that were slaine at the battell, they them selues remaining still in the Theater to see the daunfies & sportes continued, to iudge who caried the best games away. The next morning when euerie man knewe the number of them that were slaine, and of those also that were escaped: the parentes and frendes of them that were dead, met in the market place, looking cheerefully of the matter, and one of them embraced an other. On thother side, the parentes of them that scaped, kept their houfies with their wiues, as folke that mourned. If any of them also had occasion to go abroad out of their houfies, for any matter of necessitie: ye should see him looke so heauily and sad, that he durst not talke with you, lift vp his head, nor looke ye in the face. Besides all this, euen amongst the women there was greater difference. For the mothers of the that kept their sonnes which came from the battell, were sad and sorowfull, and spake not a word. Contrarily, the mothers of them that were slaine, went frendly to visite one an other, to reioyce together. Now when the people saw that their confederates beganne to forsake them, and did daily looke that Epaminondas glorying in his victorie, would inuade PELOPONNESVS: then they beganne to be prieked in conscience about the oracles of the goddes, thinking that this misfortune came to their citie, for that they had thrust out of the kingdome a man perfect in limmes, to place an impotent person, being specially warned by the goddes to beware of that about all things. This notwithstanding, they had him in such veneration for his valliantnes, and his authoritie was such thereby, that they did not onely vse him in warre, as their king and soueraine Capitaine: but in ciuill causes also wherein there rose any question, they euer vsed his counsell and aduise. As they did, when they durst not punish them (according to the penall lawes) that fled from the battell, whom they call at SPARTA Trefantas, (being a great number of them, and men of the noblest houfies and of greatest power within the citie) least they should moue some flure or commotion among them. (For by lawe, they can beare no office in the common wealth. It is shame and reproche to geue them any wiues, and also to marrie any of theirs. Whosoeuer meeteth them may lawefully strike them, and they must abide it, and not geue them a word againe. They are compelled to weare poore tattered cloth gownes patched with cloth of diuers colours: and worst of all, to shau the one side of their beardes, and the other not.) Whereupon, finding the daunger great to deale with them, to execute the lawe according to the infamie they deserued, specially then standing in neede of a great number of men of warre: they referred them selues altogether vnto Agessilavus, to take such order in it as he thought good. But Agessilavus then, without chauncing or altering any thing of the lawe, sayd in open assemblie at LACEDÆMON: that for that day they should let the law alone, notwithstanding, that afterwards it should stand in force. By this policie he kept the lawe inuiolate, and saued also the honor of those poore men: and withall, to put these youtnes againe in hart, being amazed with this feare, he led the armie into the contrie of ARCADIA, and would geue no battell, but onely tooke a small citie of the MANTINIANS, and foraged the contrie. This againe did a little reuiue the citie of SPARTA with some hope, to make that it should not vterly dispaire. But shortly after, Epaminondas inuaded the contrie of LACONIA, with fortie thousand foote men well armed, besides an infinite number of others light armed, and naked people, that followed his campe for the spoyle: so that in all, there were about three score and fenne thousand fighting men that came in with him to inuade LACONIA. It was well nere fixe hundred yeares sith the DORIANS possessed LACEDÆMON, and in all that time till then they neuer saw enemies in their contrie that durst inuade them: but then they sacked & burnt all that came in their way, euen vnto the riuert of Eurotas, and hard adioyning vnto SPARTA, and no man durst come out to resist them. For Agessilau (as Theopompus wryteth) would not suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to goe out to fight against such a tempest and furie of warre, but hauing fortified the middest of the citie, and garded euery end of the streetes with souldiers, he patiently bare all the bragges and threats of the THEBANS, which challenged him out to fight, and bad him come into the feld to defende his contrie, that onely was the cause of all these their calamities, hauing him selfe procured this warre. If this went to Agessilau hart, no lesse grievous were these troubles to him that rose within the citie. As the cries and runninge toe and froe of the old men, which were mad to see that they did before their eyes: and of old women also, which no ground nor place could hold, but ranne vp and downe, as straught out their wittes, to heare the noife the enemies made, and to see the fire which they raised all the fildes ouer. Much more sorowefull also did this make him, when as he bethought him selfe, that entring into his kingdom at such time as the citie of SPARTA was in the greatest prosperitie that euer it was, he now saw his honor eclipsed, and the glorie of his kingdom ouerthrowen: and the rather, for that him selfe had often auaunted, that LACONIAN women had neuer seene the smoke of any enemies campe. And as they say of Antalcidas one day, that he auersified an ATHENIAN that contended with him about the valliantnesse of one an others nation, alleaging for him selfe, that the ATHENIANS had often driuen the LACEDÆMONIANS from the riuert of Cephesus. It is true, said the LACONIAN: but we did neuer driue you from the riuert of Eurotas. The like aunswere made a meane man of SPARTA, to one of the ARGIVES that cast him in the teeth, there are diuers of your LACONIANS buried in the contrie of ARGOLIDE: so are there none of yours, sayd he, buried in LACONIA. It is reported, that Antalcidas being one of the Ephori at that time, did secretly sende his children into the Ile of CITHERA, fearing least the citie of SPARTA should be taken. Agessilau perceiving that the enemies forced to passe ouer the riuert, to enter the citie: he stooode to defende the middle parte of the citie, being the hiest place of the fame, and there had his men sette in order of battell. Now at that time, by chance the riuert of Eurotas was swelled greater then of ordinarie, by reason of the snowe waters that fell abundantly: which troubled more the THEBANS with the coldnes, then roughnes of the same, in passing it ouer. Some shewing Agessilau how Epaminondas marched formeist before his battell, he beheld him a great while, and his eye was neuer of him, saying neuer a word but this onely: O, what a noble fellowe is that? Epaminondas hauing done all that he could possible to geue the LACEDÆMONIANS battell, euen within the citie, selfe of SPARTA, that he might there haue set vp some tokens of triumphe, he could neuer intise Agessilau to come out of his forte: wherefore he was driuen in the ende to departe thence, and so went to destroy all the rest of the contrie. There fell out a conspiracie of two hundred men in SPARTA, who of long time had had an ill meaning with them, and tooke that quarter of the citie where the temple of Diana stooode, called Issorium, a place of strong situation, and ill to distresse. Hereuppon the LACEDÆMONIANS in furie would straight haue set upon them. But Agessilau fearing great mutinie and sturre upon it: commaunded that no man should sturre: and him selfe vnarmed, in a poore gowne went thither, crying out to them that had taken that strength: Sirs, ye haue not obeyed my commaundement. This is not the place I appointed you to assemble in, neither all of you in one place: for I willed you to disperse your selues, some one way, some another way, shewing them the quarters of the citie. The traitors hearing these wordes, were glad, as thinking that their intent was not betraied: and so leauing that strength, went into those partes of the citie that he had shewed them. Agessilau then bringinge others thither, possessed the forte of Issorium, and tooke fiftene of those conspiratours, and put them to death the next night followinge. Howbeit then there brake out an other conspiracie farre greater than the first, of the SPARTANS them selues which were secretly gotten together into a house, to make some sodaine sturre and garboyle, and to punish them in so great a trouble, it was hard: on thother side to neglect it, the conspiracie was ouer dangerous. Agessilau hauing consulted with the Ephori, did put them all to death, without any iudgement of lawe, neuer SPARTANS before them suffering death, without due order of law. Again, whereas diuers of their neighbours, & of the Mores them selues, (whom

A (whom they had billed in their bandes for souldiers) stole away, and ranne to their enemies, which did much discourage them that remained: he warned his men that they should euerie day goe to their couches where they lay, and that they shoulde take away their armour that were fled, and hide it, bicause they should not knowe the names of them that were fled in this forte. Now for the departure of the THEBANS, some say that they went out of LACONIA by reason of the winter that came on, whereuppon the ARCADIANS discharged their bandes, and euerie one departed his way in disorder. Others also holde opinion, that they continued there three monethes together, during which time they destroyed the most parte of the contrie. Theopompus wryteth notwithstanding, that the Captaines of the THEBANS hauing determined to departe, there came one Phrixus a SPARTAN vnto them, sent from Agessilau, who brought them tenne talents that they should departe out of their contrie. Thus had they money geuen them to defraye their charges homewards, to doe that, which they them selues had long before determined to haue done. And yet doe I wonder, howe it is possible that all other hiltoriographers knewe nothing of this, and that Theopompus onely could tell of it. All doe acknowledge truly, that Agessilau onely was the cause that the citie of SPARTA was faued: who leauing his ambition and selfe will, being passions borne with him, did wisely foresee their safetie. Neuerthelesse, after this great ouerthrowe, he could neuer raise SPARTA againe to her former greatnesse. For like as a whole bodie, which hauing acquainted it selfe continually with a moderate diet, with the least disorder doth surfeit presently, and so putteth all in danger: euen so Lycurgus hauing framed a perfect state of government in the common wealth of SPARTA, to make her citizens liue in peace and amitie together: when they did enlarge it by great kingdoms and realmes, the which the good lawemaker thought vnmeet to continue happie life: they were straight ouerthrowen and all went to wracke. By this time Agessilau was grown olde, and could no more goe to the warres for verie age: but his sonne Archidamus, with the aide which Dionysius the tyranne of SYRACUSA sent vnto them, wanne a battell against the ARCADIANS, called the tearelesse battell: for there dyed not one of his men, and they lue a great number of their enemies. This victorie plainely shewed the great weakenesse and decate of the citie of SPARTA. For in former times it was so common a thing vnto them to overcome their enemies in battell, that they did sacrifice nothinge else to the goddess in token of thanks, within the citie, but a poore cocke: and they that had fought the battell made no boast of it: neither did they that had the newes reioice greatly at it. For when they had wonne that great battell at the citie of MANTINEA, which Thucydides describeth: the Ephori onely sent the messenger that brought the newes for reward, a peece of powdered meate, and no other thing. But then, when newes was brought of this victorie, and that they vnderstoode Archidamus came home victorious: neither man nor woman could keepe the citie, but the father him selfe went first of all to meete him, with the teares in his eyes for it, and after him all the other Magistrates and officers of the citie, and a swarme of old folke both men & women came downe to the riuers side, holding vp their hands to heauen, & thanking the goddess, as if their citie had redeemed and recovered her shame and lost honor, and beganne nowe to rise againe, as before it did. For vntill that time, some say, that the husbandes durst not boldly looke their wiues in the faces, they were so aithamed of their great losses and miserable estate. Now the citie of MESSINA being by Epaminondas reedified and replenished with people, he called home againe out of all partes, the naturall inhabitants of the same. The SPARTANS durst not fight with him (not to hinder his purpose) though it spighted them to the hartes, and were angrie with Agessilau, for that in his raighe they had lost all that territory, which was as great as all LACONIA selfe, and that for goodnesse and fertilitie compared with the best partes of all GRECE, the which they had quietly possessed many yeares before. And this was the cause why Agessilau would not agree to the peace, which the THEBANS sent to offer him: and all bicause he would not relinquish that in wordes, which the enemies kept in deedes. Therefore being wilfully bent once more to fight with them, he went not only without recovering the thing he looked for, but had in manner also lost the citie of SPARTA by a warlike stratageame, in the which he was decieued. For the MANTINIANS being newly reuolted againe from the alliance of the THEBANS, and hauing sent for the LACEDÆMONIANS: Epa-

Epaminondas receiving intelligence that Agefilaw was departed from SPARTA with all his power to aide the MANTINIANS, & marched away secretly by night from TEGÆA, without the priuite of the MANTINIANS, and went straight to SPARTA, the which he had almost surprised on the sodayne (going another way then Agefilaw came,) being in manner without men to defende it. Howbeit a THESPIAN called Euthymus, as Callisthenes sayth, (or as Xenophon wryeth, a CRETAN), brought Agefilaw newes of it: who dispatched a horseman straight to aduertise them of the cite of SPARTA, and marching forward him selfe to returne, stayed not longe after before he arrived. He was no sooner come, but incontinently also came the THEBANS, who passing over the river of Eurotas, gaue assault to the city. Then Agefilaw per-ceiuing that there was no more place nor time of securitie as before, but rather of depreda-tion and courage: he valiantly defended it more then an olde mans yeares could beare. Thus, through corage and desperate minde, whereto he was neuer brought before, neither did euervise it, he put by the danger, and saved the cite of SPARTA from Epaminondas handes, setting vp markes of triumphe for repulsing of the enemies, and making the women and children of SPARTA to see the LACEDÆMONIANS how honorable they rewarded their nurse and contrie for their good education: but Archidamus chiefly of all other, fought wonderfully that day, running into euerie parte of the cite, with a fewe about him, to re-puls the enemies wheresoeuer the danger was greatest. It is sayd also that at that time there was one Iphidas the sonne of Phæbidæ, that did maruelous straunge thinges to beholde, both in the face of his enemies, as also in the fight of his frendes. He was of goodly personage, and at that time in the prime of his youth: and being stark naked, and vnarmed, his bodie noynted with oyle, hauing in one hande a borestaffe, and in the other a sword, in this maner he went out of his house, and ranne amongst them that fought, killinge and ouerthro-wing his enemies that withstoode him, and was not once hurt, either for that the goddes preferred him for his manhoods sake, or else bicause men thought him more then a man. The Ephor immediately gaue him a crowne, in honor and reward of his valiantnesse: but withall they set a fine on his head to pay a thousand silver Drachmas for his rash attempt, to hazard him selfe in battell, vnarmed for defense. Shortly after they fought an other great battell before the cite of MANTINEA. There Epaminondas hauing ouerthrowen the first rankes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and coragiously distressing the rest, valiantly following the chase: there was one Anticrates a LACONIAN, who receiuing him (as Diofcorides writeth) slue him with his borestaffe. The LACEDÆMONIANS to this day notwithstanding, doe call the offspring of this Anticrates, Macheriones: as much to say, as swordmen, as though he had slaine him with a sword. The LACEDÆMONIANS did esteeme this Anticrates so much, for that deadly stroke he gaue (bicause they were afrayed of Epaminondas while he liued) that they gaue him that slue him, great honors & dignities, and discharged all his offspring & kinned from payment of subsidie and common contributions, which priuledge one Callistates, a kinsman of this Anticrates, enjoyed euen in our time. After this battell and death of Epaminondas, the GRÆCIANS hauing taken peace generally amongst them, Agefilaw would needs exclude the MESSENIANS from being sworn to this peace, saying: that they neede not sweare, bicause they had no city. Now, forasmuch as all the GRÆCIANS did receiue them as amongst the number, & & tooke their othe vnto this peace: the LACEDÆMONIANS brake of from this general peace, and none but they onely made warre, in hope to recouer the MESSENIANS contrie, and all through the allurement of Agefilaw, who for this cause was thought of the GRÆCIANS a cruell and vnstable man for warres, to deale so craftily, and all to breake this generall league.
Again, he brought him selfe in discredit with all men, beinge compelled to make his cite bare of money, borrowing of them still, and raising sundrie contributions amongst them: wheras in deede it had bene his best way to haue ended all those miseries, hauing so hap-pie an occasion offered at that time, & not to haue lost so great an Empire of so many townes and cities, both by sea and lande, and all to plague his contrie, to winne the lande and riches of the MESSENIANS. But yet was this most shame vnto him of all other, when he gaue him selfe vnto one Tachos, a Captaine of the EGYPTIANS, euerie man thinking it a shamefull parte of him, that such a personage as he (reputed the chiefe man of all the GRÆCIANS, and the

A which had filled the worlde with reporte of his fame and glorie) should for money let out his person to hyre, and the glorie of his name, vnto a barbarous person, a traitor and rebell to his kinge and maister, to become a mercenary Captaine and souldier to doe him seruice. And moreouer, he being now foure score yeares of age and vpwardes, his bodie all mangled with woundes, though he had vnderaken this honorable charge for the recouerie of the libertie of the GRÆCIANS, yet had his ambition deserued some blame: for noble actes haue their time, yea rather the good and ill doe nothing differ from other, but in meane and mediocrity. But Agefilaw had no regard of all this, and thought no manner of shame in seruice, specially for benefite of the common wealth, but perswaded him selfe that it was a dishonor to him to lye idle in a cite and doe nothing, till death should come and make his summones: thereupon therefore he leuied men of warre through all GRÆCE with the money Tachos sent vnto him, and with them tooke sea; hauing thirtie SPARTANS counsellors and assistants to him, as he had in his first iorney. Now Agefilaw being arrived in EGYPT, all the chiefe Captaines and Gouernours of king Tachos came to the sea shore, and honorable receiued him: and not they only, but infinite numbers of EGYPTIANS of all sortes (that were maruelous desirous of him, for the great fame that went abroad of Agefilaw) came thither from all partes to see what manner of man he was. But when they saue no stately trayne about him, but an olde graybeard layed on the grasse by the sea side, a litle man that looked fimplic of the mar-ter, and but meanely apparelled in an ill fauored three bare gowne: they fell a laughing at him, remembering the merie tale, that the mountaines should bring forth, and was deliuered of a mouse. Besides all this, they wondered when they saue men bring him presentes to welcome him, that he tooke meale, calues, and geese, and such grosse thinges: and refused all confections, perfumes and other delicacies, praying them that offered those dainty things to him, to geue them to the LOTES his slaues, Theophrastus wryeth, that he delighted maruelously in the rushe Papyrus, and liked the garlandes they made of them, for their finenesse and the handsonnesse, the which he caried home with him when he departed thence. Hauing spoken at that time with Tachos, who was assembling his armie to goe on his iorney: he was not made chiefeaine generall, as he looked he should haue bene, but was appointed only Colonell of all the straungers, Chabrias Generall of all the armie by sea, and the chiefe of all the rest was Tachos him selfe in person. This at the first grieved Agefilaw to the hart, being driuen whether he would or not, to beare with the vanitie and pride of this EGYPTIAN.
So he layed with him into PHENICE, against the PHENICIANS, imbasing him selfe against his noble disposition and minde, and gaue him place, vntill he saw time of reuenge. It chaun-ced that one Nestanebos a nephewe of this Tachos, hauing the leading of parte of this armie, rebelled against him, and being chosen king by the EGYPTIANS, he sent vnto Agefilaw, and prayed him to come and take his parte. The like he did also vnto Chabrias, and prayed him to ioyne with him, promising great rewardes vnto them both. Tachos vnderstanding that, besought them both that they would not forsake him. Chabrias for his parte allowed likewise to intreate Agefilaw, and perswade him what he coule, to continue frendshippe with Tachos.
Agefilaw answered him, for thee, Chabrias, thou comest of thine owne good will; and therefore mayest doe what thou thinkest good: but so is it not with me. For I am sent hither a Captaine by my contrie, to serue the EGYPTIANS, and therefore it were no honestie for me to make warre with them, whome I am sent to serue and aide: were it not that they them selues which sent me, doe nowe commaunde me the contrary: This answer being made, he sent certaine of his men to SPARTA to accuse Tachos, and to commend Nestanebos.
Both they also for their partes sent to intreate the counsell of LACEDÆMONIANS: the one as being alwayes their frende and confederate, and the other promising to be their faithfull frende thenceforth. The LACEDÆMONIANS hauing heard the requestes of both, answered them openly, that Agefilaw shoulde consider of this matter: and wrote secretlie to him, that he should doe what he thought best for the common wealth of SPARTA. So Agefilaw taking F with him the mercenary souldiers which he had brought out of GRÆCE, went vnto Nestanebos, cloking his departure, that it was for the benefite of his contrie, to bewray a wicked thing: but in deede taking away the vildard to benefit his contrie, they might by a better name rightly haue rearmed it treason. Howbeit the LACEDÆMONIANS placing the chiefeſt point of honor, to conſiſt in the benefit of their contrie: did acknowledge nothing to be iuſtice, but that which they thought might ſerue for the aduancement of the glorie of SPARTA. Tachos ſeeing him ſelfe forſaken thus by his mercenarie ſtraungers, fled. But nowe on the other ſide, there roſe another Kinge in the cite of MENDES, againſt this Neſtanebos, who hauing leauied to the number of a hundred thouſande fightinge men, came to fight with Neſtanebos. But he thinking to encourage Agesilavus, tolde him, that in deede they were a great number of men of all ſortes together, and ſpeciallie men of handie craft, and therefore that they were not to be feared, becauſe they knewe not what warre ment. But Agesilavus answered him againe: it is not their number that I feare, but their rudeneſſe and vaſkillfullneſſe, which is hardeſt of all to deceiue. For warlike ſtratagames doe moſt preuaile againſt men that haue greateſt feare and experience: and therefore they foreſee one thing rather then an other. But men of no iudgement nor experience, neither feare daunger, nor haue forecaſt, and therefore doe geue him no more aduantage that ſecketh to deceiue them, then the wraſtler by ſlight is able to ouerthrowe him, whome he can not ſturre nor remoue. Afterwardes the MENDESIAN king him ſelfe ſent vnto Agesilavus, to winne him if he could. Neſtanebos then beganne to be affrayed. For when Agesilavus counſelled him to trye it by battell as ſoone as he could, and not to prolonge this warre againſt ignorant men that had no ſkill to fight, but yet for their ouermultitude, might intreche him rounde about, and preuent him in diuers thinges: then he beganne to feare and ſuſpect him more, and thereupon retyred into a great cite well walled about, and of great ſtrength. Agesilavus beinge offended that he miſtruſted him thus, tooke it inwardlie: but beinge aſhamed to turne againe vnto the third, and alſo to departe without any employe done, he followed him, and encloſed him ſelfe within thoſe walles. The enemies purſuinge him hard, came vnto the cite, and beganne to entreche it rounde, to keepe him in. Then the EGYPTIAN Neſtanebos ſeeing a longe ſiege, determined to geue them battell. Thereto the hyered GRECIANS gaue conſent, as deſiringe no better matche, and the rather alſo for that there was but ſmall ſtore of corne within the cite. But Agesilavus perſwadinge the contrarie, would in no wiſe conſent to it: whereupon the EGYPTIANS thought worſe of him then before, and plainly called him traytor to their kinge. Howbeit he did patientlie beare all their accuſations, expectinge time to performe an employe he intended, which was this. The enemies had cutt a deepe trenche without, to compaſſe them in. When this trenche drew neere to ende, and that both endes lacked not much of meetinge, tarryinge till night came on, he commaunded the GRECIANS to arme, and to put them ſelues in readineſſe: then he came vnto the EGYPTIAN, and ſayed vnto him. Loe here is an excellent occaſion preſented to ſaue thee, which I would not acquaint thee withall till I ſaw it brought to the perfeccion I looked for, fearing leaſt otherwiſe we ſhoulde haue loſt it. Nowe ſith the enemies them ſelues haue with their owne handes geuen vs the way to ſaue our ſelues by this trenche they haue caſt, the which as muche as is finiſhed thereof dothe hinder their great multitude to helpe them ſelues, and that which is yet left vniſhiſhed dothe geue vs oportunitie to fight with them of euen hande: determine to hewe thy valure, and followinge vs, ſaue thy ſelfe and thy people. For the enemies which we ſhall aſſaile before vs, ſhall neuer be able to abide vs: and the other by meanes of the trenche which defendeth vs on our ſide, can no way hurte vs. Neſtanebos hearinge his wordes, wondered at his great wiſedome, and ſo thruſtinge inamonge the GRECIANS, did aſſaile the enemies: the which were ſoone ouerthrowen and put to flight, as many as durſt reſiſt, and make heade againſt them. Agesilavus hauinge wonne Neſtanebos againe to truſt him, he once againe deceiued his enemies with the like ſubtiltie wherewith he had firſt beguiled them, and which they knewe not howe to auoyde. For one while he made as though he fled, and inticed them to followe him: ſo dainely againe he woulde turne this waye and that waye. In fine, he brought all this great multitude into a ſtraight fluce, walled about of either ſide, with great broad ditch ſull of runninge water: ſo that when they were euen in the miſt of it, he ſodainely ſtopped their paſſage with the fronte of his battell, which he caſt to the breadthe of the fluce,

A and thus made his number of fighting men equall with the multitude of his enemies, which could neither compaſſe him in behinde, nor flanke him on the ſides. They hauing in this ſorte made ſome ſmall reſiſtaunce, in the ende turned their backs and fled, and left a great number ſlaine in the field: the reſidue after that laſt ouerthrowe forooke their Captaines, and fled ſtraglingly here and there. Thus the affaires of this EGYPTIAN king after that time had good ſucceſſe, and was quietly ſtabliſhed in his kingdom, making much of Agesilavus: and doing him all honor poſſible, prayed him to tarry with him all that winter. Howbeit he would needes haſten home to his contrie, which was in warre with others, knowing that his cite of SPARTA was without money, becauſe they were driuen to geue pay vnto ſtraungers. Thereupon Neſtanebos in theſe tooke his leaue of him very honorably, preſenting him a gift (beſides all other honors he did him) of two hundred and thirſie ſiluer tallentes in readie money, to defraye the charges of the warre in his contrie. Howbeit the ſea being rough in the winter quarter, he died by the way, hauing notwithstanding recovered land with his ſhippes in a deſert place of the coaſt of LYBIA, which was called the hauen of Menelaus, after he was foure ſcore & foure yeare old: of the which he had reigned one and forty yeares king of SPARTA, and thirty yeares thereof and more he was alwayes taken and reputed for the greateſt perſon, and in manner Chiefeſtaine generall of all GRECE, vntill the battell of LEVCTRES. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing a cuſtome to burie the dead bodies of their citizens that died out of their contrie, in the ſame place where they departed: (the bodies of their kinges excepted) the SPARTANS which were at that time about Agesilavus, annoynted his bodie with waxe for lacke of honny, and caried him home to SPARTA in this maner. His ſonne Archidamus ſucceeded him in the kingdom, whoſe iſſue ſucceſſiuely reigned continually after him, vnto the time of Agis (who was the ſiſt king in ſucceſſion after Agesilavus) whom in deede Leonidas put to death, becauſe he ſought to reſtore the LACEDÆMONIANS auncient diſcipline and forme of life.

Pompey.

THE ROMANES seeme to haue loued Pompey from his childhoode, with the selfe affection that Fromethem in the tragedie of Aeschylus appeareth to haue borne vnto Hercules, after that he was deliuered by him when he sayd,

So great a hate I bare not to the father, But that I loue the sonne of him much rather.

For the ROMANES neuer shewed more bitter hate against any other Captaine, than they did vnto Strabo Pompeys father. Truly so long as he liued, they feared his greatnesse obtained by armes, for in deede he was a noble Captaine: but being stricken with a thunderbolt, and dead, they tooke him from the beare whereon his bodie lay as they caried him to buriall, and did thereto great villannie. Contrariwise, neuer any other ROMANE (but Pompey) had the peoples earnest goodwilles so soone, nor that in prosperitie and aduersitie continued lenger constant, then vnto Pompey. One only cause procured the fathers hate, and that was: an vnstable and greedy desire of money. But Pompey his sonne, was for many occasions beloued. As, for temperance of life, aptnesse to armes, eloquence of tongue, faithfulness of word, and curtesie in conuersation: so that there was neuer man that requested any thing with lesse ill will then he, nor that more willingly did pleasure any man when he was requested. For he gaue without disdain, and tooke with great honor. Furthermore, being but a childe, he had a certaine grace in his looke that wan mens good willes before he spake: for his countenance was sweete, mixed with grauetie, & being come to mans state, there appeared in his iesture and behaviour, a grate & princely maiestie. His heare also stoode a litle vpright, and the cast and soft mouing of his eyes, had a certaine resemblance (as they sayd) of the statues and images of king Alexander. And because euerie man gaue him that name, he did not refuse it him selfe: in somuch as there were some which sportingwise did openly call him Alexander. Whereupon Lucius Philippus a Consul, was not ashamed to say openly in an oration he made in Pompeys fauor, that it was no maruell if he being Philip, did loue Alexander. It is reported also, that when Flora the curtisan waxed old, she much delighted to talke of the familiaritie which she had with Pompey beinge a young man: telling

A telling that after she had layen with him, she could not possiblie rise from him; but she must needs geue him some sweete quippe or pleasant taunte: She woulde tell also howe one of Pompeys familiars and companions called Geminus, fell in loue with her, and was a maruelous earnest suitor to obtaine her good will: and that she answered him flatly, she would not, for the loue she bare to Pompey. Geminus thereupon brake the matter to Pompey him selfe. Pompey desirous to pleasure him, graunted the request: howbeit Geminus after that, would not come neere Flora, nor speake vnto her, albeit it appeared that he yet loued her. But Flora tooke this not curtisan like, for she was sicke a long time for very grieue of minde, and she thought she tooke vpon it. All this notwithstanding, it is sayd that this Flora had then such fame for her passing grace and beautie, that Cecilius Metellus sieting forth and beautifying the temple of Cybus and Vollux, with goodly tables and pictures: among the rest, he caused her picture to be liuely drawn for her excellent beawtie. Furthermore Pompey, against his nature, delt very hardly and vncurtisiously with the wife of Demetrius, his franchised bondeman (who while he liued was in great credit with him, and dying, left her worth foure thousand tallentes) fearing to be taken with her beautie which was verie singularie fayer, least he should be thought in loue with her. Now, though herein he seemed to be very circumspect, and to cast the worst yet could he not thus scape the detracting tongues of his ill willers: for they did accuse him, that to please and content his wiues, he would let passe and winke at many things, that was against the profit of the common wealth? To proue his sober and temperate diet, and howe he was contented with common meates: a word (they say) he spake when he was verie sicke, and could tast no meate, is specially noted. For, to bring his stomake to him againe, his Phisitician willed him to eate a thrush. So seeking all about to get him one, there was no thrush to be bought for money, for they were out of season. Notwithstanding, one told him that he should not misse of them at Lucullus house, for he kept them vp all the yeare through. Why, what then, sayd he: if Lucullus ryot were not, should not Pompey liue? Therewithall, letting his Phisitians counsell alone, he made them dresse such meate as was euery where common. But of that we will speake more hereafter. Now Pompey being a young man, and in the felds with his father, that was in armes against Cinna: there lay with him in his tent a companion of his, called Lucius Terentius, who being bribed with money, had promised Cinna to kill him, and other confederators also had promised to set their Capitaines tent a fire. This conspiracy was reuealed vnto Pompey as he sat at supper, which nothing amated him at all, but he dranke freely, and was merrier with Terentius then of custome. So when it was bed time, he stole out of his owne tent, and went vnto his father to prouide for his safetie. Terentius thinkinge the howe come to attempt his enterprise, rose with his sword in his hande, and went to Pompeys bed where he was wont to lye, and gaue many a thrust into the matteresse. After he had done that, all the campe straight was in an vpror for the malice they bare vnto their Capitaine, and the souldiers in all hast would needes haue gone and yekled to their enemye, beginning already to ouerthrowe their tentes, and to trusse away bagge and baggage. The Capitaine for feare of this tumult, durst not come out of his tent: notwithstanding Pompey his sonne ranne amongst the mutinous souldiers, and humbly besought them with the teares in his eyes, not to doe their Capitaine this villanie, and in fine threwe him selfe flating to the grounde ouerthwart the gate of the campe, bidding them marche ouer him, if they had such a desire to be gone. The souldiers being ashamed of their follie, returned againe to their lodginge, and changing minde, reconciled them selues with their Capitaine, eight hundred onely excepted, which departed. But immediately after that Strabo Pompeys father, was departed out of the worlde, Pompey beinge his heire, was accused for the father, to robbe the common treasure. Howbeit he confessed, and auowed, that it was Alexander one of his fathers franchised bondemen that had stolen the most parte of it, and brought him in before the Iudges. Notwithstanding, he was accused him selfe, for taking away the toyles and arming cordes of hunters nettes, and bookes, that were taken at Asculum. He confessed the hauing of them, and that his father gaue him them when the citie was taken: howbeit that he had lost them fence; when Cinna returned vnto Rome with his souldiers, who breaking into his house by force, spoyled him of all that he had. His matter had many dayes of hearing before determinate sentence, in which time Pompey shewed him selfe of good spirit and vnderstanding, more than A was looked for in one of his yeares: in so much he wanne such fame and fauor by it, that Antistius being Prætor at that time, and iudge of his matter, fell into such a liking with him, that secretly he offered him his daughter in marriage. Then that matter being by friends broken to Pompey, he liked of the match, & the parties were secretly assured. This was not so closely conveyed, but the people perceived it, by the care and paines Antistius tooke to fauor his matter. In so much, when the Iudges gaue iudgement, and cleared him: all the people together, as if they had bene agreed, cried out with one voyce, Talassio, Talassio, being the vñall and common cry they vied of olde time at marriages in Rome. This custome by reporte of auncient folke came vp in this manner. At what time the chiefeſt peeres and Lordes of Rome didt with the SABINES daughters, which came to Rome to see common ſportes played: there chaunced a fewe rascalls (as hoggeherdes or neatherdes) to carie away a goodly fayre woman. They fearing she should be taken from them, cried out in the ſtreets as they went, Talassio, as if they would haue ſayd, she is for Talassio. This Talassio was a young gentleman well known, and beloued of most men: so that such as heard him but named only, did clappe their hands for ioy, & cried out with them, Talassio, commending the choyce they had made for him. So, hereof they say came this custome, that euer ſince they haue cried this word Talassio vnto them that are newly married, because the marriage of that fayre young maid proued fortunate, and happy vnto Talassio. And this me thinkes foundeth noerest to the troth of that they reporte of this wedding cry of Talassio. Shortly after this iudgement geuen, Pompey married Antistia. After that, going vnto *Cinna*s campe, they wrongfully accused him for some what, whereupon he being afraied, secretly stole away. Now when they could not finde him in *Cinna*s campe, there ran straight a rumor abroad, that Cinna had put him to death. Thereupon, they that of long time had maliced Cinna, did set vpon him for this occasion. But he thinking to saue him selfe by flying, was straight ouertaken by a priuate Capitaine that followed him with his sworde drawn in his hande. Cinna seeing him, fell downe on his knees before him, and tooke his seale from his finger wherewith he sealed his letters, which was of great price, and offered it him. Tulius, sayd the Capitaine, I come not to seale any countenanc, but to chastise a villaine and cruell tyranne: and therewithall thrust his sworde thorow him, and slue him presently. Cinna being slaine in this sorte, Carbo succeeded him, and tooke the government in hande, being a more cruell tyranne than the first. Shortly after came in Sylla, D being wished for, and desired of the most parte of the ROMANES, for the grieuous oppressions and miseries they endured, that they thought them selues happy to chaunge Gouernour for their citie was brought into such miserie, as hoping no more to see Rome recover her lost libertie, they desired yet a more tollerable bondage. Now Pompey at that time was in a place of ITALIE called PICENVM (nowe the marches of ANCONA) where he had certaine inheritance, but much more, great loue and good will of the cities for his fathers sake. He seeing that the nobleſt men of Rome forooke their houses and goodes, to flie from all partes vnto *Sylla*s campe, as vnto a place of safetie: would not goe to him as a fugitive and cast away to saue him selfe, without bringing him some power to increase his armie, but would honorably goe thither with an armie, as he that ment first to doe him selfe pleasure. So he felt the good B will of the PICENINES, who willingly tooke his parte, and reiected them that were sent by Carbo. Among them there was one Vindius, that stepping forth, said: that Pompey which came from schoole the last day, must now in haft be a Capitaine. But they were so offended with his speech, that they straight dispatched him, and killed him out of hande. After that time, Pompey being but three and twentie yeare olde, tarying to receive no authoritie from any man, tooke it upon him himselfe, & causing a tribunal to be set vp in the midst of the market place of AVXTIMVM, a great populous city: he commaunded the two brethren called the Venditians (being the chiefeſt men of the citie, and they that for *Carbo*s sake withſtoode his doings) without delay forthwith to auoide the citie, and so beganne to leaue men, and to appoint Capitaines, sergeants of bandes, Centeniers, and such other officers as appertaine to martiall discipline. Then he went to all the other cities of the same marches, and did the like. They that tooke parte with Carbo, fled euery man, and all the rest willingly yielded vnto him: whereby

A whereby in shorte space he had gotten three whole legions together, munition to entertaine them, carres, and all manner of beastes for cariage. In this sorte he tooke his iorney towards Sylla, not in haft, as a man affrayed to be met with by the way, but by small iorneyes, staying still where he might hurt his enemy, causing the cities euery where as he came to reuolt from Carbo. Neuerthelesse, three Capitaines of the contrary parte, Cariina, Galina, and Brutus, all three did sette apon Pompey together, not all in a fronte, nor of one ſide, but in three ſeueral places they compassed him with their armies, thinking to haue made him ſure at the first onſet. This nothing amazed Pompey, but putting his force together in one place, he first marched against Brutus, hauing placed his horsemen (among the which he was him selfe in person) before the battell of his footemen. Now the men of armes of the enemy which were GAVLES, B comming to geue charge apon him, he ranne one of the chiefeſt among them through with his lance, and slue him. The other GAVLES seeing him slaine, turned their backs, and brake their owne footemen: so that at length they all fled for life. Thereupon the Capitaines fell out among them selues, and some fled one way, some another way, the best they could. Then the townes round about, thinking that they were disperſed for feare: came all in to Pompey, and yielded them selues. Afterwards Scipio the Conſull comming against Pompey to fight with him, when both battells were in maner ready to ioyne: before they came to throwing of their darts, *Scipio*s fouldriers saluted Pompey's men, and went on their ſide. So Scipio was driuen to flie. And in fine, Carbo him selfe hauing ſent after him diuers troups of horsemen by the river of Aris: Pompey made towards them, and did so fiercely assault them, that he draue them into C ſuch places, as was almost impossible for horsemen to come into. Whereupon, they seeing no way to ſcape, yielded them selues, horse and armor, all to his mercie. Sylla all this while heard no newes of these ouerthrowes: wherefore, as loone as he vnderſtoode of it, fearing least Pompey should miscarrie, being enuironned with so many Capitaines of his enemies, he made haft to marche towards him for to aide him. Pompey vnderſtanding of his approche, commaunded his Capitaines to arme their men, and to put them in battell ray, that their General might see them brauely appointed when he should present the vnto him: for he looked that Sylla would doe him great honor, & in deede he did him more honor, then Pompey looked for. For, when Sylla ſaw him a farre of comming towards him, and his armie marſhalled in so good order of battell, and such goodly men, that so brauely aduanced them selues, being coragious for the victorie they had obtained of their enemies: he lighted a foote. When Pompey also came to doe his duty to him, and called him Imperator: (as much as Emperour, or ſoueraigne Prince) Sylla reſaluted him with the ſelfe name, beyonde all mens expectation present, little thinking that he would haue geuen so honorable a name, vnto so young a man as Pompey, who had not yet bene Senator: conſidering that he him selfe did contende for that title and dignitie, with the faction of Marius and Scipio. Furthermore, the entertainment that Sylla gaue him euery way, was aunſwerable to his first kindnes offered him. For when Pompey came before him, he would riſe and put of his cappe to him, which he did not vnto many of their noble men about him. All this notwithstanding, Pompey gloried nothing the more in him selfe. Wherefore when Sylla would straight haue ſent him into GAVLES, because Metellus that E was there, was thought to haue done no exploye worſhe of so great an armie as he had with him: Pompey answered him againe, that he thought it no reaſon to diſplace an auncient Capitaine that was of greater fame and experience than him selfe. Yet if Metellus of him selfe were contented, and would intreate him: that he would willingly goe and helpe him to ende this warre. Metellus was very glad of it, and wrote for him to come. Then Pompey entering GAVLES, did of him selfe wonderfull exployes, and did so reuiue Metellus olde corage and valiantnes to fight, which now beganne to faint, like boyling copper that being poored vpon the colde and hard copper, doth melt and diſſolue it, as fast or faster, then fire it ſelfe. For like as of a wrestler, who hath bene counted very strong, and the chiefeſt in all games, hauing euer borne the price away where he hath wrestled, they neuer recorde among them his childlike victories and wrestlings, as things of no account: euen so I am affrayed to ſpeake of the wonderfull deedes that Pompey did in his childhoode, because they are obſcured, in reſpect of the infinite great warres and battells which he had wonne afterwards. For I am affrayed that whi-

left I should go about particularly to acquaint you with his first beginnings, I should too lightly passe over his chiefest actes and most notable enterprises, which do best declare his naturall disposition and singular wit. Now when Sylla had overcome all ITALIE, and was proclaimed Dictator: he did reward all his Lieutenants and Captaines that had taken his parte, and did aduance them to honorable place & dignity in the common wealth, frankly granting them all that they requested of him. But for Pompey, reuerencing him for his valliantnes, & thinking that he would be a great stay to him in all his warres: he fought by some meanes to allice him to him. Metella his wife being of his opinion, they both perswaded Pompey to put away his first wife Antistia, and to marrie AEmylia the daughter of Metella, and of her first husband, she which also was an other mans wife, and with childe by her husband. These mariages were cruell and tyrannicall, fitter for Syllas time, rather then agreeable to Pompeys nature and condition: to see AEmylia, this new married wife taken from her lawfull husbande, to marrie her great with childe, and shamefully to forsake Antistia, who not long before had lost her father, and for respect of her husbande that did put her away. For Antistius was murdered within the very Senate house, being suspected to take parte with Sylla for his sonne in lawe Pompeys sake and her mother voluntarily put her selfe to death, seeinge her daughter receiued such open wrong. By these apparant causes, these vnfortunate mariages fell out into a miserable tragedie, by meanes of the death of AEmylia, who shortly after miserably dyed with childe in Pompeys house. Then came newes to Sylla, that Perpenna was gotten into SICILE, and that he had made all that llande at his deuotion, as a safe place to receiue all Syllas enemies: that Carbo also kept the sea thereabouts with a certaine number of shippes: that Domitius also was gone into AFRICK: and diuers other noble men that were banished, that had scaped his proscription and outlawryes, were all in those partes. Against them was Pompey sent with a great armie. Howbeit he no sooner arriued in SICILE, but Perpenna left him the whole llande, and went his way. There he fauorably delt with all the cities, which before had abidden great trouble and miserie, and set them againe at libertie, the MAMERTINES only excepted, which dwelt in the citie of MESSINA. They despising his tribunall and iurisdiction, alleaged the ancient order & priuilege of the ROMANES, let downe in times past amongst them. But Pompey answered them in choller: what do ye prattle to vs of your law, that haue our swords by our sides? It seemeth also that Pompey delt too cruellie with Carbo in his miserie. For such he must needs dye, as there was no remedie but he should: then it had bene better they had killed him when he was taken. For then they would haue imputed it to his malice, that so had commaunded it. But Pompey after he was taken, made him to be brought before him that had bene thrise Confull at ROME to be openly examined, and he sitting in his chaire of state or tribunall condemned him to dye in presence of them all: to the great offence and misliking of euery one that was present. So Pompey bad them take him away, and carie him to execution. When Carbo came to the scaffold where he should be executed, and seeinge the sword drawn that should strike of his head: he prayed the executioners to geue him a litle respite and place to vntresse a poynt, for he had a paine in his bellie. Caius Oppius also (one of Iulius Caesars friends) wryteth, that he delt verie cruellly in like manner with Quintus Valerius. For Pompey, sayd he, knowing that he was excellently well learned, as any man could be, and fewe like vnto him: when he was brought vnto him, he tooke him a side, and walked a fewe turnes about: then when he had questioned with him, and learned of him what he could, he commaunded his gard to carie him away, and to dispatche him. Howbeit we may not geue too light credit to all that Oppius wryteth, speaking of Iulius Caesars frendes or foes. For Pompey in deede was compelled to make away the greatest personages of Syllas enemies that fell into his hands, being notoriously taken: but for the rest, all those that he could secretly suffer to steale away, he was contented to winke at it, and would not vnderstand it: and moreouer did helpe some besides to saue them selues. Nowe Pompey was determined to haue taken sharpe reuenge of the citie of the HIMERIANS, which had stowly taken the enemies parte. But Sthenis, one of the Gouernours of the citie, crauing audience of Pompey, tolde him he should doe him wrong and iniustice, if he should pardon him that committed all the fault, and should destroy them that had not offended. Pompey then asking him, what he was that durst take vpon him to saue the

A the offence of them all. Sthenis answered straight, that it was him selfe that had perswaded his frendes, and compelled his enemies to doe that which they did. Pompey being pleased to heare the franke speech & boldnes of this man, first forgaue him the fault he had committed, and consequently all the other HIMERIANS. Pompey vnderstanding that his souldiers did kill diuers men in the high wayes, he sealed vp all their wordes, & whole scale sooner was broken, he was well fauoredly punished. Pompey being busie about these matters in SICILE, receiued letters & commission from Sylla and the Senate, to departe thence immediately into AFRICK, to make warre vpon Domitius, with all his power, who had leaued already more men of warre, than Marius had, not long before, when he came out of AFRICK into ITALIE: and had there ouerthrowen all the ROMANES doings, being become of a fugitiue outlaw, a cruell tyranne. Pompey thereupon hauing speedily put him selfe in readines to take the seas, left Memmius his sisters husband Gouernour of SICILE: and so him selfe imbarked, & hoysed saile with six score gallies, and eight hundred other shippes or bottomes, to transport their vittells, munition, money, engines of batterie, and all other cariage whatsoeuer. After he was landed with all his fleet, parte at Vtica, and parte at CARTHAGE: there straight came to him seuen thousand souldiers from the enemies, & yelded the selues, besides seuen whole legions that he brought with him. They say moreover, that at his arriuall, he had a pleasaunt chaunce happened vnto him to be laughed at: for it is reported, that certaine of his souldiers stumbled on a treasure by chaunce, and got thereby a great masse of money. The residue of the armie hearing that, thought sure that the field where this treasure was found, was full of golde and siluer, which the CARTHAGINIANS had hidden there long before in time of their calamitie. Pompey hereupon, for many dayes after, coulde haue no rule of his souldiers, neither coulde he chooseth but laugh, to see so many thousand men digging the grounde, and turning vp the field: vntill in the end they wearied them selues, and came and prayed him then to lead them where he thought good, for they had payed well for their follie. Domitius came to Pompey with his army set in battell ray. Howbeit there was a certaine quamyre before him that ran with a swift running streame, verie ill to get ouer: besides that, from the verie breake of day it had poored downe and rained so fast, and was so great a winde withall, that Domitius thinking all that day they should not fight, commaunded his people to truffle away, and remoue. Pompey on the other side, finding this an excellent fit occasion for him, sodainly made his men to march, and passed ouer the valley. The enemies perceiuing that, being altogether out of order: were maruelously amazed, and in that hurly burly would haue made resistance. But they were neither all together, nor yet euently set in battell ray, and had besides the winde beating the raine full in their faces. So did the storme much hurt vnto the ROMANES also, for they coulde not one see another: in somuch as Pompey him selfe was in great danger of being killed by one of his owne souldiers, who not knowing him, asked him the word of the battell, and he was somewhat long before he answered him. In fine, when he had ouerthrowen his enemies with great slaughter: (for they say, that of twenty thousand of them, there were but three thousand saved) Pompey his souldiers saluted him by the name of Imperator. But he answered them, that he would not accept the honor of that name, so long as he saw his enemies campe yet standing: and therefore, if it were so they thought him worthe of that name, that first they should ouerthrow the trenche and forte of the enemies, wherein they had entrenched their campe. The souldiers when they heard him say so, went presently to assault it. There Pompey fought bare headed, to auoide the like danger he was in before. By this meanes they tooke the campe by force, and in it slew Domitius. After that ouerthrowe, the cities in that contrie came and yelded them selues, some willingly, and others taken by force: as also they tooke king Parthia, that had fought for Domitius, and his realme was geuen to Hiempsal. But Pompey, being desirous further to employ his power, and the good fortune of his armie, went many dayes iorney into the maine lande, and still conquered all where he came, making the power of the ROMANES dreadfull vnto all the barbarous people of that contrie, the which made but small account of them at that time. He sayd moreover, that the wilde beastes of AFRICK also should feele the force and good successe of the ROMANES: and thereupon he bestowed a fewe dayes in hunting of Lyons and Elephanes. For it is reported, that in fortie dayes space at the vttermost, he had overcome his enemies, subdued AFRICK, and had stablished the affairs of the kingdoms of all that contry, being then but foure and twenty yeare old. So when he returned vnto the cite of VTICA, letters were brought from Sylla, willing him to discharge all his army, and to remaine there with one legion only, tarying the comming of another Captaine that should be sent to succede him in the gouernment of that contrie. This commaundement, grieved him not a litle, though he made no shewe of it at all: but his souldiers shewed plainly that they were offended. For when Pompey prayed them to departe, they began to geue out broad speeches against Sylla, and told directly that they were not determined (whatsoever became of them) to forsake him, and they would not that he should trust vnto a tyrant. Pompey seeing that he could not perswade them, by any reason to be quiet, rose out of his chayer, and retyre into his tent weeping. But the souldiers followed him, and brought him againe to his chayer of state, where he spent a great parte of the day, they intreating him to remaine there & commaund them, and he desiring them to obey Sylla, and leaue their mutinies. But in fine, seeing the importunate to presse him to it, he sware he would kill him selfe, rather then they should compell him: yet they scant left him thus. Hereupon it was reported vnto Sylla, that Pompey was rebelled against him. Sylla when he heard that, sayd to his frendes: well, then I see it is my destiny, in mine olde dayes to fight with children. He went fo, because of Marius the younger, who had done him much mischief, and had besides put him in great danger. But afterwards vnderstanding the troth, and hearing that all generally in Rome were determined to goe and meete Pompey, and to receiue him with all the honor they coule: because he would goe beyond them all in shewe of good will, he went out of his house to meete him; and embracing him with great affection, welcomed him home, and called him Magnus, to say great, and commaunded all them that were present to geue him that name also. This notwithstanding, some say, that it was in AFRICK this name was first geuen him by a common crye of all his whole army, and that afterwards it was confirmed by Sylla. In dede it is true that Pompey him selfe being sent Proconsul into SPAYNE long time after that, was the last that subscribed all his letters and commissions with the name of Pompey the great: for this name then was so commonly known and accepted, as no man did enuy it. And therefore rightly is the wisdom of the aunient ROMANES, to be both commended & had in admiration: which did not only reward seruice in the field with such honorable names & titles, but ciuill seruice and good gouernment also in peace at home. For there were two whom the people at Rome called Maximi, to say, very great: of the which Valerius was the one, for that he made peace and agreement betwixt the people and Senate. The other was Fabius Rullus, for that he put from the Senate certaine bondmen infranchised, who through their riches and fauor had obtained that place. After that, Pompey requiured the honor of triumphe, but Sylla denied it, alleging that none could enter in triumphe into Rome, but Consuls or Prators. Forfish Scipio the first who in SPAYNE had overcome the CARTHAGINIANS, neuer desired this honor of triumphe, being neither Consul nor Prator: much lesse should he stande upon demaund of triumphe into Rome, when that through his young yeares he was not yet a Senator: and besides, it would purchase him enuy of his honor and greatnes. These reasons did Sylla allege against Pompey, and told him plainly that if he were bent to stand in it, he would resist him. All this blanked not Pompey, who told him frankly againe, how men did honor the rising, not the setting of the sunne: meaning thereby, how his owne honor encreased, and Syllaes diminished. Sylla heard him not very perfectly what he sayd, but perceiving by their countenances that stood by, that they wondered at it, he asked what it was he sayd. When it was tolde him, he marvelled at the boldnes of so young a man, and then cried out twise together, let him then triumphe a Gods name. Many being offended therewith, Pompey (as it is reported) to anger them more, would needes be brought in in triumphant charriot drawn with foure Elephants: for he had taken many of them from those kings and Princes which he had subdued. Howbeit the gate of the city being too narrowe, he was driuen to leaue the Elephants, and was contented to be drawn in with horses. Now his souldiers that had not all things as they looked for, and which was promised them, going about to trouble and hinder his triumphe, he sayd he passed not for it, & that he would rather let alone all his preparation of triumphe, then then once to yeeld to flatter them. Whereupon, there was a famous man at that time called, Sempronius, who at the first was one of the chiefe against Pompeys triumphe, who sayd openly, now I know that Pompey in dede is great, & deserveth triumphe. Being euident enough, that if he would, he might then haue easily bene made Senator: he fied not for that, but as they say, sought honor by a straunger meane lesse honorable. For if he had bene made Senator so young, it had not bene so great a matter: but to haue such honor before he was Senator, that was maruelously to be noted. But this wanne him the more fauor and good will still amongst the common people: for they were glad when after his triumphe they saw him in companie amongst the ROMANE Knights. On thother side it spighted Sylla to see him come so fast forward, and to rise to lo great credit: notwithstanding, being ashamed to hinder him, he was contented to kepe it to him selfe, vntill that Pompey by force & against Syllaes will, had brought Lepidus to be Consul, by the helpe and good will of the people that furthered his desire. Thereupon Sylla seeing Pompey returning ouerthwart the market place from the election, with a great traine of followers to honor him, he sayd vnto him: O young man, I see thou art glad of this victory, and so hast thou cause, for it is a goodly thing out of doubt to haue had such fauor of the people, as for thy sake to haue made Lepidus Consul (the vilest person of all men) before Catulus the honestest man of the cite. But I will tell thee one thing, see that thou sleepe not, and looke well to thy busines, for thou hast aduanced a dangerous enemy to thy selfe. Now the chiefe thing wherein Sylla discouered most his ill will vnto Pompey, was in his last will and testament: for he gaue legacies vnto euery one of his frendes, and some of them he made tutors & ouerseers of his sonne, but he made no mention of Pompey at all. This notwithstanding, Pompey tooke it well enough. And where Lepidus and some other would haue kept Syllaes body from buriall in the field of Mars, and that his funerals should not be openly solemnized: he the contrarywise brought him very honorably and safely to the ground. Shortly after Syllaes death, his wordes of propheticie vnto Pompey concerning Lepidus, proued true. For Lepidus vsurping the authoritie which Sylla had before, not colourable, but openly entered straight in armes, stirring vp againe those of Marius faction, whom Sylla could not be reuenged of, and which lay lurking a long time, spying for occasion to rise againe. True it is that his colleague, and fellow Consul Catulus (whom the best and soundest parte of the people followed) was thought a maruelous honest man, both iust and modest: howbeit, a better Gouernor in peace, then a good man of warre, in so much as time required Pompeys skill and experience. So Pompey stood not doubtfull which way he would dispose him selfe, but tooke parte straight with the nobility and honestest men, & was presently chosen Captaine of their armie against Lepidus: who had already wonne the greatest parte of ITALIE, and with an army vnder the conduct of Brutus, kept GAYLE on this side the mountains, called GALLIA CISALPINA. And for the rest, Pompey easily ouercame it: howbeit he lay a long time before MODONA, besieging of Brutus. In the meane season Lepidus came to Rome, & being hard at the walls demanding the second Consulship, made them affrayed in the city with the great numbers of men he had about him, gathered together of all forties. Howbeit this feare was cooled straight, by a letter which Pompey wrote to Rome, aduertising how he had ended this warre without any bloodshed: for Brutus, either betraying his army, or being betrayed of it, yeilded him selfe vnto Pompey, who gaue him a certaine number of horsemen that conducted him to a litle towne upon the riuer of Po: where the next day after, Geminus being sent by Pompey, slue him. But hereof Pompey was greatly blamed, for that he had wrytten letters to the Senate from the beginning of the change, how Brutus had put him selfe into his handes: and afterwards wrote letters to the contrary, which burdened him for putting of him to death. This Brutus was father of that Brutus, which afterwards with the helpe of Cassius, slue Iulius Caesar: howbeit he shewed not him selfe so like a coward, neither in warres nor in his death, as his father did. As we haue declared more at large in his life. Furthermore, Lepidus being driuen to forsake ITALIE, fled into SARDINIA, where he dyed (as it is reported) of a sickness: that he had, not for any sorowe or griefe of his owne affayers, but for a letter that was brought him which went to his hart, knowing thereby that his wife had played the harlot. There remained at that time Sertorius in SPAYNE, who was another maner of warriour then Lepidus, & that kept the ROMANES in great awe: for that all the fugitives of the late ciuill warres were fled to him, as from the last defeat of the warres. He had already ouerthrowen many inferior Capitaines, & was now wrestling with Metellus Pius, that in his youth had bene a noble fouldier, but now being old, made warres but flowly, and would not coragiously take present occasions offered him, which Sertorius by his nimblenes and dexterity tooke out of his hands. For he would euer houer about him, when he thought least of him, like a Capitaine rather of the eues then of fouldiers, and would still lay ambushes in euery corner, and round about him: where the good old man Metellus had learned to fight in battell ray, his men being heauy armed. Hereupon Pompey keeping his army alway together, practised at ROME, that he might be sent into SPAYNE to aide Metellus. But Catulus, notwithstanding that he commaunded him to disperse his army, Pompey still kept them together by colour of new deuises, and was continually about ROME in armes, vntill that by Lucius Philippus meanes he had obtained the gouernment of that contry. They say that one of the Senators marueling to heare Philip propound that matter to the Senate, asked him: how now Philip, dost thou then thinke it meete to send Pompey Proconfull (to say, for a Confull) into SPAYNE? No truly sayd Philip, not Proconfull only, but pro Confullibus: (to say, for both the Confulls) meaning, that both the Confulls for that yeare were men of no value. Now when Pompey was arriued in SPAYNE, men began straight to be caried away, (as the maner is commonly where new Gouernours be) with the hope of a thing that they had not before. Thereupon Sertorius gaue out prowde and bitter words against Pompey, saying in mockery, he would haue no other weapon but rodde to whippe this young boy, if he were not affrayed of this old woman: meaning Metellus the old man. But notwithstanding these gallant bragges, he stode better vpon his gard, and went stronger to fight then he did before, being affrayed of Pompey. For Metellus was very dissolute of life (which no man would haue iudged in him) and was geuen ouer too much to riot and pleasure: howbeit they saw in him a maruelous fadaine change both of his pompe & glory which he vied before, as also the cuttinge of of his superfluous expence. That thinge, besides that he did honor Pompey greatly by it, wan him also much more the good will of the people, when they saw that he drew him selfe downe to a straighter life. And this was no great paine to him, for of his owne disposition he was a graue man, & temperatly geuen for his desires. In this warre fortune chaunged diuinely, as it is commonly seene in warres: but nothing grieued Pompey more then Sertorius winning of the city of LAVRON. For he thinking to haue shut him in, & had geuen out some glorious wordes of the matter: wondered when he saw him selfe straight compassed in, that he could not sturre out of the campe where he lay, and was driuen besides to see the citie burnt before his face. This notwithstanding, afterwarde at a set battell by the citie of VALENTIA, he slue Herenius and Perpenna, both notable fouldiers and Sertorius Lieutenantes, and with them ten thousand men. This victory so encouraged Pompey, that he made hast to fight with Sertorius alone, because Metellus should haue no parte of the honor of the victory. So they both met by the riuier of Sueton, about sunne set, both fearing Metellus comming: the one that he might fight alone, and the other with one alone. In fine, the victory fell out doubtfull in the end of the battell: for either of their wings had the vpper hand. Betwene the two Capitaines, Sertorius had the greater honor: for he alone ouercame all them that stode before him. And as for Pompey, there was a great man of armes that being a foote, came and set vpon him, and hauing both their swordes in their handes, they both lighted apon their handes, but not both in one forte: for Pompey's hand was but a litle hurt, and the man of armes had his hand cleane cut off. Then Pompey's men fell apon him, all his owne fellows on that side being fled from him: notwithstanding, beyond all hope, he faued him selfe after a straunge sorte, by casting vp his horse among his enemies, that was richly trapped with gilt harness, hauing a caparison of great value: and in the meane time, while they were busie deuising this booty among them, and fighting for it; he escaped their handes. The next morning by breake of day, both of them againe brought their bandes into the fiele, to confirme the victory, which either of them supposed they had gotten. But Metellus came to Pompey at that present time, whereupon Sertorius went this way, and dispersed his army: for his campe was easly broken, & sodainly gathered againe together. For Sertorius would sometime wander the feldes alone, and at another time againe

A he would haue a hundred and fifty thousand fighting men together in the fiele, like a vehement streame that sometime is dried vp, and that sodainly againe is all of a flood: Pompey after this battell going to welcome Metellus, when they came neere one another, he commaunded his sergeantes and officers to put downe their bundell of rodde and axes which they caried before him, to honor Metellus withall, who was a better man than him selfe. But Metellus would not suffer them, but shewed him selfe equall with him in that, and in all thinges else, not respecting his seniority, nor that he had bene Confull, & Pompey not, sauing when they camped together, Metellus gaue the watch word to all the campe. Notwithstanding, commonly they camped a funder, for their enemy that was so flitting from place to place, and was seene in so sundry places in so short time, compelled them to be a funder to foresee the worst, drawing them sodainly from one purpose to another: so that in fine, cutting them off from vittells euery way, spoyling their contry, and keeping the sea side, he draue them both out of the prouinces of their charge which they had in SPAYNE, and did compell them to goe some other where, for lacke of vittells. Pompey in the meane time hauing spent the most parte of his goods in this warre, sent to ROME for money to pay his fouldiers, threatening the Senate, that if they sent him no money, he would returne with his armie into ITALIE. Lucullus then beinge Confull, though Pompey's enemy, procured they should find him money: for he practised to be sent Capitaine against king Mithridates, and therefore was affrayed to geue Pompey any occasion to returne, who desired nothing more then to leaue Sertorius, to bend his force against Mithridates, whose ouerthrow should be more honorable to him, and also lesse dangerous. C In the meane space, Sertorius dyed, being betrayed by those whom he thought his frendes, among the which Perpenna was the chiefe man, that after Sertorius death would needes counterfeate his doings, hauing the same meanes, the same furniture, and the same power that he had: howbeit he lacked his wit, and skill to employ them. Pompey therefore marching directly towards him, and finding how ignorant Perpenna was in his sayfers: he layed a bayte for him of ten cohorts which he sent to praye in the fields, commaunding them to disperse them selves abroad as farre as they could, one from an other. Perpenna straight tooke the occasion, and gaue them charge, and had them in chafe. But Pompey tarying him at the ford, was ready for him with all his army set in order: he gaue him battell, obtained the victory, and ended all this warre, because the most of the Capitaines were slaine in the field, and Perpenna the chiefe D of all taken prisoner, whom he presently put to death. But herein Pompey was not to be condemned of ingratitude nor obliuion (as some do burden him) of Perpenna's frendship shewed him in SICILE, but rather deserued praise to haue determined to wisely for benefit of the common wealth. For Perpenna hauing in his custody all Sertorius wrytings, he shewed letters of the greatest noble men of ROME, (which were desirous of change of gouernment) willing him to returne into ITALIE: Pompey vpon sight of these letters, fearing least they would breede greater sedition & sturre in ROME, then that which was already pacified: put Perpenna to death as soone as he could, and burnt all his papers and wrytings, nor reading any letter of them. Then Pompey remaining in SPAYNE a certaine time, till he had pacified all commocions and tumults, maruelously out of order: he brought his army backe againe into ITALIE, and arrived there when the warre of the bondmen and senfers led by Spartacus, was in greatest furie. Vpon his comming therefore, Craffus being sent Capitaine against these bondmen, made hast to geue them battell, which he wan, and slue twelue thousand, three hundred of these fugitiue slaues. Notwithstanding, fortune meaning to geue Pompey some parte of this honor, fure thousand of these bondmen escaping from the battell, fell into his hands. Whereupon, he hauing ouercome them, wrote vnto the Senate that Craffus had ouercome the senfers in battell, and that he had pluckt vp this warre by the rootes. The ROMANES receiuing Pompey's letters, were very glad of this newes for the loue they bare him. But as for the winning of SPAYNE againe, and the ouerthrow of Sertorius, there was no man, although it were in sporte, that euer gaue any man else the honor, but vnto Pompey only. For all this great honor and loue they bare vnto Pompey, yet they did suspect him, and were affrayed of him, because he did not disperse his army, that he would follow Syllas steppes, to rule alone by plaine force. Hereupon, as many went to meete him for feare, as there were that went for good will they bare him. But after he had put this suspicion quite out of their heades, telling them that he would discharge his armie after he had triumphed: then his illwillers could blame him for nothing else, but that he was more inclined to the people then to the nobilitie, and that he had a desire to restore the Tribuneshippe of the people, which Sylla had put downe, only to gratifie the common people in all he could: the which in deede was true. For the common people at Rome neuer longed for thing more, than they did to see the office of the Tribune sette vp againe. Yea, Pompey him selfe thought it the happiest turne that euer came to him, to light in such a time, to doe such an acte. For, had any other man preuented him of that, he could neuer haue founde the like occasion possible to haue requited the peoples good willes vnto him, so much as in that. Now therefore, his seconde triumphe and first Consulshippe being decreed by the Senate: that made him nothing the greater, or better man. And yet was it a shewe and signification of his greatesse, the which Crassus (the richest man, the eloquentest and greatest person of all them that at that time delt in matters of state, and made more estimation of him selfe then of Pompey and all the rest) neuer durst once demaunde: before he had craued Pompeys goodwill. Pompey was very glad of his request, and had sought occasion of long time to pleasure him: and thereupon made earnest sute vnto the people for him, assuring them he would as much thanke them for making Crassus his colleague and fellowe Consul, as he would, for making him selfe Consul. All this notwithstanding, when they were created Consuls, they were in all things contrarie one to an other, and neuer agreed in any one thing while they were Consuls together. Crassus had more authority with the Senate, but Pompey had more credit with the people. For he restored them the office of the Tribune, and passed by edit, that the Knights of Rome should haue full power againe to iudge causes ciuill and criminall. It was a pleasant sight also to the people, when he came vnto the Censors in person, to pray that he might be dispent with for goinge to the warres. For it was an auncient custome in Rome, that the Knights of Rome hauinge serued a certaine time in the warres appointed by their order, should bring their horse in the middelt of the market place before the two Censors, declaring euery Captaine vnder whome they had serued, in what iorneyes and contries they had bene, and hauinge also deliuered accompt of their good behauior and seruice, then they prayed to be dismissed from the warres. Nowe if it appeared that they had done good seruice, there were they honorable rewarded: or otherwise openly shamed and punished. At that time, Gellius and Lentulus the two Censors, being honorable sette in their tribunall or iudgement seate, taking viewe of all the Roman Knights that mustered before them, to be seene and examined: they marueled when they sawe Pompey comminge at the further end of the market place, hauinge all the markes of a Consul borne before him, and him selfe leading his horse in his hande by the bridle. When Pompey came neerer, and that they sawe it was he, he commaunded his sergeantes that carried the axes before him, to make roome for him to passe by the barres with his horse, where the Censors sate. Then the people flocked about him, wondering and reioicing, being verie silent. The Censors them selues also were maruelous glad to see him so obedient to the lawe, and did him great reuerence. In fine, the elder of the Censors, did examine him in this sorte. Pompey the great, I pray thee tell me if thou hast serued so long time in the warres, as the lawe doth appoint? Then answered Pompey alowde: yes verily that I haue, and vnder no other Captaine then my selfe. The people hearing that answer, made an open shewte for ioy, they were so glad to heare it: and the Censors them selues came from their iudgement seate, and went to accompanie Pompey home to his house, to please the great multitude of people that followed him, clapping of their handes, with great signes of ioy. At the end of their Consulshippe, when mistakinge increased further betwixt Pompey and Crassus, there was one Gaius Aurelius, of the order of Knighthood, who till that time neuer spake in open assembly, but then got vp into the pulpit for orations, and tolde the people openly: how Isister had appeared to him in the night, and had commaunded him to tell both the Consuls from him, that they should not leaue their charge and office, before they were reconciled together. For all these wordes Pompey sturred not. But Crassus first tooke him by the hand, and spake openly to him before the people. My Lordes, I thinke not my selfe dishonored to geue place

A place to Pompey, sith you your selues haue thought him worthis to be called, the great, before he had any heare of his face, and vnto whom you granted the honor of two triumphes before he came to be Senator. When he had sayd his minde, they were made frendest together, and so surrendered vp their office: Now for Crassus, he held on his former maner of life which he had begon. Pompey as neere as he could gaue ouer to pleade mens causes any more, & began litle and litle to withdraw him selfe from frequenting the market place, and matters of iudgement, comming seldome abroad, & when he did, he had alwaies a great traine following him. It was a rare thing also to see him any more come out of his house, or talke with any man, but he was euer accompanied with a great number, & he reioiced to him selfe, to see that he had alwaies such a traine with him: for that made him to be honored the more, & gaue him greater contentaunce to see him thus courted, thinking it dishonor to him to be familiar with meane persons. For men that rise by armes, are easily despised, when they come to liue like priuate citizens: because they can not facion them selues to be copanions with the common people, (who citizen like vse a common familiaritie together) but looke to be their betters in the city, as they are in the field. Yea and cotrarily, they that do acknowledge themselves to be their inferiors in warres: will thinke fowle scorne if they be not their superiors in peace. And by this meanes when they haue a noble warrior amonge them that followeth publicke causes (which hath triumphed for many victories and battells he hath obtained) they obscure his glory, and make him an vnderling vnto them: whereas they do not otherwise enuy any souldiers, that are contented equally to geue them place and authority, as plainly appeared shortly after by Pompey him selfe. By such an occasion, the power of pirates on the sea tooke beginning in the contry of Cilicia, which was not reckoned of at the first, because it was not percieued, untill they grew bold & venturous in king Mithridates warres, being hyered to do him seruice. And afterwards the Romans being troubled with ciuill warres, one fighting with an other euen at Rome gates, the sea not being looked to all this while: it set them a gogge, and made them go further then euer they did before. For they did not only rob & spoile all marchat venterers by sea, but rifled also all the Ilandes & townes vpon the sea coast: in suchom as then there ioyned with them, men of great wealth and nobility, & of great wisdom also, & entred into their fellowshippe, as into a commendable faculty. Now they had set vp arsenalls or store houises in sundry places, they had sundry hauens and beacons on the land, to geue warning by fire all alongest the sea coast, & those well kept & watcht: moreover, they had great flectes of shippes, ready furnished with excellent good gallions of ores, skilfull pilots & mariners, their shippes of swift saile, & pinnases for discouery, but withall so gloriously set out, that men lesse hated their excesse, then feared their force. For the poores of their gallions were all guilt, the coverings of the same all of purple silke, delighting only to make a glorious show of their pillage. All the sea coast ouer, there was no sight of any thing but musicke, singing, banketing, and rioting, prizes of Captaines, and men of great quality, & ranfomes of a thousand prisoners: & all this was to the shame & dishonor of the Romans. Their ships were about a thousand in number, & they had takē about foure hundred townes. They had spoiled & destroyed many holy temples that had neuer bene touched before. As the temple of the twynes in the Ile of CLAROS, the temple of Samothracia, the temple of Earth in the city of HERMION, & the temple of Aesculapius in EPIDAVRUM, the temples of Neptune in ISTHMOUS, TENARIA, & CALABRIA: & the temples of Apollo in ACTIVM, in the Ile of LEYCADES: the temples of Iuno in SAMOS, in ARGOS, & in LVCANIA. They had also many strange sacrifices & certen ceremonies of religion amongst the selues, in the mount Olympus, & among other, the mistery of Mithres, which is the sunne: & remaineth yet in being vnto this day, being first shewed by them. But besides all these insolent partes and injuries they did the Romans vpon the sea, they went a land, and where they found any houises of pleasure vpon the sea coast, they spoiled & destroyed them: & on a time they tooke two Roman Prætors, Sextilius, & Belinus, being in their purple robes, with their sergeants & officers attending on the, & carried them quite away. An other time, they stole away the daughter of Antonius (a man that had receiued honor of triumph) as she went a walking abroad in the fields, & she was redeemed for a great summe of money. But you the greatest spight & mockery they vsed to the Romans, was this. That when they had takē any of them and that he cried he was a citizen of Rome, and named his name: then they made as though they had bene amazed, and affrayed of that they had done. For they clapped their hands on their thighs, and fell downe on their knees before him, praying him to forgiue them. The poore prisoner thought they had done it in good earnest, seeing they humbled them selves as though they seemed fearefull. For some of them came vnto him, & put shoos on his feet: others clapt a gowne on the backe of him after the ROMANE fashion, for feare, (sayd they) least he should be mistaken an other time. When they had played all this pageant, & mocked him their bellies full: at the last they cast out one of their shippe ladders, and put him on it, & bad him go his way, he should haue no hurt: and if he would not goe of him selfe, then they call him ouer the bord by force, and sent him packing. These rourers and sea pirates had all the sea Mediterraneum at commaundement: in fomuch there durst not a marchant looke out, nor once traffique that sea. And this was the only cause that moued the ROMANES, (fearing scarcity of vitells, and a great dearth) to send Pompey to recouer the signory againe of the sea from these pirates. The first man that moued it might be decreed, that Pompey should not be only Admirall, or General by sea, but should haue absolute power to commaunde all manner of persons as he thought good, without any account to be made of his doings in his charge was Gabinus, Pompey's friend. The summe of this decree gaue him full power and absolute authority of all the sea from Hercules pillars, and of the maine land, the space of foure hundred furlong from the sea. (For the ROMANES dominions at that time in few places went further then that: notwithstanding, within that compasse were many great nations & mighty kings.) Furthermore, it gaue him power to choofe of the Senate fiftene Lieutenantes, to geue vnto euery one of them, severall prouinces in charge, according to his discretion: and also to take money out of the treasure, of the General receiueurs of the state, to defray the charges of a flecte of two hundred saile, with full power besides to leaue what men of warre he thought good, and as many galliots and mariners as he listed. This law when it had bene read once ouer among them, the people confirmed it with very good will. Yet the noble men and chiefe of the Senate thought that this authority did not only exceede all enuy, but also that it gaue them apparant cause of feare, to geue such absolute power vnto a priuate person. Whereupon, they were all against it but Cesar, who fauored the decree, not so much to pleasure Pompey, as the people, whose fauor he sought. The noble men fell maruelously out with Pompey: and at the length one of the Consuls was very hotte with him, and told him he looked to follow Romulus steppes, but peraduenture he would come shorthe of that end he made. Therupon the people thought to haue killed him. After that, Catulus stode vp to speake against this edict. The people at the first heard him quietly, because he was a worthy man. Then he began without any shew of enuy, to speake many goodly thinges in the praise of Pompey, and in fine, aduised the people to spare him, and not to venter in such dangerous warres: (one after another) a man of so great accompt, as they ought to make of him. If ye chauce to loose him, sayd he: whom haue you then to put in his place? The people then cried out: your selfe. Then perceiuing that he lost his labor, seeking to turne the people from their determination: he left it there, and sayd no more. Roscius rose next after him to speake, but he could haue no audience. When he saw that he could not be heard, he made a signe with his fingers, that they should not geue Pompey alone this authority, but ioynen another with him. The people being offended withall made such an outcrie vpon it, that a crow flying ouer the market place at that instant, was stricken blinde, & fell downe amongst the people. Wherby it appeareth, that fowle falling out of the ayer to the ground, do not fall for that the ayer is broken or peared with any force or fury: but because the very breath of the voice (when it commeth with such a violence, as it maketh a very tempest in the ayer) doth strike & ouercome them. Thus for that day, the assembly brake vp, and nothing past: and at the day appointed when this decree should passe by voyces of the people, Pompey went abroad into the contry. There being aduertised that the decree was past for the confirmation of his charge, he returned againe that night into the citie, because he would auoyde the enuie they would haue borne him to haue fenee them run out of all partes of the city vnto him, to haue waited on him home. The next morning he came abroad, and sacrificed to the goddes: and audience being geuen him at an open

An open assembly, he handled the matter so, that they gaue him many thinges besides to enlarge his power, almost doubling the preparation set downe and appointed at the first decree. For he ordained that the common wealth should arme him five hundred shippes, & they leauied for him fixe score thousand foote men, and fixe thousand horse men, and chose besides foure and twenty Senators, which had euery one of them bene Generalls of armies, and two general Treasurers also. While thinges were thus a preparing, the price of vitells fell by chaunce, which reioyced the people so much, that they stucke not to say, that the name of Pompey only had already ended this warre. This notwithstanding, he deuised all the sea betwene the lands into thirtene regions, and in euery of them he appointed a certaine number of his shippes, and moreouer, one of his Lieutenantes ouer them. Thus hauing dispersed his power all abroad, he brought all the pirates shippes that were in a flecte together, within his daunger: and when he had taken them, he brought them all into a docke. Now for them that had dispersed them selues betimes, or that otherwise could scape his generall chase: they fled all into CILICIA, as bees into the beehiue, against whom he would needes go him selfe in person with three score of his best shippes. Howbeit he cared not though he went not before he had scoored all the THRASCANE sea, the coastes of LYBIA, SARDINIA, SICILE, and of CORNICIA, of all these theewes which are wont to keepe thereabouts: and this he did within forty dayes space, taking infinite paines, both him selfe and his Lieutenants. Now when one of the Consuls called Piso did all the best he could to hinder Pompey's preparation, and had discharged his ouer men, for that he enuied Pompey's prosperity: Pompey sent his shippes before to make towards ITALIE to arrive at the city of BRINDVSIVM. He in the meane time, went through THRASCANE to ROME, where, so soone as his comming was knowne, all the people ran out to meete him, as if he had bene absent a long time: and that which made the people more ioyfull to see him, was the sodaine change of vitalls vnlooked for, that dayly came to the towne out of all partes. But Piso went neere to be deuiued of his Consulshippe: for Gabinus had the decree wrytten, and ready to present to the people. But Pompey would not suffer it. So, hauing gently brought all to passe as he desired, he went vnto the city of BRINDVSIVM, and there tooke sea, and hoysed saile. Now though his hasty voyage, and shortnesse of time made him passe by many good cities without comming into them: notwithstanding, he would not so passe by the city of ATHENS, but landed there, and after he had sacrificed to the goddes, returned to imbarke againe. At his going out of the city, he red two wrytings that were made in his praise, the one within the gate which sayd thus.

The humbler that thou doost thy selfe as man behaue,
The more thou doost deserue the name of god to haue.

And the other wryting was without the gate, which sayd:

We wisht for thee, we wisht for thee,
We wisht for thee, we wisht for thee.

Nowe because Pompey hauing taken certaine of these rourers by sea that kept together, did vnto them gently when they required pardon, and hauing their shippes and bodies in his power, did them no hurt at all: their other companions being in good hope of his mercy, fled from his other Capitaines and Lieutenantes, and went and yielded them selues, their wiues and children into his hands. Pompey pardoned all them that came in of them selues, and by that meanes he came to haue knowledge of the rest, and to followe them where they went, whome he tooke in the ende: but knowinge that they deserued no pardon, they hid them selues. Yet the most parte, and the richest of them, had conueyed their wiues, children and goodes, and all other their family vnto some warres, into strong castells and litle townes upon mount Taurus: and such men as were able to cary weapon, imbarked, and lay before a city of CORACESIUM, where they taried Pompey, and gaue him battell, first by sea, and there were ouercome, and afterwards they were besieged by lande. Howbeit shortly after, they prayed they might be receiued to mercie, and thereupon yielded their bodies, townes, and *F*landes which they had fortified, and were hard to haue taken and worke to haue approached. Thus was this warre ended, and all the pirates in lesse then three months driven from the sea whersoever they were. He wanne also a great number of other shippes, besides foure score and tenne gallies armed with copper spurres. And touching the men whom they had taken, (who were in number about twenty thousand persons) he did not only consider whether he should put them to death, but also thought it no wise parte on thother side to let them goe at liberty, to gather force againe, being so great a number of them as in dede they were, and all poore men and souldiers. Therefore, weying with him selfe, that man by nature is not borne a wild or savage beast, but contrarily becommeth a brute beast chaunging nature, when he falleth to vice: and againe is made tame and ciuill in time, chaunging place and manner of life: (as brute beastes that being wilde by nature doe also become gentle and tractable, with gender vlagge by continuance) he determined to draw these pirats from the sea into thupland, and to make them feeke the true and innocent life, by dwelling in townes, and manuring the ground. Some of them therefore he placed in certaine small townes of the CILICIANS, that were scant inhabited, & were very glad of the geuing them land to keepe them with. The city of the SOLTANS also, that not long before had bene destroyed by Tigranes the king of ARMENIA, being desirous to replenish that againe, he placed many of them there. He bestowed also in the city of DYMA in the contrie of ACHAIA, which at that time lacked inhabitants, and had great store of very good land. Now therefore his enemies reproued him greatly: and for that he did in CRETA, they that were his best and greatest frendes misliked him. For Metellus that gentle person, (a cosen to that Metellus which was his colleague, and made warre in SPAYNE with him against Sertorius) was sent Prætor into CRETA, before Pompey was chosen General against the pirats. This CRETA, next vnto CILICIA, was euen a seconde denne of pirats. Metellus finding there a great number of these theues, tooke many of them, and put them to death, euen all that came to his hands. Then, such as had scaped from him, being straightly besieged, sent vnto Pompey to pray him of pardon, and to take them to mercie: declaring vnto him, that the Ile of CRETA was within the precinct of his charge, because all partes of that region from the sea came iust within the cōpassé limited him on the land. Pompey pardoning them upon their submission, wrote vnto Metellus, & commaunded him to leave of his warre, and therewithall charged all the cities, that they should not obey Metellus commaundementes. After that he sent Lucius Octavius, one of his Lieutenantes, who entred into the townes Metellus besieged, and fought for the pirats. This made Pompey not only hared & enuid, but derided also: for that vnder his name he had protected such vile theues, that had neither God nor law, and geuen them his authority to saue their liues, for a litle enuie and emulation he bare vnto Metellus. And therefore they rightly reprocue Achilles, and say that he shewed not the parte of a wise man, but of a young foole besides him selfe, for desire of glory, making a signe to the GRECIANS, forbidding them to strike at Hector, to shend that as Homer sayd:

Least he too late should to the battell runne, When others had the honor of it wonne.

But Pompey's fact was worse then this. For he fought for the cōmon enemies of the world, and only to depriue a ROMANE Prætor of triumphe, who had done great good seruice to haue destroyed them. This notwithstanding, Metellus left not of his warre for Pompey's letters, but hauing taken the pirats by assault, he put them to death: and afterwards hauing done Ossius open shame through his campe, he let him goe. When newes came to ROME, that the pirats warre was brought to good end, & that Pompey hauing no other seruice in hand, went visiting the cities vp & downe: one Manilius a Tribune of the people put forth an other decree vnto them of this effect. That Pompey taking all the army Lucullus had, & the prouinces vnder his gouernment, with al BITHYNIA, which Glabrio kept: should go make warre vpon the kings Tigranes and Mithridates, keeping in his handes notwithstanding all his iurisdiction and army by sea, in as royall manner as he had it before. In fine, this was euen to make one man Monarch and absolute Prince, of all the ROMANE Empire. For by this second decree, he had all these contries not named in his former commission, added to amplifie his authority, as PHRYGIA, LYCAONIA, GALATIA, CAPPADOCIA, CILICIA, high COLCHIDA and ARMENIA, with all the armies and forces with the which he had ouercome those two mighty kings. Then the Senate stuke not so much at the iniurie that was offered vnto Lucullus, depriving him of the honor

Pompey appointed Lucullus success.

A honor of his doings, to geue it to an other, that should rather succede him in honor of triumphe, then in danger of warres, knowing that they did him too manifest injury, & shewed them selues too vnthankfull: but that which most grieved them, was to see Pompey's power established in a plaine tyranny. Hereupon therefore, one of them perswaded and encouraged another, slowly to withstand this edict, and not to suffer their liberty to be lost in this sorte. Notwithstanding, when the day came that the decree should passe, they were so affrayed to anger the people, that their hartes failed them, & none durst speake against it but Catulus only: that earnestly inueyed against the passing of it a long time together, & greatly blamed the people. At the length, perceiuing he had wonne neuer a man to take his parte, he oftentimes cried out to the Senate, that they should looke to seeke out some mountaine or high rocke to retire safely vnto, to defend their liberty, as their ancelters had done in old time before them. All this preuailed not, for the decree passed by the voices of all the tribes, as it is reported. And thus was Pompey in his absence made Lorde almost of all that, which Sylla by force of armes and great effusion of blood (hauing made him selfe Lord of ROME) had before in his power. When Pompey had receiued letters from ROME, aduertising him what the people had past in his behalfe: some say that at the receite of them (in the presence of his familiar frendes that were about him, and reioyced with him for congratulation) he knit his browes, and clapped on his thigh, as though it grieved him maruelously to haue such great offices & charge layed vpon him, one in the necke of an other, and burst forth in these wordes. O goddes, shall I neuer see an end of such a worlde of troubles as I haue? Had it not bene better for me to haue bene a meane man borne and vnknowne, then thus continually to be in warre with armor on my backe? What, shall I neuer see the time, that breaking the neckes of spight and enuy against me, I may yet once in my life liue quietly at home in my contrie, with my wife & children? When Pompey spake those wordes, his familiar frendes could not abide to see his deepe diffimulation, knowing that besides his naturall ambition and couetous desire to rule, he was glad in his hart that he had this charge, for the contention that was betwixt him and Lucullus: which his deedes forthwith bewrayed. For he presently sent out precepts into euery quarter, commaunding all sortes of souldiers to come to him immediately, & made also all the Princes and kinges within precinct of his charge to come vnto him, and going through the contries, altered and chaunged all that Lucullus had established before. Furthermore, he did release the penalties enioyned them, and tooke from them also the gifts that Lucullus bestowed of them. In fine, this was all his purpose and desire: to make them that honored Lucullus know, that he had no further power & authority to doe any thing. Lucullus finding him selfe hardly handled by Pompey, the friends of either side thought good they should meete & talke together: which came so to passe, for they met in the contrie of GALATIA. And because they both were great Captaines of the ROMANE armies, and had done many famous acts, they had their sergeaunts & officers that caried the bundells of rodde before them, wreathed about with laurell boughs. When they met, Lucullus came out of a close & woddy contrie, all couered with greene trees, and Pompey on thother side had passed through a great sandy plaine, where no tree was growing. Thereupon Lucullus sergeaunts seeing the laurell boughes drie and withered away, which Pompey's sergeaunts caried, they gaue them of their greene and fresh boughes to beawise the rodde and axes. This was a plaine token that Pompey came to take Lucullus honor from him. In troth Lucullus had bene Confull before Pompey, & so was he also older man then he: yet the dignity of Pompey was greater, because he had triumphed twice. At their first meeting, their entertainment & discourse was with great ceremony and curtesie as might be, one highly praising the others deedes, reioycing at eche others good successe: but at parting they fell to hurt wordes together, Pompey vpbrayding Lucullus auarice, and Lucullus Pompey's ambition, so that their frendes had much a doe to parte them. Lucullus departing thence, decided the landes in GALATIA, which he had conquered, and bestowed them & other gifts, on such as he thought good. Pompey on thother side camping hard by him, specially commaunded the people in euery parte to obey him in nothing whatsoever he did: and besides, he took all his souldiers from him, leauing him only sixteene hundred, which he supposed were such, as for disdaine and ill will they bare him, would do him but small seruice. Furthermore, to bleasish the glory of his doings, he told every body Lucullus had fought with the pompe & shadow only of these A two kinges, and that he had left with all their whole force and power, Mithridates being then prepared for warres, with sheldes, swordes, and horfes. Lucullus for reuenge on the other side sayd, that Pompey went to fight but with a shadow of warre, like a cowardly buffard that prayeth vpon dead bodies, which others haue slaine: & to cut a under the remaine of this warre ended by an other, as he had done before, attributing the honor of the overthrow of Sertorius, Lepidus, and Spartacus, to him selfe, where in deede Metellus, Craffus, and Catulus did overcome them. And therefore it was no maruell, that he sought the glory and honor to triumphe for the kingdomes of PONTVS and ARMENIA: sith that through his subtil practises he had obtained triumphe for a fewe slaues and fugitiues. Lucullus being now gone his way, Pompey sent good garissons vnto all the coastes apen the sea, from the prouince of PHOENICIA, vnto the realme of BOSPHORVS. That done, he tooke his iorney by land towards Mithridates, who had in his campe thirtie thousand footemen, and two thousand horsemen, and yet durst not offer battell, but camped first apen a mountaine of great strength, and hard to get vp on: notwithstanding shortly after, he forsooke it for lacke of water. He was no sooner gone thence, but forthwith Pompey tooke it. Who, coniecturing by the nature of the plantes and trees in that place which were very greene, and also by diuers holes he found, that for reason thereabouts should be some springes: he commaunded them to digge welles in euery corner, so that in a very short time all his campe had water enough, and he wondred at Mithridates, that he could not finde that out in all the time he lay there. In thend, he went and camped rounde about Mithridates, and intrenched him with a wall within his owne campe: who after he had abidden the siege fife and forty dayes, fled away with all the choise of his army, vnknowing to Pompey, hauing first slaine all the sicke and impotent persons within his campe. After that, Pompey found him an other time by the riuer of Euphrates, & went and lodged hard by him. But fearing that Mithridates would passe ouer the riuer before he could preuent him in time, he raised his campe againe, & marched away at midnight. About that time, they say, that Mithridates sawe that in a dreame, which did prognosticate what should happen. He thought, that hauing the winde in the poope of his shippe, he was vnder saile, in the midst of the sea of Mare Bosporum, and that he was maruelous glad of it, and reioyced with them that sailed with him, thinking him selfe certainly past all danger: yet suddenly againe, that all this ioy left him, and that he floted vp and downe the waues of the sea, & apen a litle peece of the shippe that was broken, trusting to the mercy of the windes. As he was troubled with this ill fauored dreame, certaine of his familiars came to him and told him, that Pompey was come so neere, that there was no shiffe, but they must needs fight to defend their campe. Thereupon, his Captaines straight beganne to put his men in battell ray, ready to fight. Pompey vnderstanding they prepared to make defence, was in doubt to venter his men to fight in the darke, thinking it better to compasse them in to keepe them from flying, & then in the morning to set vpon them more easily, his men being the better fouldiers. But Pompey olde Captaines were so earnestly in hand with him to perswade him they might fight, that in the ende he was contented they should geue charge. Now it was not so darke but they could somewhat see, for the moone that was very low and vpon her setting, gaue light enough to discern the body of a man: yet because the moone was very low, the shadow which gaue out further farre then their bodies, came almost euen to their very enemies, which did let the that they could not certainly iudge what space of ground was betweene them, but imagining that they were hard by them, they cast their darts at the ROMANES, but they hurte neuer a man, for their bodies were a great way from them. The ROMANES perceiuing that, ran apen them with great cries. But the barbarous people durst not abide their charge they were so affrayed, but turned their backs, and ranne away for life, so that they were slaine downe right. Thus were there tenne thousand of the barbarous people slaine and more, and their campe also taken. As for Mithridates him selfe, at the beginning of thonsen, he made a lane among the ROMANES with eight hundred horsemen, and passed cleane through them. But incontinently his men disperfed apen it, some one way, some an other way, so that he was left alone but with three persons only, wherof Hysperates was one of the number, which had euer bene valiant and

and had a mans hart: whereupon, for that cause Mithridates called her Hysperates. She at that time being arrayed like a man of armes of PERSIA, and mounted also on a horse after the PERSIAN manner, was neuer weary with any long iorney the king made, nor neuer left to waite vpon his person, and to looke to his horse: vntill such time as the king came to a strong castle called Inora, where was great store of gold & siluer, and the kinges chiefe treasure. Then Mithridates tooke of his richest apparell he had there, & gaue it amongst them that were about him at that time, and a deadly poyson besides to euery one of his frendes to carie about them, because they should not (vnlesse they would them selues) fall into their enemies handes aliue. From thence he thought to take his iorney into ARMENIA, vnto king Tigranes. Howbeit Tigranes sent to let him, and further proclaimed by trumpet, that he would geue a hundred talents to him that could kill him. Thereupon, passing by the head of the riuer of Euphrates, he fled through the contry of CHOLCHIDE. In the meane time, Pompey invaded the contry of ARMENIA, at the request of Tigranes the younger, who was reuolted against his father, and went to meete with Pompey at the riuer of Araxes, which hath his beginning almost about the head of Euphrates: but it runneth towards the East, and falleth into Mare Caspium. So they both together marched on further into the contrie, receiuinge such townes as yelld vnto them. But king Tigranes (that not long before had bene consumed and destroyed by Lucullus) vnderstanding that Pompey was of a mylde and gentle nature, he receiued his garissons into his strongest fortres and royall houses, and went him selfe with his frendes and kinsmen to meete Pompey, & to yeeld him selfe vnto him. VVhen he came hard to his campe, being a horse backe, there came out two fergeaunts of Pompeys, & commaunded him to light and go in a foote, for there was neuer man seene a horse backe within the ROMANES campe. Tigranes did not only obey them, but further plucked of his sword and gaue it them: and in fine, when he came almost to Pompey, taking of his royall hatte fro his head, he would haue layed it at Pompeys feete, & falling downe most shamefully on the ground, imbraced him selfe to imbrace Pompeys knees. But Pompey him selfe preuented him, and taking him by the hande, made him to sit downe by him on the one side of him, and his sonne on the other. Then he sayd vnto them both: as for the other losses you haue sustained heretofore, you must thanke Lucullus for them, who hath taken from you, SYRIA, PHOENICIA, CILICIA, GALATIA, and SOPHENA: but for that you haue left you till my comming, I will let you enioy it, paying to the ROMANES a fine of sixe thousand talentes for the iniurie you had done them, prouided also, that your sonne haue the kingdome of SOPHENA for his parte. Tigranes accepted the condicions of peace. The ROMANES then saluted him king. He was so glad thereof, that he promised to geue euery fouldier halfe a Mina, euery Centener tenne Minas, and to euery Colonell of a thousand men a talent. His sonne was very angry withall: inso much as Pompey lending for him to come to supper to him, he answered againe, that was not the frendshippe he looked for at Pompeys handes, for he should finde many other ROMANES that would offer him that curtesie. Pompey for his answer, clapped him vp as a prisoner, and kept him to be led in triumphe at ROME. Shortly after, Phraates king of PARTHIA sent Ambassadors to Pompey to demaunde this young Prince, that was his sonne in law: and to tell him that the riuer of Euphrates must be the ytermost confines of his conquestes. Pompey answered againe, that Tigranes had more right to his sonne, then the father in law: and as for limiting of his borders, that he would doe it with iustice. So, leaving Afranius in ARMENIA to keepe the contrie, Pompey passed by other nations which inhabit about mount Caucasus, hauing Mithridates in chace: of which nations, two of the chiefe and of greatest power, are the ALBANIANES and IBERIANES. The IBERIANES do stretch out vnto mount Molchiu, & to the realme of PONTVS. The ALBANIANES lye towards the East, and Mare Caspium. These men first suffered Pompey to passe through their contrie, apen his sending to the. But winter hauing stolen apen the ROMANES while they were there, & they busily occupied about Saturnes feasts: the barbarous people hauing leaued about forty thousand fighting men in one campe together, came & passed ouer the riuer of Cyrtus. (This riuer commeth from the mountaines of the IBERIANES, and receiuing the riuer of Araxes into it, which passeth through ARMENIA, disperfeth it selfe into twelue generall mountes, and so falleth into Mare Caspium. not the riuier of Araxes into it, but that it runneth by it selfe, & falleth into the same sea, vnto the mouthes of the other.) Pompey might if he had would haue kept them for conuoying ouer the riuier, yet did he suffer them quietly to passe ouer. When they were all ouer, he went against them, ouercame them in battell, and slue a great number of them in the field. Afterwards he pardoned their kinge, submittinge him selfe vnto Pompey by his Ambassadors, and made peace with him. Then from thence he went againe the IBERIANS: who were no lesse in number, then the ALBANIANS were at the first, and also better souldiers, and were rebellious bent to doe good seruice vnto Mithridates, and to driue out Pompey. These IBERIANS were neuer subiect to the Empire of the PERSIANS, nor of the MEDES, and escaped also from being subiect to the MACEDONIANS, for that Alexander neuer stayed in the contry of HYRCANIA, whom also Pompey ouercame in a great & bloodie battell, hauing slaine nine thousand in the field, and taken tenne thousand prisoners. From thence he went into the contry of COLOSIA. There Seruilus met him by the riuier of Phasis, with the flecte of shippes with the which he kept all Mare Ponticum. Now to followe Mithridates further, who had hidde him selfe amongst a people that were neighbours vnto the straights of BOSPHORVS, and the mountains Maetides, he found it a hard peece of worke. Furthermore also, he had newes that the ALBANIANS were rebelled againe, which drew him backe to be reuenged of them. Thereupon he passed againe ouer the riuier of Cyrrus, with great paine and danger, because the barbarous people had made a strong defence a great way alongest the riuier side, with a marvellous number of great trees, felled and layed a crosse one ouer another. Furthermore, when he had with great difficulty passed thorow them, he fell into an euill fauored contry, where he should trauell a great way before he could come to any water. Thereupon he caused ten thousand goats skinned to be filled with water, and so went forward to meete with his enemies, whom he found by the riuier of Abas, being sixe score thousand footemen, and twelue thousand horsemen, but all (or the most of them) ill armed with wilde beastes skinned. Their Chieftaine was Cosis, the kinges owne brother. He, when the battell was begonne, flew apon Pompey, and threw a dart at him, and hurt him in the flank. Pompey on thother side, ranne him through with his lance on both sides, & slue him starke dead. Some say also, that there were certaine AMAZONS at this battell, which fought of the barbarous peoples side, coming from the mountaines that runne alongest the riuier of Thermodon. For, after the ouerthrowing, the ROMANES spoiling the dead, found targets, and buskinnes of the AMAZONS, but not a body of a woman among them. They also doe inhabit on the side of the mountaine Caucasus, that looketh towardes Mare Hyrcanium, and doe not border vpon the ALBANIANS: but the GELBS, and the LELEGES are betwene them, with whom they company two monethes only euery yeare meeting together, by the riuier of Thermodon, and all the rest of the year, they liue a parte by them selues. After this last battell, Pompey going to inuade the contry HYRCANIA, as farre as Mare Caspium, he was compelled to go backe againe for the infinite number of deadly venomous serpents which he met with, being come within three dayes iorney of it. So he returned backe againe into ARMENIA the lesse, and there receiued presents which were sent vnto him from the kings of the ELYMIANS and the MEDES, and wrote very curteously vnto them againe: howbeit he sent Afranius with parte of his armie against the king of the PARTHIANS, who had inuaded the contry of GORDIENA, and harried and spoiled the king of TIGRANES subiects. Now withstanding, he draue him out, and followed him vnto ARBELITIDA. Furthermore, all the lemmans and concubines of king Mithridates being brought vnto Pompey, he would touch none of them, but sent them all home againe, to their parents and frendes, because the most of them were either the daughters of Princes, or noble men, or Captaines. Notwithstanding, Stratonice that of all the rest of his lemmans, had most credit about Mithridates, vnto whom he had left all the charge of his castell, where the greatest part of his treasure of gold and siluer lay, was a singlers daughter, who as they sayd, was not rich, but an old man. She hauing song one night before Mithridates, being at supper, he fell in fancy with her, that he would needes haue her lye with him the same night, and the old man for her father went home offended, because the king would not so much as geue him one good word. But the next morning when he rose, he marueled to see the tables in his house full of

A plate of gold and siluer, and a great company of seruing men, groomes of chamber & pages; and that they had brought him maruelous riche apparell, & a horse ready as the gates brauely furnished, as the kings familiars did vse when they went abroad into the city: he thought it was done in mockery, to haue made sporte with him, and therefore would haue runne his way, had not the seruing men kept him, and told him that they were a great rich mans goods that dyed of late, which the king had bestowed on him, and that all this he saw, was but a little portion in respect of the other goods and lands he gaue him. So the old man beleeuing them, the length did put on this purple gowne they brought him, and got vp a horse backe, & riding through the streetes, cried, all this is mine, all this is mine. Certaine laughing him to scorne for it, he told them: masters, ye may not wonder to heare me thus crye out, but rather that I throw not stones at them I meete, I am so made for ioy. Such was Stratonices birth and parentage, as we haue told you. She did then deliuer this castell into Pompeys hands, and offered him many goodly riche presents: but he would take none of them, other then such as served to adorne the temples of the goddes, and to beawise his triumphe; and left all the rest with Stratonice her selfe, to dispose as she thought good. In like manner also, the king of the IBERIANS, hauing sent him a bedstead, a table, and a chayer of cleane golde, praying him to take it as a remembrance from him: he deliuered it ouer vnto the Treasurers custody, to be accountable for it vnto the state. In an other castell called Ceenon, he founde certaine secret letters sent from Mithridates, which pleased him maruelously to reade, because thereby he plainly vnderstoode the kinges nature and inclination. For in them were mentioned that he had poisoned (besides many other) Ariarathes his owne sonne, and Alexus the SARDIANIAN, because he had wonne the bell, at the horse race before him. There was also interpreting of dreames; that either him selfe or his wiues had dreamed, and also loue letters betwene Mithridates and him. Theophanes wryteth also, that there was found an oration of Rutilius, in the which he testified and perswaded Mithridates to put all the ROMANES to death that were in ASIA. Howbeit in reason men thinke, that this was a shamefull lye, maliciously deuised by Theophanes, who hated Rutilius, because he was but a counterfeite to him: or peraduenture to gratifie Pompey, whose father Rutilius in his histories describeth to be as wicked a man as euer liued. Thence Pompey departed towardes the city of AMISVS. There his ambition brought him to commit such factes, as he him selfe did condemne before in Lucullus: for that his enemy being dyed aliue, he tooke vpon him to establish lawes, to geue gifts, and distribute such honors, as Captaines that had obtained victory were wont to doe, when they had ended all warfare and trouble. For he him selfe (Mithridates being yet the stronger in the realme of BOSPHORVS, and hauing a great puissant army about him) did all that which he reprobued another for, appointing prouinces, and geuing out gifts to euery man according as he deserved: to gratifie the twelve barbarous kinges, with diuers other Princes, Lordes and Captaines, that came to him thither. Wryting also to the king of PARTHIA, he disdained to geue him that title, which others were wont to doe in the direction of their letters, calling him king of kinges. Furthermore, he had a wonderfull great desire to winne SYRIA, and to goe through the contry of ARABIA, euen vnto the redde sea, because he might enlarge his conquestes and victories euery way, euen vnto the great sea Oceanum; that compasseth all the whole earth. For in LIBYA, he was the first ROMANE that conquered all to the great sea. On thother side, in SPAIN he enlarged the Empire of ROMES, and brought the confines thereof vnto Mare Atlanticum. And thirdly, hauing lately the ALBANIANS in chafe, he came almost vnto Mare Hyrcanium. Thus he put him selfe in iorney, intending his circuit vnto the redde sea, specially because he sawe Mithridates so ill to follow, & worse to ouercome by force when he fled, then when he fought any battell: and that made him say, that he would leaue a sharper enemy behinde him, then him selfe: and that he ment, famine. For he appointed souldiers with sufficient number of shippes, to lye in waite for the marchauntes that failed to the contry of BOSPHORVS, to cary their wares, or other marchaundises, prohibiting them vpon paine of death that should attempt it. Then he went forward with the best parte of his army, and in his way, founde the bodies of dead ROMANES which Mithridates had ouerthrowen vnder the leading of Triarius, their Captaine, and were yet vnburiel. So he caused these all to be taken vp, and honorably buried. Laelius having forgotten, or otherwise neglected to do it, in my conscience was the chiefest cause why his men did hate him: Pompey now having by Africanus subdued the ARABIANs, dwelling about mount Amanus, went him selfe in person into SYRIA, and made a government and province of it, being won to the ROMANE empire, for that he had a lawfull king: and conquered all IUDIA also, where he took king Aristobolus, and builded certaine cities there, and delivred others also from bondage, which by tyrannes were forcibly kept, whom he chastised well enough. Howbeit he spent the most parte of his time, choosing of controuersies, pacifying of contentions and quarrells by arbitrement, which fell out between the free cities, Princes and kinges, and sent of his friends into those places where he could not come him selfe. For on a time when he was chosen arbitrator between the PARTHIANS and the ARMENIANS, touching the title of a contrie which both parties claimed, he sent three commissioners thither to iudge definitively between them both. If Pompey's fame and renowne were great, no lesse was his vertue, iustice, and liberality, which in deede did hide many fautes, his frendes and familiars about him did commit. For truly he was of so gentle a nature, that he could neither keepe them from offending, nor yet punish them when they had offended. Notwithstanding, he did vie them so well that complained vnto him, or that had to deale with him in any matter, that he made them contented, patiently to beare their courtesies & straight dealing. One of his chiefest familiars about him, whom he loued best, was called Demetrius, a bondman infranchised, who otherwise was very discrete in his doings, but being somewhat too bolde of his good fortune: of him they make this mention. Cato the Philosopher being at that time a young man, yet of good iudgement and of a noble mind, in Pompey's absence went to see the city of ANTIOCH. Now for him selfe, his manner was alwayes to goe a foote, & all his frendes besides that did accompany him to honor him, were a horsebacke. He perceiving a farr of, a great sorte of people coming towards him all in white, and of one side of the streete litle children, and on the other boyes, round about them as in a ring: at the first he was angry withall, thinking they had done it for his sake to honor him, that they made this procession, which he in no wise would haue had done. Thereupon he commaunded his frendes to light from their horses, and to goe a foote with him. But when they came neere to the gate of the city, the maister of the ceremonies that led this procession, having a garland on his head, and a rodde in his hand, came vnto them, and asked them: where they had left Demetrius, and when he would come? Cato's frendes laughed to heare this question: then sayd Cato, alas poore city, and so passed by it. Notwithstanding, Pompey him selfe was cause that Demetrius had the lesse ill will borne him, then otherwise he should haue had, because they sawe howe boldly he would vie Pompey, and howe well he would take it without offence. It is reported, that when Pompey oftentimes had bidden some to dinner or suppe, while he was entertaining and welcoming of them, and would rary till they were all come, Demetrius would be set at the bord, and presumptuously haue his head couered euen to the very eares. And furthermore, before he returned into ITALIE out of this iorney, he had already purchased the goodliest houses of pleasure and fayrest walkes that were about Rome, and had sumptuous gardens also, the which the people commonly called Demetrius gardens: though his master Pompey was but meanely housed till his third Consulshippe. Howbeit afterwards, he built that famous stately Theater, called Pompey's Theater, and joynd vnto it also an other house, as a penthouse to his Theater, farr more sumptuous and stately then the first, and yet no more then needed. In so much as he that was owner of it after him, when he came into it, he marueled, and asked where abouts it was, that Pompey dynd & supped. These things are reported thus. Now, the king of the ARABIANs, that dwelt about the castell called Petra, having neuer vntill that time made any accompt of the ROMANES army, was then greatly affrayed of them, and wrote vnto Pompey, that he was at his deuotion, to doe what he would commaunde him. Pompey thereupon to proue him, whether he meant as he spake, brought his army before this castell of Petra. Howbeit this voyage was not liked of many men, because they iudged it was an occasion found out to leaue following of Mithridates, against whom they would haue had him rather haue bent his force, being an authentic enemy to Rome, and that beganne to gather strength againe, and prepared as they heard sayd lead

A great army through SCYTHIA and PANNONIA into ITALIE. But Pompey thinking he should sooner minish his power by suffering him to goe on with warres, then that he should otherwise be able to take him flying: would not toyle to follow him in vaine. And for these causes he would needs make warres in other places, and longer time so long, that in the end he was put by his hope. For when he was not farr from the castell of Petra, & had lodged his campe for that day: as he was riding and managing his horse vpon and downe the campe, postes came flying to him from the realme of Pontus, and brought him good newes, as was easily to be discerned a farr off by the heades of their iauelings, which were wreathed about with laurell boughes: The souldiers perceiving that, flocked straight about him: but Pompey would make an ende of his riding first, before he red these letters. Howbeit they crying for him, and being importunate with him, he lighted from his horse, and returned into his campe, where there was no stone high enough for him to stand vpon to speake vnto them, and againe, the souldiers would not tary the making of one after the manner of their campe, which men of warre doe make them selues, with great turnes of earth, laying one of them vpon an other: but for half & earnest desire they had to heare what newes there was in the letters, they layed together a heape of faddells one upon an other, and Pompey getting vpon them, tolde howe Mithridates was dead, and had killed him selfe with his owne handes, because his sonne Pharnaces did rebell against him, and had wonne all that which his father possessed. I writing vnto him, that he kept it for him selfe and the ROMANES. Vpon these newes, all the campe ye may imagine, made wonderfull ioy, and did sacrifice to the goddes, geuing them abakkes, & viene as merry, as if in Mithridates person alone, there had dyed an infinite number of their enemies. Pompey by this occasion, having brought this warre more easily to passe then he hoped for, departed presently out of ARABIA, and hauing speedily in few dayes passed through the contrie lying by the way, he came at length to the city of ANTIOCH. There he founde great presents that were brought vnto him from Pharnaces, and many dead bodies of the kinges bloody, and amongst the rest, Mithridates corse, which could not well be discerned by his face, because they that had the carying of his body had forgotten to drie vp the braine neuertheless, such as desired to see him, knew him by certaine skarres he had in his face. For Pompey would in no wise see him: but to auoide enuy, sent him away vnto the city of SYROPE. He would much at the maruelous sumptuous rich apperell and weapons that he wore: The scaberd of his sword (which cost foure hundred talents) was stolen by Publius, and sold to Ariarathes. Also for a hate of Mithridates of wonderfull workmanship, being begged of Cato his fosterbrother, was secretly geuen to Faulsus, the sonne of Sylla, without Pompey's priuie. But afterwards when Pharnaces vnderstoode of it, he punished the parties that had imbezelled them. Pompey having ordered all things and established that province, went on his iorney homewards with great pompe and glory. So, coming vnto MITYLENE, he released the city of all taxes and paymentes for Theophanes sake, & was present at a certaine play they yearly make for games, where the Poets report their workes, contending one with an other, hauing at that time no better matter in hande, but Pompey's actes and iactes. Pompey liked exceeding well the Theater where these playes were made, and drew a modell or platforme of it to make a stately Theater in Rome. As he passed by the city of RUDES, he would nedes heare all the Rethoricians dispute, and gaue euery one of them a talent. Posidonius hath written the disposition he made before Pompey, against Hermagoras the Rethorician, vpon the theame and proposition Pompey selfe did geue them, touching the generall question, Pompey did the like at ATHENS vnto the Philosophers there. For he gaue towards the reedifying of the city againe, fifty talents. So he thought at his returne home into ITALIE, to haue bene very honorably receiued, and longed to be at home, to see his wife and children, thinking also that they long looked for him, as the god that hath the charge geuen him to mingle fortunes prosperity, with some bitter sorow of aduersity, layed a blocke in his way at home in his owne house, to make his returne more sorrowfull. For Mucia his wife had in his absence played fillist tables: But Pompey being then in farr off, made no account of the reportes nor tales that were tolde him. Howbeit, when he drew neerer into ITALIE, and that he was more attentive to geneare the all reportes he heard: then he sent vnto her to tell her, that he refused her for his wife, why thing nothing to her at that time, neither euer after told the cause why he had forsaken her. Notwithstanding, A in Cicero's Epistles the cause appeareth. Furthermore, there were rumors ranne abroad in ROME, which troubled them sore, being geuen out that he would bring his armie straight to ROME, and make him selfe absolute Lord of all the ROMANE Empire. Craffus thereupon, either for that he beleued it in deede to be true, or (as it was thought) to make the accusation true, and the enuy towardes Pompey the greater: conueyed him selfe, his family, and goodes, sodainly out of ROME. So Pompey when he came into LYALIE, called all his souldiers together, and after he had made an oration vnto them, as time & occasion required: he commanded them to feuer them selues, & euery man to repaire home to apply his busines, remebring to mete at ROME together, at the day of his triumph. His armie being thus dispersed, & straight reported abroad for newes: a marvelous thing happened vnto him. The cities seeking Pompey the great without souldiers, hauing but a small traine about him of his familiar friends onely, went all of the to meete him, not as though he were returned home from his great conquests, but from some journey take for his pleasure. Such was the loue of the people to him, that they accompanied him to ROME, whether he would or not, with a greater power then that he had brought into LYALIE: so that if he had bene disposed to haue made any inuouation in the common wealth, he had not needed his armie. In those dayes there was a law, that no man should enter into ROME before his triumph: whereupon Pompey sent to the Senate, to pray them to deferre the closing of Consuls for a few daies, because he might be present to further Piso, who sued for the Consulship that yere. They denied him his request, by Cato's meanes that hindered it. Pompey marveling to heare of his boldnes & plaine speech, which he onely vsed of all other to defend his iust causes: had a marvelous desire to win him, & to make him his friend. So Cato hauing two neeces, Pompey desired to marry the one him selfe, & the other for his sonne. But Cato mistrusting this desire of Pompey, that it was a colour only to win & corrupt him: denied him gladly. His wife & sister on thother side, they were angry with him for refusing to make alliance with Pompey the great. About that time it chaunced, that Pompey being very desirous to preferre Afranius to be Consul, he caused certaine money to be geuen amongst the tribes of the peoples, & the same was deliuered out to some, even in his owne gardens. This thing being reported abroad in the city, euery man spake ill of Pompey, that he put the Consulship to sale for money, vnto those that could not delerue it by vertue, sith him selfe only had obtained it by purchase, of many a noble & worthy deede. Then sayd Cato to his wife and sister: loe now, we had bene partakers of this fault, to had we matched with Pompey. When they heard it, they confessed he had reason to refuse the match, for equity and his honor. But now to his triumph. For the statelines & magnificence thereof, although he had two dayes space to shew it, yet he lacked time: for there were many things prepared for the shewe, that were not seene, which would haue serued to haue set out an other triumph. First there were tables caried, wheron were written the names & titles of all the people, and nations for the which he triumphed, as these that follow. The kingdom of PONTVS, ARMENIA, CAPPADOCTIA, PAPHLAGONIA, MEDIA, COLCHIS, LIBERIA, ALBANIA, SYRIA, CILICIA, & MESOPOTAMIA; & furthermore, the people that dwell about PHOENICIA & PALÆSTINE, IVDEA, & ARABIA; & all the pirates which he had overcome both by sea & by land, in all partes of the world. In all these countries, he tooke about 8 a thousand castles, few lesse then nine hundred townes & cities: of pirates ships eight hundred, & nine & thirte desolate townes left without inhabitants, replenished againe with people by him. Moreover, these tables declared, that the reueneue of the comon wealth of ROME before these conquests he made, amounted yerely but to fise thousand Miriades: & that from thence forth with the summes he had added vnto the former reueneue, they should now receiue eight thousand & fise hundred Miriades: & that he brought presently in ready gold & silver, & in plate & iuells, to put into the common treasury, the value of twenty thousand talents, besides that which had bene distributed already amongst the souldiers: of the which, he that had left for his share, had fiftene hundred Drachmas. The prisoners that were led in the shew of this triumph, besides the Captaines of the pirates, were these that follow. The sonne of Tigranes king of ARMENIA, with his wife & daughter: the wife of king Tigranes himselfe, called Zosime. Antiochus king of LYALIE. Mithridates sister with fise sonnes of hers, & some Ladies of SCYTHIA.

Captiues led in Pompey's third triumphe.

A The ostages also of the *IBERIAN*s and the *ALBANIAN*s, and also of the kings of the *COMMAGENIAN*s: & besides a great number of other markes of triumphes which him selfe or his Lieutenantes had wonne at sundry battells in diuers places. But the greatest honor that euer he wanne, and which neuer other Consul of the ROMANES but him selfe obtained, was this: that he made his third triumphe of the three partes of the world. Diuers other ROMANES had triumphed thrise before him, howbeit he first triumphed of AFRICKE: the seconde time of EVROPE: the third time of ASIA. So that it appeared by these three triumphes, that he had triumphed in manner of all the lande that is inhabited, being at that time, (as it is reported by them which compare his doings vnto Alexander the great) vnder foure and thirty yeares of age, though in troth at that time he were neere forty. O, happy had it bene for him, if he had ben when he had Alexander's fortune: for all his life afterwarde, made his prosperitie hateful, or his aduersitie miserable. Employing the honor and authority he had gotten by his valliantnes, fauoring mens vniust causes: the more he furthered them, the more he lessened his honor, and vnwares brought his greatnes to nothing. For like as when the strongest places of a citie, which receiuing their enemies into them, doe geue them the benefit of their owne strength: euen so, through Pompey's power, Cesar growing to be great, ouerthrew him in the end with the selfe same meanes he employed, to the ouerthrowe of others. And thus it fortuneed. Lucullus at his returne out of ASIA (where Pompey had vncurtiously vsed him) was then very well taken of the Senate, and much more when Pompey was also come to ROME. For the Senate did counsell and incorage him to deale in thaffaires of the state, seeing him waxe very slow, and geuen too much to his ease & pleasure, by reason of his great wealth he had gotten. So when Pompey was come, he beganne to speake against him, and through the friendship and assistance of Cato, confirmed all his doings in ASIA, which Pompey had broken and reiecte. Pompey finding he had such a repulse of the Senate, was driuen to haue recourse vnto the Tribunes of the people, and to fall in friendship with light young men. Of the Tribunes, the most impudent & vilest person was Clodius: who receiued him, & made him a praye vnto the people. For he had Pompey euer at his elbow, & against his honor caried him vp & downe the market place after him, to speake as occasion serued to confirme any matter or deuise which he preferred vnto him to flatter the common people. And further, for recompence of his goodwill, he craued of Pompey (not as a thing dishonorable, but beneficial for him) that he would forsake Cicero, who was his friend, and had done much for him in matters of common wealth. Pompey graunted his request. Thereupon Cicero being brought in danger of law, and requiring Pompey's friendship to helpe him, he shut his dore against them that came to speake in his behalfe, and went out him selfe at an other backe dore. Cicero thereupon fearing the treamey of law, willingly forooke ROME. At that time, Julius Cesar returning home from his Pratorshippe out of SPAYNE, beganne to lay such a platte, that presently brought him into great fauor, and afterwarde much increased his power, but otherwise vtterly vndid Pompey and the common wealth. Now he was to sue for his first Consulshippe, and considering the enmitie betwext Pompey and Craffus, if he ioyned with the one, he made thother his enemy: he deuised to make them frendes, a thing seeming of great honestie at the first sight, but yet a pestilent deuise, and as subtil a practise as could be. For the power of the city being before deuided into two partes, (as a shippe euently ballast of eche side) and maintained the common wealth vpright being now brought into one mas power, there was no possibility to wishland it, so that all fell to wracke in the end. Whereupon, Cato wisely told them afterwarde, that sayd the ciuill warres betwext Pompey and Cesar was cause of the destruction of the common wealth: that their enmitie and discord was not the chiefe originall cause of this misery, but rather their frendshippe and agreement. For by their frendshippe, Cesar was chosen Consul, who straight fell to flatter the people and poore men, and made a law for restoring of the colonies belonging to ROME, and for distributing of lands to them that had none, imbalancing the maiesty and dignity of the chiefe Magistrate, and making the Consulshippe in manner no better then the Tribuneship of the people. Bibulus his colleague and fellowe Consul, did what he could to resist him, and Cato also did aide him to his power: vntill Cesar openly brought Pompey into the pulpit for orations before the people, and calling him by his name, asked him if he did geue his consent to the decrees which he did set forth. Pompey answered him, he did not. Why then, sayd Cæsar, if any man will by force let the passing of this law by voyces of the people: wilt thou not then come to helpe them? Yes that I will in deede, sayd Pompey. Against them that threaten with the sword, I will bring both sword and target. Pompey in all his life neuer did nor spake thinge that men more miliked, then that which he sayd at that time. His frendes excused him, and sayd it was a word passed his mouth before he was aware: but his deedes afterwards shewed, that he was altogether at Cæsar's commaundement. For not many dayes after, he married Julia, the daughter of Cæsar, which was affianced, or made sure be- fore, vnto Sernilius Cæpio when no man thought of it: and to pacifie Cæpio's anger, he gaue him his owne daughter in marriage, whome he had also promised before vnto Fauslus the sonne of Sylla: and Cæsar also married Calphurnia, the daughter of Piso. After this, Pompey filling all Rome with souldiers, did what he would by force. For as the Consull Bibulus came into the market place accompanied with Lucullus and Cato, they sodainly set vpon him, and brake the bundles of rods which his officers caried before him: and some one, whatsoever he was, cast a basket of horse donny on his head. Moreover, the two Tribunes that were in his company, were also very sore hurt. By this meanes, hauing cleared the market place of all their enemies, they passed the law for diuision of lands, as they would them selues. The people being fished with this baite, were contented to be ruled by them as they would, and would neuer stick at any matter that they would haue passed. So were all Pompeys matters confirmed, which Lucullus was against: and they appointed vnto Cæsar also, the gouernment of the GAULES on this side and beyond the Alpes: and ILLYRIA for fise yerres space, with foure whole legions. The next year following were appointed Consulls, Piso Cæsar's father in law, and Gabinus the greatest flatterer Pompey had about him. But now while things stode in these tearmes, Bibulus though he were Consull, kept him selfe close in his house for eight monethes space, and only sent out billes, and set them vp on euery post in open places, accusing Pompey and Cæsar. Cato on the other side, as if he had been inspired with the spirit of prophecies, tolde openly in the Senate house, what would become of the common wealth and Pompey. Lucullus growing old, lay still and tooke his pleasure, & would no more meddle in the common wealth. At that time it was that Pompey sayd: it was more vnseasonable for an old man to followe his pleasure, then to attend matters of the common wealth. Yet him selfe shortly after was so doted of his young wife, that he would follow her vp and downe in the contry, and in his gardens, and leaue all affaires of waight aside. Whereupon Clodius being then Tribune of the people, despised Pompey, and beganne to enter into seditious attempts. For when he had driuen Cicero out of Rome, and had sent away Cato to make warres in CYPRVS, and that Cæsar also was occupied in GAULES, & finding that the people in like case were at his commaundement, because to flatter them he did what they would haue him: he attempted incontinently to vndo some things that Pompey had established. Amongest other things, he tooke Tigranes out of prison, and euer caried him vp and downe with him wheresoever he went, and continually pickt quarrells vnto Pompeys frends, to trye what credit he had. In the end Pompey comming abroad one day into the common assembly, to here how a matter of his was handled: this Clodius hauing a company of vacabondes and desperate men about him, that cared not what they did: he sitting in a place where he might be seene from the rest, beganne to aske these questions out alowde. Who is the licentiouslest Capitaine in all this city? What man is he that seeks for a man? What is he that scratcheth his head with one finger? They, like a companie of daunfers or fingers, when he spake and clapped his handes on his gowne, answered him straight alowde to euery question, that it was Pompey. This went to Pompeys harte, that was not wont to heare him selfe so ill spoken of openly, neither was acquainted with any such kinde of sight: but yet it made him byte the lippe more, when he saw the Senate glad to see him thus shamed and reproued, as a iust reuenge & punishment for his vile betraying and forsaking of Cicero. So, great furre and vpror being made vpon this in the market place, and many men sore hurt, and one of Clodius bondmen being taken also in the preafe of the people with a sword in his hand, very neere vnto Pompey: making this his colour (but otherwise fearing Clodius insolvency & prowde words) he would neuer after come into the market place, as long as Clodius was Tribune, but kept at home

A home still, consulting with his frendes what way he should take, to appease the anger of the Senate against him. Thereupon, one of his frendes called Culeo, perfwaded him to put away his wife Julia, and vterly to refuse Cæsar's frendshippe, and to stick againe to the Senate: but he would none of that. Notwithstanding he was contented to hearken vnto them that gaue him counsell to call Cicero home againe, who was Clodius mortal enemy, and in great fauor with the Senate. Thereupon, he brought Cicero's brother into the market place, to moue the matter to the people, with a great number of men about him, where they fell to blowes, and diuers were slaine of either side: notwithstanding, he ouercame Clodius. Thus Cicero being called home by decree of the people, when he was come, he brought Pompey againe in fauor with the Senate, and standing with the lawe propounded to geue Pompey authority to cause come to be brought to Rome, he once againe made him haue power both by land and sea ouer all the territories of the ROMANES. For all the hauens, martes & fayres, & all store houses for corne, yea moreouer all the trade of marchandise and tillage, came vnder Pompeys hands. Then Clodius accusing him, sayd: that the Senate had not made this law for the death of vittells, but that they made a death of vittells, because the law should passe, to reuue Pompeys power and authority againe, that was almost vnder foote. Other say, that this was a deuil of Lucullus Spinther the Consull, who gaue Pompey the greater authority, because he might be sent to put king Ptolomy againe into his kingdom. This notwithstanding, Camidius the Tribune preferred another law to send Pompey without an army, with twb sergeantes only to cary the axes before him, to bring Ptolomy in fauor againe with the ALEXANDRIANS. This law seemed C to not to milke Pompey: but the Senate with honest colour put by this lawe, as being affrayed least Pompeys perion should miscary in so doing. Neuerthelesse, liue papers were found thrown about the market place, and the Senate house, declaring that Ptolomy desired Pompey might come to aide him in Spinthres stead. Timagenes wyrteth notwithstanding, that Ptolomy went vnto Rome, & left AEGYPT without any occasion geuen him, at the perswasion of Theophaues, who perfwaded him to doe so, because he would geue Pompey occasion to make newe warres. But Theophaues craft and fittillie made not this matter so credible, as Pompeys wit and good nature made it altogether vntrue: for his ambitio was nothing so vile nor ill as that was. So, Pompey hauing now full authority to cause come to be brought to Rome, he sent then his Lieutenantes and frendes abroad, and him selfe in person went into SICILIE. Nowe being ready to returne againe, there rose such a storme of winde in the sea, that the mariners were in dout to way their anckers. But him selfe first imbarcked, and commaunded them straight to hoyle sayle, crying out alowde, it is of necessitie I must goe, but not to liue. So, through his boldnes and good spirite, vsing the good fortune he had, he filled all the places of marte, and markets with corne, and all the sea besides with shippes: insomuch, the plenty he brought did not only furnishe the city of Rome, but all their neighbours also about them, and came like a liuely spring that disperfed it selfe through all ITALIE. About that time, the great conquests that Cæsar made in GAULES, did set him aloof. For when they thought that he was occupied in warres farre from Rome, with the BELGANS, SWISSES, and Englishmen: he by secret practise, was in the middelt among the people at Rome, & most against Pompey in the waightiest E affayres of the common wealth. For he had the power of an armie about his person, which he did harden with paines and continuall practise, not with intent to fightonely against the barbarous people: for the battells he had with them, were in manner but as a hunting sporte, by the which he made him selfe inuincible, and dreadfull to the worlde. But furthermore, by the infinite gold & siluer, and the incredible spoiles and treasure which he waued upon the enemies whom he had ouercome: and by sending great presentes also to Rome, to the Ediles, Pretors, Consulls, and their wiues, he purchased him many frendes. Therefore, after he had passed ouer the Alpes againe, and was come to winter in the city of LYOA: a world of people (both men and women) and of the Senate them selues almost two hundred persons (and amongest them, Craffus and Pompey by name) went out of Rome vnto him: Furthermore, there F were seene at Cæsar's gate, fixe score sergeantes caryng axes before Pretors, or Proconsulls. So Cæsar sent euery one backe againe, either full of money, or good wordes: but with Pompey and Craffus, he made a matche, that they two together should liue to be Consulls, and that he him selfe would send them good aide to ROME, at the daye of election, to geue their voyces. And if they were thosen, that they should then practise by decree of the people, to haue the gouernmentes of some newe prouinces and armies assigned them: and withall, that they should adorne the gouernment of those prouinces he had, for five yeares more. This pacte being beyrayed and spred abroad through ROME, the honestest sorte miliked much thereof. Whereupon Marcellinus at an open assembly of the people, did aske them both, if they would sue for the Consulship at the next election. So, they being vrged by the people to make answer, Pompey spake first, and said: peraduenture he would, peraduenture not. Crassus answered more gently, that he would doe that which should be best for the common wealth. Then Marcellinus sharply inueying against Pompey, he angrily againe cast him in the teeth, & said, that Marcellinus was the rankest churle, and the vnthankfulllest beast in the world: for that of a dumme man he had made him eloquent, and being in maner starued and famished, many a time he had filled his bellie. This notwithstanding, diuers that before were determined to sue for the Consulship, went no further in it, sauing Lucius Domitius, whom Cato counselled and incouraged not to geue it ouer: for, said he, thou doest not contend for the Consulship, but to defend the common libertie of thy contry against two tyrannes. Pompey therefore fearing Cato's faction, least that hauing all the Senates good willes, he should drawe also the best parte of the people after him: thought it not good to suffer Domitius to come into the market place. To this ende therefore, he sent men armed against him, who at the first onfet, flue the torchie bearer that caryed the torch before him, and made all the rest flie: amongst whom also Cato was the last man that retired, who was hurt in his elbow defending of Domitius. Pompey and Crassus being become Consuls after this sorte, they ordered them selues nothing the more temperately, nor honestly. For first of all, the people being about to choose Cato Prætor, Pompey being at assembly of the election, perceiving that they would choose him, brake vp the assembly, falsely alleaging that he had noted certaine ill signes, and afterwards, the tribes of the people being bribed and corrupted with money, they chose Antius and Vatinius Prætors. After that, by Trebonius tribune of the people, they published edicts, authorising Cæsar charge for five yeares longer, according to the appointment they had made with Cæsar. Vnto Crassus also they had appointed SYRIA, and the warre against the PARTHIANS. Vnto Pompey in like case, all AFRICKE, and both SPAINES, with foure Legions besides: of the which, at Cæsar's desire, he lent him two legions to help him in his warre in GAULE. These things done, Crassus departed to his Prouince, at the going out of his Consulship: and Pompey remayned at ROME about the dedicating of his Theater, where he caused many goodly playes to be made, both for exercise of person, as also for learning and musicke, and caused wilde beastes also to be baited and hunted, and killed a five hundred lions. But of all thinges, there was no such fearefull fight and terrible fight, as was betwene the elephantes. This great charge and bowntifull expence, defrayed by Pompey, to shew the people pastime and pleasure: made him againe to be very much esteemed of, and beloued amongst the people. But on thother side, he wanne him selfe as much ill will and enuy, in committing the gouernment of his Prouinces and Legions into the hands of his Lieutenants, whilest he him selfe romed vp and downe the pleasaunt places of ITALY, with his wife at his pleasure: either bycause he was farre in loue with her, or els for that the loued him so dearely, that he could not finde in his harte to leaue her companie. It was reported of her, (being known of many) that this young lady Julia loued her husband more dearly, not for Pompey's flourishing age, but for his assured continencie, knowing no other woman but her: besides also, he was no foleme man, but pleasaunt of conuersation, which made women loue him maruelously, vnles we will reprove the curtisan Flora's false testimonie. It is certaine, that at an election of the Ediles, men rising sodainely in hurly burly, drew their swordes, and many were slaine about Pompey: inso much as his clothes being bloudyed, he sent his men home in haste to fetch him ooke to change him. His young wife that was great with child, seeing his clothes bloudie, took such a sight vpon it, that she fell downe in a fownde before them, and they had much a doe to recouer her, and yet she fell straight in labor apon it, and was deliuered. So that they themselves, which blamed him most for his good will he bare vnto Cæsar: could not reprove the loue he bare vnto his wife. An other time after that, she was great with child againe, whereof she died, and the childe liued not many dayes after the mother. As Pompey was about to carrie her into the contrie to be buried, to a house he had there nere vnto the cite of ASIS, the people by force took her corse, & cawied it into the field of MARS, more for the pittie they took of the young Ladie, then to pleasure either Cæsar or Pompey: and yet what the people did for them, it appeared rather they did it more for Cæsar's sake being absent, then for Pompey's that was present. But straight when this alliance was broken, which rather couered, then bridled their ambitious desire to rule: there rose a new sturre in ROME immediately, and euery mans month was full of prittle prattle and seditious wordes. Not longe after that also came newes, that Crassus was ouerthrowen, and slaine in PARTHIA, who was a manifest staye and let to keepe them twofrom ciuill warres, for that they both feared him, & therefore kept them selues in a reasonable sorte together. But when fortune had taken awaie this third champion, who could haue withstood the better of them both that had overcome the other: then might haue bene said of these two which remained, as the comycall Poet said:

See how these Champions purposing eke others force to trie, Vnto which pointed skin and dusty hands hand vanishing vailantly.

So litle can fortune preuaile against nature, hauing no power to stoppe couetousnes: sith so large and great an Empire, and such a wide contrie besides, could not containe the couetous desire of these two men. But though they had often both heard and read,

Among the gods them selues all things by lot diuided are;
And none of them intrudes him selfe vnto his neighbours share.

Yet they thought not that the Empire of ROME was enough for them, which were but two. But Pompey spake openly in an oration he made vnto the people, that he euer came to office before he looked for it, and also left it sooner then they thought he would haue done: & that he witnesseth by discharging his armie so soone. Then thinking that Cæsar would not discharge his armie, he sought to make him selfe strong against him, by procuring offices of the cite, without any other alteration. Neither would he seeme to mistrust him, but he plainly shewed that he did despise and contemne him. But when he sawe that he could not obtaine the offices of the cite as he would, because the citizehs that made the elections were bribed with money: he then left it without a magistrate, so that there was none either to commaund, or that the people should obey. Hereupon there ranne a brute straight, that there must needs be a Dictator made, and the first man that propounded it, was Lucilius tribune of the people, who perswaded them to choose Pompey. But Cato stucke so slowly against it, that the Tribune had like to haue lost his office, even in the market place. But then many of Pompey's frendes stepped vp, and excused him, saying: that he neither sought, nor would haue the Dictatorship. Then Cato commended him much, and praying him to see good order kept in the common wealth: Pompey being ashamed to denie so reasonable a request, was carefull of it. Thereupon two Consuls were chosen, Domitius, and Messala: but afterwards when the state beganne to change againe, by the death of one of the Consuls, and that diuers were more earnestly bent to haue a Dictator than before, Cato fearing it would breake out with furie, determined to geue Pompey some office of reasonable authority, to keepe him from the other more tyrannicall. Inso much, Bibulus him selfe being chiefe of the Senate, and Pompey's enemie, was the first that moued, Pompey might be chosen Consul alone: for, said he, by this meanes, either the common wealth shall be ridde of the present trouble, or els it shall be in bondage to an honest man. This opinion was maruelled at, in respect of him that spake it. Whereupon, Cato rising vp, it was thought straight he would haue spoken against him. But silence being made him, he plainly tolde them, that for his owne parte he would not haue bene the first man to haue propounded that was spoken: but since it was spoken by another, that he thought it reasonable and meete to be followed. And therefore, said he, it is better to haue an office to commaund, whatsoeuer he be, rather then none: & that he saw no man fitter to commaund, then Pompey, in so trouble some a time. All the Senate liked his opinion, and ordained that Pompey should be chosen sole Consul: and that if he sawe in his discretion he should neede the assistance of an other companion, he might name any whome he thought good, but not still two monethes were past. Thus was Pompey made Consul alone by Salpistius, regent for Caesar. Then Pompey made very freely countenance vnto Cato, and thanked him for the honor he had done him; praying him privately to assist him with his counsell in the Consullship. Cato answered him, that there was no cause why he should thank him, for he had done nothing for his sake, but for respect of the common wealth only: and for his counsell, if he would aske it, he should privately haue it, if not, yet that he would openly saie that which he thought. Such a man was Cato in all his doings. Now Pompey returning into the citie, married Cornelia, the daughter of Metellus Scipio; not a maiden, but late the widow of Publius Crassus the sonne, that was slaine in PARTHIA, to whom she was married a maiden. This Ladie had excellent gifts to be belov'd besides her beauty. For he was properly learned; could play on the harpe, was skilfull in musike and geometrie; and tooke great pleasure also in philosophy, and not vainly without some profit. For she was very modest and sober of behaviour, without bawling & foolish curiosities, which commonly young women haue, that are induit with such singular gifts. Her father also, was a noble man, both in bloud, and life. Notwithstanding, these vnlike mariages did nothing please former: for Cornelia was young enough to haue bene his sonnes wife. Now the best citizens thought, that therein he regarded not the care of the common wealth, being in such a troublesome time, which had chosen him onely, as her remedie to redresse the same: and that he in the meane time gaue him selfe ouer to merying and feasting, where rather he should haue bene careful of his Consullship, which was disposed upon him against the lawes, for common calamities sake, that otherwise he had not come by, if all had bene quiet. Furthermore, he sharply proceeded against them, which by bribe and vnlawfull meanes came to office: and hauing made lawes and ordinances for the administration of Iustice otherwise, he delictiously and vprightly in all things, geuing sentence, order, silence and grauitie, to matters of Iudgement, with force of armes, himselfe being present: sauing that when his father in law was also accused among other, he sent for the three hundred & three score Iudges home to his house, praying them to helpe him. Whereupon, when the accusor saw Scipio accompanied by the Iudges, them selues, returning into the market place: he let fall his sute. This made Pompey againe be condemned, and blamed also more then before, for that he hauing made a lawe, that no man should praise the offenders, whilst their matter was a hearing: came him selfe and openly praised Plancius being accused. Thereupon Cato being one of the Iudges, stopped his eares with both his handes, saying: that he might not heare an offendor praised, seeing it was forbidden by lawe. But therefore he was refused for a Iudge, before they gaue sentence. Notwithstanding, Plancius was condemned by all the rest of the Iudges, to Pompeys great shame and reproache. Shortly after, Hyppseus, one that had bene Consul, being likewise accused, watching Pompey on a time as he came out of his bathe to goe to supper: upon his knees he besought Pompeys fauor and helpe. But he staidly passed by him, and gaue him no other answer, but told him, he marred his supper; and said nothing els to him. This inconstancy was much reprobred in Pompey. Howbeit otherwise he set all things in good order, and chose his father in lawe Scipio, for his colleague and fellow in the Consullship, for the next monethes. After that, he caused the gouernment of his prouinces to be appointed him for foure yeares more, with commission to take yearly out of the treasure a thousand talentes to defraye the charges of this warre. Caesars friend seeing that, stepped vp for him, and prayed that there might also be had some consideration of him, that had likewise great warres for the Empire of ROME, saying, that his good seruice deserved, either that they should make him Consul againe, or els that they should prolong his charge and gouernment; so as he might yet peaceably enioye the honor to commaund that which he had conquered, to thend that no other successor might reape the frute of his labor. Much stirre and contention being about this matter at ROME, Pompey as though for goodwill he ment to excuse the enuie they might haue borne Caesar, said that he had receyued letters from him, by the which he requested a successor, and to be discharged of this warre: and furthermore, that he thought it good they should graunt him priuilege to demand the second Consullship, although he were absent. Which Cato stoutly withstoode, saying, that he must retorne home as a priuate man, and leauing his armie, should come in person to demand

A recompence of his contrie. But by cause Pompey made no reply nor answer to the commaund, men suspected straight that he had no great good liking of Caesar, and other such, by cause he had sent vnto him for the two legions which he had lent him; vnder colour of his warre against the PARTHANS. But Caesar though he smelt him whither he sent for his souldiers, returned them home with liberal reward. About that time, Pompey fell sicke at NIZA, a sicknes dangerous, disease, whereof notwithstanding he recovered againe. The NUMIDIANS were at that time, by perswasion of PRAXAGORAS, one of the chiefe men of their citie, did sacrifice to the goddess for his recouerie. The like did also their neighbours round about; and his sicknes came so generally through all ITALY, that there was no citie or towne (great or small) but made open feast and reioycing for many dayes together. Besides, the infinite number of people was such, that went to meete him out of all partes: that there was no place enough for them all, but the high wayes, citie, townes and ports of the sea, were all full of people, waiting and sacrificing to the gods, reioycing for his recouerie. Diuers also went to meete him, crowned with garlandes, and so did attend on him, casting nosegayes and flowers upon him. Thus was his Iorney the noblest fight that euer was, all the way as he came: howbeit men thought also, that this was the chiefe cause of the beginning of the ciuill warres: For he fell into such a pride, and glorious conceit of him selfe, with the exceeding ioy he made to see himselfe thus honored: that forgetting his orderly gouernment, which made all his former doings prosper, he grew to bolde in despising of Caesars power, as though he stood in no neede of other power or care to withstand him; but that he could overcome him as he would: farre more easely, then he could haue done before. Furthermore, Appian thereupon returned from GALLIA, that brought him his two legions backe againe which he had lent vnto Caesar, reproaching much his doings which he had done there, and going out many scurrilous words against Caesar. For he said, that Pompey knew not his owne strength and authorities, that would make him selfe strong, by other power against him: considering that he might overcome him with his owne legions he should bring with him, so soone as they sawe but Pompey in the face, such ill will did Caesars owne souldiers beare him, and were maruelous desirous besides to see him selfe. These flattering tales so puffed vp Pompey, and brought him into such a security and trust of him selfe, that he mocked them to come which were affrayed of warres. And to those also which said, that if Caesar came to ROME, they sawe not how they could resist his power: he smilingly answered them againe, and bad them take no thought for that: for as one said he as I doe, but stampe with my foote upon the ground of ITALY; if that bring men enough out of euery corner, both footemen and horsemen. In the meantime, Caesar gathered force still vnto him, and thenceforth drew neerer vnto ITALY, and sent for his souldiers daily to ROME, to be present at the election of the magistrates; and many of them that were in office, he wanne with money: amongst whom, was Paulus, one of the Consuls, whom he wanne of his side, by meanes of a thousand five hundred talentes. And also the Tribune of the people, whom he discharged of an infinite debt he ought; and Mark Antony also, who for Curius sake, was discharged likewise for parte of the debt which Curius ought being also bound as him selfe. Furthermore, it was found that a captain or Centurion sent from Caesar being neerer vnto the Senate, vnderstanding that the counsell would not prolong Caesars gouernment which he required, clapping his hand vpon the pumell of his sword well said he, this shall geue it him. So, to be shorne, all that was done and said, tended to this end. Notwithstanding, the petitions and requestes that Curio made in Caesars behalf, seemed somewhat more reasonable for the people: for he requested one of the two, either to make Pompey to put downe his armie; or els to licence Caesar to haue his armie as well as he: For, either being both made priuate men, they would fall to agreement of their selues: or els being both of like strength, neither of both would seek any alteration, fearing to be an other, but would continue their selues either of them with their owne. Or otherwise, he that should weaken the one, and strengthen the other, should double his power whom he feared. There vpon wholly replied the Consul Marcellus, calling Caesar therse, and said that he should be proclaimed an open enemy to ROME, if he did not disperse his armie: if his notwithstanding, in fine Caesar, Antony, and Piso, procured that the Senate should decide this matter. For, said he, all those that would

haue Cæsar leaue his army, and Pompey to keepe his: let them stand on thone side. Thereupon the most parte of them stood at one side. Then he bad them againe come away from thence, that would haue them both leaue their armies. Then there remained only but two and twentie that stood for Pompey: and all the rest went of Curio's side. Then Curio looking after the ioy of the victorie, went into the market place, and there was receiued of his Tribunes edicion, with shewtes of ioy and clapping of handes, and infinite nosegayes and garlandes of flowers throwen vpon him. Pompey was not then present to see the Senators good will towards him: because by the law, such as haue commandement ouer souldiers, can not enter into ROME. Notwithstanding, Marcellus standing vp, sayd: that he would not stande in hearing of orations and argumentes, when he knew that tenne legions were already passed ouer the Alpes, intending to come in armes against them: and that he would send a man vnto them, that should defende their contrie well enough. Straight they chaunged apparel at ROME, as their manner was in a common calamitie. Marcellus then comming through the market place vnto Pompey, beinge followed of all the Senate, went to him, and tolde him openly: Pompey, I commaund thee to helpe thy contry with that army thou hast already and also to leaue more to aide thee. The like speche did Lentulus vnto him, who was appointed one of the Consuls the yere following. Now, when Pompey thought to leaue souldiers in ROME and to bill them, some would not obey him, a few others went unwillingly with him with heauie hartes, and the most of them cried, peace, peace. Antony also, against the Senates minde, red a letter vnto the people sent from Cæsar containing certaine offers and reasonable requestes, to draw the common peoples affection towards him. For his request was, that Pompey and he should both of them resigne their gouernments, and should dismishe their armies to make all well, referring them selues wholly to the iudgement of the people, and to deliuer vp account vnto them of their doings. Lentulus beinge nowe entered into his Consulshippe, did not assemble the Senate. But Cicero lately returned out of CILICIA, praedict to bring them to agreement, propounding that Cæsar should leaue GAULE, and all the rest of his armie, reseruing onely two legions and the gouernment of ILLYRIA, attending his seconde Consulshippe. Pompey liked not this motion. Then Cæsar's frendes were contented to graunt that he should haue but one of his legions: But Lentulus spake against it, and Cato cried out on thother side also, that Pompey was deceiued, and they both. So all treatie of peace was cutte of. In the meane time, newes came to ROME, that Cæsar had wonne ARMINVM, a fayet great cite of ITALIE, and that he came directly to ROME with a great power. But that was not true. For he came but with three hundred horse, and five thousand footemen, and would not tatie for the rest of his armie that was yet on thother side of the mountaines in GAULE, but made hast rather to surpris his enemies upon the sodaine, beinge affrayd and in garboyle, not looking for him so soone: rather then to geue them time to be provided, and to fight with him when they were ready. For when he was come to the riuers side of Rubicon, (which was the utmost confine of the prouince he had in charge towards ITALIE) he stayed sodainely, weying with him selfe the great enterprise he tooke in hand. At the last, as men that beinge of a maruelous height from the ground do hedlong throw themselves downe, closing of their eyes, and withdrawing their mindes from the thought of the danger: crying out these wordes only vnto them that were by, in the greeke tongue, ἀντιστοχὸν αἰεὶ: in english, let the dyt be cast meaning hereby to put all in hafard, and according to our prouerbe, to set all on fix and futen; he passed ouer with his armie. Now, the newes of his comming beinge carried to ROME, they were in such a maruelous feare, as the like was neuer seene. For all the Senate ratine immediatly vnto Pompey, and all the other magistrats of the cite fled vnto him also. Tullius asking Pompey what power he had to resist them, he answered him, sayinge somewhat in his speech: that he had the two legions ready which Cæsar sent him backe againe, and that he thought with the number of them which he had leauied, in haf, he should make up the number of thirtie thousand fighting men. Then Tullius cryed out openly: ah, thou hast mocked vs Pompey: for thereupon gaue order they should send ambassadors vnto Cæsar. There was one Phaonius in the companie, who otherwise was no ill man, sayinge that he was somewhat to bolde, thinking to countereface Cæsar's plaine manner of speech: he bad Pompey then

A stampe his foote upon the ground, & make those souldiers come which he had promised the. Pompey gently bare with Phaonius mocke. But when Cato told him also, what he had prophesied before hand of Cæsar, he answered him againe: in deed thou hast prophesied more truly then I, but I haue delte more friendly then he. Then Cato thought good that they should make him lieutenant generall of ROME with full and absolute power to commaund all, sayinge: that the selfe same men which doe the greatest mischief, know best also how to remedie the same. So he immediatly departed into SICILE, hauing the charge and gouernment of that contrie: and also euery one of the other Senators went vnto the charge they were appointed. Thus all ITALIE being in armes, no man knew what was best to be done. For they that were out of ROME, came flyinge thither from all partes: and those on thother side that were within ROME, went out as fast, and forooke the cite in this trouble and disorder. That which might letue beinge willing to obeye, was found very weake: and that on thother side which by dilobedience did hurte, was to stronge and ill to be gouerned by the magistrats, hauing lawe to commaund. For there was no possibilitie to pacifie their feare, neither would they suffer Pompey to offer thinges as he would: but euery man followed his owne fancie, euen as he found him selfe greiued, affraid, or in doubt, and in one daie they were in diuers mindes. Pompey could heare nothing of certaintie of his enemies. For some, one while would bring him newes one way, and then againe another way: and then if he would not credit them, they were angry with him. At the length, when he saw the tumult & confusion to great at ROME, as there was no more to pacifie it: he commaunded all the Senators to follow him, telling all them that remained behinde, that he would take them for Cæsar's frendes, and so at night departed out of the cite. Then the two Consuls fled also, without doing any sacrifice to the goddesses: as they were wont to do before they went to make any warre. So Pompey, euen in his greatest trouble and most danger, might thinke him selfe happy to haue euery mans goodwill as he had. For they that diuers misliked the cause of this warre, yet no man hated the captaine: but there were more found that could not forsake Pompey for the loue they bare him, then there were that followed him to fight for their libertie. Shortly after Pompey was gone out of ROME, Cæsar was come to ROME, who possessing the cite, spake very gently vnto all them he found there, and pacified their feare: sayinge that he threatned Metellus, one of the Tribunes of the people, to put him to death, by cause he would not suffer him to take any of the treasure of the common wealth. Vnto that cruell threate, he added a more bitter speech also, sayinge: that it was not so hard a thing for him to doe it, as to speake it. Thus hauing put downe Metellus, and taken that he needed to serue his turne, he tooke apou him to follow Pompey, thinking to drine him out of ITALIE, before that his armie he had in SPAYNE should come to him: Pompey in the meane time, hauing taken the cite of BRINDVSIVM, and gotten some shippes together, he made the two Consuls presently imbarke with thirtie ensegnes of footemen, which he sent beyond the sea before vnto DYRRACHIVM. And incontinently after that, he sent his father in lawe Scipio, and Cneus Pompey his sonne, into SYRIA, to prouide him shippes. Him selfe on thother side, fortified the rampers of the cite, and placed the lightest souldiers he had vpon the walles, and commaunded the BRINDVSINIANS not to sturte out of their houses: & further, he cast trenches within the cite, at the ende of the streetes in diuers places, and filled those trenches with sharpe pointed flakes, sauing two streetes onely, which went vnto the haven. Then the third day after, hauing imbarked all the rest of his souldiers at his pleasure, he sodainly liuinge vp a signe into the ayer, to geue them warning which he had left to gard the rampers: they straight ranne to him with speede, and quickly reueyning them into his shippes, he wayed ancker, and boyled saile. Cæsar perueying the walles naked without ward, he straight mistrusted that Pompey was fled: who hauing after him, had almost runne vpo the sharpe flakes, and fallen into the trenches, had not the BRINDVSINIANS geuen him warning of them. So he stayed and ranne not ouerthwart the cite, but fetched a compasse about to goe to the haven: where he found that all the shippes were vnder saile, two shippes onely excepted, vpon the which were left a few souldiers. Some thinke that this departure of Pompey, was one of the best stratagemes of warre that euer he vfed. Notwithstanding, Cæsar maruelled much, that he being in a strong citie, and looking for his armie to come out of SPAYNE, and being master of the sea besides, that he would euer forsake Italy. Cicero also reproved him, for that he rather followed Themiſticles counsell, the Pericles: considering that the troublesome time was rather to be likened vnto Pericles, the Themiſticles time. Yea Cæſar him self shewed, that he was affraid of the time. For when he had taken Numerius one of Pompeys friends, he sent him vnto Pompey at Brundisium, to offer him reasonable cōditiōs of peace: But Numerius followed Pompey, & failed away with him. By this meanes, Cæſar in three score dayes being lord of all Italy without any bloodshed, he was very desirous to follow with speed after Pompey. But because he had no ships ready, he let him go, & hastened towards Spainne, to ioyne Pompeys army there vnto his. Now Pompey in the meane space, had gotten a maruelous great power together both by sea & by land. His army by sea was wonderfull. For he had five hundred good shippes of warre, & of galliasses, soyfies, & pinnaces, an infinite number. By land, he had all the flower of the horsemē of Rome, and of all Italy, to the number of seuen thousand horse, all riche men, of great houses, and valliant minds. But his footemen, they were men of all forts, & raw souldiers vntrained, whom Pompey continually exercised, lying at the citie of Berrone, not sitting idly, but taking paines, as if he had bene in the prime of his youth. Which was to great purpose, to incourage others, seeing Pompey being eight and fifty yeare old, fight a foote armed at all peeces, & then a horsebacke, quickly to draw out his sword while his horse was in his full career, and easily to put vp againe, and to throw his dart from him, not onely with such agilitie to hyr pointe blance, but also with strength to cast it such a way from him, that fewe young men could doe the like. Thither came diuers kinges, princes, and great lordes of contries, and yielded them selues vnto him: and of Romane captaines that had borne office, he had of them about him, the number of a whole Senate. Amongst them came vnto him Labeius also, who before was Cæſars friend, & had alwayes bene with him in his warres in Gavle. There came vnto him also, Brutus, the sonne of that Brutus which was slaine in Gavle, a valliant man, and which had neuer spoken vnto Pompey until that day, bycause he took him for a murderer of his father: but then willingly followed him as defender of the libertie of Rome. Cicero him self also, though he had both written and geuen counsell to the contrarie, thought it a shame to him not to be amongst the number of them that would hazard their liues for defence of their contry. There came vnto him also Tidius Sextius euen into Macedon, notwithstanding that he was an old man, and lame of one of his legges: whom others laughing to scorne to see him come, when Pompey saw him, he rose & went to meete him, iudging it a good token of their goodwill vnto him, when such olde men as he, chose rather to be with him in daunger, than at home with safety. Hereupon they fate in counsell, and following Catoes opinion, decreed that they should put no citizen of Rome to death but in battell, and should lacke no citie that was subiect to the Empire of Rome: the which made Pompeys parte the better liked. For they that had nothing to doe with the warres, either bycause they dwelt farre of, or els for that they were so poore, as otherwise they were not regarded: did yet both in deede and word fauor Pompeys parte, thinking him an enemy both to the goddes and men, that withed not Pompey victorie. Cæſar also shewed him selfe very mercifull & courteous, where he ouercame. For when he had wonne all Pompeys armie that was in Spainne, he suffered the captaines that were taken to go at libertie, & onely reserved the souldiers. Then comming ouer the Alpes againe, he passed through all Italy, & came to the citie of Brundisium in the winter quarter: and there passing ouer the sea, he went vnto the citie of Oricum, & laded there. Now Cæſar hauing Vibius, one of Pompeys familiier friends with him, whom he had takē prisoner: he sent him vnto Pompey to pray againe that they might meete, & both of them deseper their armies within three dayes, and being reconciled (giving their faith one to an other) so to retorne into Italy like good friends together. Pompey thought againe, that these were new deuises to intrappe him. Thereupon he sodainly wet downe to the sea, & tooke all the places of strength by the sea side, safely to lodge his campe in, & all the ports, creekes & harbours for ships to lie in rode: so that what wind so ether blew on the skie, it serued his turne, to bring him either men, vittells, or money. Cæſar on the other side was so distressed both by sea & by land, that he was driue to procuer battell, & to assaile Pompey euen in his owne forts, to make him come out to fight with him: of whom most times he euer had the better in all skirmishes, sauing once, when he was in daunger to haue lost all his army.

Pompey sheweth Cæſar.

A For Pompey had valiantly repulsed his men, and made them flee, and had slaine two thousand of them in the field: but he durst not enter pelmel with them into their campe as they fled. Whereupon Cæſar saide to his frendes, that his enemy had wonne the victorie that day, if he had known how to ouercome. This victorie put Pompeys men in such courage, that they would needes haue battell. And Pompey him selfe also though he wrote letters vnto strange kinges, captaines, and cities of his confederacie, as if he had alreadye wonne all was yet affrayed to fight an other battell, thinking it better by trade of time; and distresse of vittells, to ouercome him. For Cæſars men being olde and expert souldiers, and wont euer to haue the victorie when they fought together: he knew they would be lothe to be brought to fight any other kinde of way, to be driuen to often remouing of their campe from place to place, and still to fortifie and intrench them selues, and therefore that they would rather put it to aduenture out of hande, and fight it out. But notwithstanding that Pompey had before perswaded his men to be quiet, and not to stirre, perceyuing that after this last bickering Cæſar being scanted with vittells raised his campe, and departed thence to goe into Thessaly, through the contrie of the ATHAMANIANS: then he could no more bridle their glorie and courage, which cried, Cæſar is fled, let vs follow him. And others, let vs retorne home againe into Italy. And others also sent their frendes and seruantes before to Rome, to hier them houses neere the market place: intending when they came thither to sue for offices in the common weale. Some others were also that in a iollitie would needes take shippe, and saile into the Ile of LISSA or Corinth (whom Pompey had sent thither) to cary her that good newes, that the warre was ended. Thereupon assembling the counsell, Afranius thought it best to winne Brundisium, for that was the chiefeſt marke to be shot at in this warre: for whosoer obtayned that, had straight all SICILE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, SPAYNE, and GAVLE at commandement. Furthermore, that it was a dishonour to Pompey (which in reason should touche him aboue all thinges) to suffer their contrie to be in such cruell bondage and subiection vnto slaves and flatterers of tyrantes, offering it selfe as it were into their hands. But Pompey neither thought it honorable for him, once againe to flee from Cæſar, and to make him follow him, sihe fortune had geuen him oportunitie to haue Cæſar in chase: nor lawfull also before the gods, to forsake his father in lawe Scipio, and many other also that had bene Consuls, despered abroad in Greece and Thessaly, which should immediatly fall into Cæſars hands, with all their riches and armies they had. Furthermore, he said, that they had care enough for the citie of Rome, which drew the warres fardest of from them: so as, they remaining safe & quiet at home, neither hearing nor feeling the misery of warres) might in thend peaceably receive and welcome him home, that remained conqueror. With this determination, he marched forward to follow Cæſar, being determined not to geue him battell, but to beseege him, & only to compasse him in full being neere vnto him, and so to cut him off from vittells. There was also an other reason that made him to follow that determination. For it was reported to him, that there was a speech geuen out among the Romane knights, that so soone as euer they had ouercome Cæſar, they must also bring Pompey to be a priuare man againe. Some saye therefore, that Pompey would neuer afterwards employ Cæſar in any greater matters of weight in all this warre, but when he followed Cæſar; he left him captaine of his armie to kepe his carriage by sea; fearing that so soone as Cæſar were once ouercome, he would make him straight also resigne his authoritie. Pompey following Cæſar in this manner, faire and softly, they cryed out upon him, that he made no warre with Cæſar, but against his contrie and the Senate, by cause he might be still in authoritie; and that he would neuer leaue to haue them for his seruantes and gard about him, which should rule and command the world. Furthermore, Domitius Ahenobarbus, calling him continually Agamemnon, and king of kinges: made him much to be enuid: Rhœmus also mocked him as much as the other, that spake most boldest: for he went crying vp and downe, my masters, I geue you warning; you are like to eate no Troycan figges this yeare. And Lucius Afranius also, he that had lost the armie which he had in Spainne, and was also suspected for a traitour, seeing Pompey then refused to come to battell: I meruaile, said he, that they which accuse me, doe not lustely goe to finde him out; whome they call the marchant and common buyer of prouinces, to fight with him presently. With these and many such other lewd speeches, they compelled Pompey in the end (who could not but be ill spoken of, and would not deny his friends any thing) to follow their vaine hopes and desires, and to forsake his owne wife determination: the which thing, no good shippesster, and much lesse a chiefe and soueraine capitaine, ouer so many nations and so great armies, should haue suffered, and consented vnto. Now, he that did alwayes commend the phisitions, that would not follow the sonde desire of the sicke patients: was him selfe constrained to obey the worst parte of his armie, fearing their displeasure, where their life and health stood in hazard. For who would thinke or iudge them to be wise men, and in their wits, who walking vp and downe their campe, did already sue to be Consuls and Prætors? considering that Spurcius, Publius, & Scipio, were at strife together, making friends to be his high bishoppe, (which office Caesar had) as if they should haue fought with Tigranes king of ARMENIA, or with the king of the PARATHIENS, which had camped by them, and not with Caesar and his armie: who had taken a thousand townes by assaulte, had subdued about three hundred nations, and had wonne infinite battells of the GERMANES and GAVRES; and was neuer ouercome had also taken a million of men prisoners, and had likewise slaine so many at diuers battells. All this notwithstanding, they of Pompeys side still being importunate of him, & troubling him in this sort: in fine, when they were come into the fields of PRÆSALIA, they compelled Pompey to call a counsell. There Labienus, generall of the horsemen standing vp, said before them all; that he would not retorne from the battell, before he had made his enemies to flee. The like othe all the rest did take. The next night following, Pompey thought in his dreame, that he came into the Theater, and that the people to honor him, made a maruelous great clapping of their handes: & that he him selfe did set forth the temple of Venus the conquerour, with many spoiles. This vision partly put him in good courage, & partly againe made him doubt: for that he was affrayed, by cause Caesars familie was descended from this goddesse Venus, that his dreame did signifie, that he should haue the honor of the victorie, with the spoiles he should winne of him. Besides all this, there ranne sodaine fearful noyses & tumults in his campe without any apparant cause, that waked all the campe vpon it. At the fourth watche, when the watche is renewed in the morning, there was seene a maruelous great light ouer Caesars campe, and they were all at rest. Of that, there came as it were a torch of a burning fire, and fell in Pompeys campe. The which Caesar him selfe layed he saw, when he went to see the watche. At the break of the daye, Caesar being determined to raise his campe, and to go to the citie of SCOTVA, as his souldiers were busie about ouerthrowing of their tentes, & sending away their bagges and baggage before: there came skowtes vnto him, that brought him worde they sawe a great deale of armor and weapon caried to and fro in their enemies campe, and hard a noyse and bustling besides, as of men that were preparing to fight. And these came in other skowtes, that brought word also that their vaward was already set in battell raye. Then Caesar said, that the daye was now come they had longed for so fore, and that they should now fight with men, not with hunger, nor with want of vittells: and thereupon gaue order presently that they should put out the red coates or armes vpon his tent, which was the signe, all the ROMANES vsed, to shew that they would fight. The souldiers seeing that out, left their baggage and tentes, and with great shewes of ioye ranne to arme them selues. The captaines of euery band also, bestowed euery man in such place as he should fight; and so they conueyed them selues into battell raye, without any tumulte or disorder, as quietly, as if they should haue entred into a daunce. Pompey him selfe led the right winge of his armie against Antony. The middle of the battell he gaue vnto Stripo his father in lawe, being right against Domitius Calpurnius. The left winge allowas led by Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, the which was garded with men of armes. For all the horsemen were placed on that side, to distresse Caesar if they could; that was directly against them: and to ouerthrowe the tenth legion that was so much accounted of, being the valliantest souldiers the enemy had in all his armie, amongst the which Caesar did euer vs. to fight in person. Caesar then seeing the left winge of his enemies so strong with the gard of the horsemen, and being affrayed of the brightnes of their armor brought forward six ensignes for supply, which he placed hard behind the tenth legion, commaunding them that no man should sturre, lest their enemies should discouer them.

And furthermore, when the horsemen of the enemies should come to geue charge vpon them, that then they should runne with speed on the too side of the forme rankes, & not to throw their darts farre from them, as the valliantest souldiers are wont to do, to come to the sword the sooner: but to throw them vpward into their enemies eyes and faces. For, said he, these braue fellows and fine daunfers, will neuer abide to haue their faces marred. And this was Caesars deuise at that time. Pompey being a horse backe, rode vp and downe to consider the ordinance of both battells: and perceiving that his enemies stood still in their rankes, looking for the signall of battell, & that his owne battell on thother side waied vp & downe disorderly, as men vnskillfull in warres: he was affrayed they would sic before they were charged. Therupon he straightly commaunded the in the vaward, that they should stedily kepe their racks, and standing close together should defend them selues, receyuing the charge of the enemy. But Caesar disliked of that deuise, for thereby, said he, the force of their blowes was lessened & in withholding them fro geuing the charge, he not only tooke away that courage which that instant cariet with him that commeth with furie: but made them more ouer saine hearted, in receyuing the charge of the enemies. In Caesars armie, there were about two and twentie thousand fighting men: and in Pompeys armie, somewhat aboute twice as many. Now, when the sword of battell was geuen of either side, and that the trompettes did sounde the alarme, euery man beganne to looke to him selfe. But a few of the chieft of the ROMANES, and certaine GRÆCIANS that were there also out of the set battell, perceiving the imminent danger, beganne to bethinke them, to what passe the ambition and wilfull contention betwene these two men, had brought the state of ROME. For, the weapons of kinsmen, the bandes of brethren, the ensignes all alike, the flower of so many valliant men of one citie, did serue for a notable example, to shew how mans nature prick forward with couetousnes, is quite blinde and without reason. For if they could haue bene contented quietly to haue gouerned that which they had conquered: the greatest, and best part of the world, both by sea and by land, was subiect vnto them. Or otherwise, if they could not haue quenched their vnassatiable desire of vidorie & triumphe, they had occasion of warre enough offered them against the PARTHIANS and GERMANES. Furthermore, they had enough to do besides to conquer SCYTHIA, and the INDIANS: & wial, they had had an honest cullet to haue cloked their ambitious desires, if it had bene but to haue brought the barbarous people to a ciuill life. For what horse men of SCYTHIA, or arrows of PARTHIA, or riches of INDIANS, could haue abidden the power of three score & ten thousand ROMANE souldiers, & specially being led by two so famous captaines, as Pompey, and Caesar? whose names, these strange & faire nations vnderstood, longe before the name of the ROMANES so great were their victories, hauing conquered so many wilde & barbarous people. They both being then in armes the one against the other, not regarding their honor, which made them so ambitious: did not spare their owne contry, who had vaill that time remained vnvincible, both in fame and prowes. For, the alliance that was made betwene them, the loue of Julia, & marrying with her, was suspected fro the beginning to be but a deceit, & a pledge as it were of a conspiracie made betwene the, for a priuate benefit, more the for any true friendship. Now, when the felldes of PRÆSALIA were couered ouer with men, with horse and armor, and that the signall of battell was geuen on either side: the first man of Caesars army that aduanced forward to geue charge, was Caius Crassinius, captaine of six score and fise men, to performe a great promise which he had made vnto Caesar. For Caesar, when he came out of his tent in the morning, seeing him, called him to him by his name, and asked him what he thought of the successe of this battell. Crassinius holding out his right hand vnto him, courageously cryed: Oh Caesar, thinke is the victorie; and this daye thou shalt commend me either aliue or dead. Then remembering these wordes, he brake out of the rankes, and many following after him, ranne amongst the middelt of his enemies. Straight they came to the sword, and made great slaughter. But he pressing forward full, one with a thrust ranne him through the mouth, that the sword pointe came through at his necke. Therupon Crassinius, Crassinius being slaine, the battell was equall. Pompey did not make his left winge marche ouer sodaine, ly, but stayed, and cast his eyes abroade to see what his horsemen would do, the which had already decuded their companies, meaning to compasse in Caesar, and to make the small number of horsemen which he had before him to gaine backe upon the squadron of his footemen. On the other side, as soone as Caesar had geue the signal of battell, his horsemen retired backe againe, & the fix ensignes which he had placed secretly behinde them, (being three thousand fighting men) ranne sodainely to assaile the enemy vpon the flanke, and when they came neere vnto the horsemen, they threw the pointes of their darts vpwades according to Caesars commaundement, and hyt the younge gentlemen full in their faces. They being vnto the point of fight, & least of all looking for such manner of fight: had not the hartes to defend themselves, nor to abide to be hurt as they were in their faces, but turning their heades, & clapping their handes on their faces, shamefully fled. They being ouerthrowen, Caesars men made no accompt to follow them, but went and gaue charge vpon the battell of footemen, in that place specially where they had no gard of horsemen, whereby they might the easelier be compassed about. Thus, they being charged by them in the flanke, and in the vaward also by the tenth legion, perceyuing them selues (contrarie to their expectation) compassed about by their enemies, where they thought to haue encountered them: they could make no longer resistance. They also being likewise driuen to flie, when Pompey saw the dust in the element, & coniectured the flying of his horsemen: what minde he was of then, it was hard to say. For by his countenance, a man might well thinke he was like a man amazed, and at his wittes end, forgetting that he was Pompey the great: for that he went straight into his campe, and spake neuer a word to any man, rightly verifying Homers verses to this effect.

But mightie Ioue vnto fates aloft in yurie chariot hie, Strake Aiax vnto so great a feare that Aiax by and by, Let fall his lethern target made of tough oxe hide (swen folde, And ran away, not looking backe, for all he vvas so bold.

In this estate Pompey entred into his tent, and fate him downe there a great while, and spake neuer a worde: vntill such time as many of the enemies entred pell mell with his men that fled into his campe. And then, he said no more: but what, euen into our campe? and so rising vp, he put a gowne on his backe, euen fit for his misfortune, and secretly stole out of the campe. The other legions also fled: and great slaughter was made of the tent keepers, and their seruantes that garded the campe. For Afinius Pollio writeth (who was at that battell on Caesars side) that there were slaine only but six thousand souldiers. Howbeit at the taking of this campe, Caesars souldiers then found plainly the madnes & vanitie of Pompeys men. For, all their tentes and pavilions were full of nosegayes and garlandes of mirtle, & their couches all couered with flowers, their tables full of bowles of wine, and men prepared ready to do sacrifices for ioye, rather then to arme them selues to fight. Thus went they to battell, caried away with this vaine & foolish hope. When Pompey was gone a litle way fro his campe, he forooke his horse, hauing a very few with him: & perceyuing that no man pursued him, he went a foote faire & softly, his head full of such thoughts and imaginations, as might be supposed a man of hislike calling might haue, who for foure & thirty yeeres space together, was wont continually to cary victorie away, and beganne then euen in his last cast, to proue what it was to flie, and to be overcome: and who thought then with him selfe, how in one howers space he had lost the honor and riches, which he had gotten in so many foughten feildes and battels, whereby he was not longe before followed and obeyed of so many thousand men of warre, of so many horsemen, and of such a great flete of shippes on the sea, and then to goe as he did in such poore estate, and with so small a traine, that his very enemies who sought him, knew him not. Thus when he was passed the citie of LARISSA, and contraiuing to hide vnto the vallie of Tempe: there being a thirke, he fell downe of his bellic, and dranke of the riuer. Then rising vp againe, he went his way thence, and came to the sea side, and tooke a fishers cottage where he lay all night. The next morning by breake of the daye, he went into a litle bote vpon the riuer, and tooke the free men with him that were about him: and as for the slaues, he sent them backe againe, and did counsell them boldly to goe to Caesar, and not to be affrayed. Thus rowing vp and downe the shore side, in this litle bote, he spied a great shippe of burden in the maine sea, riding at anchor, which was ready to waye anchor, and to saile awaye. The master of the shippe was a ROMANE, who, though he was not familiarly acquainted with Pompey, yet knew him

Pompey receiveth Cratippus the Philosopher, about divine providence.

A by sight very well. He was called Peticius, who had dreamed the night before, that he saw Pompey speake vnto him, not like the man he was wont to be, but in poverty and in misery. So he had tolde this dreame vnto the mariners which sailed with him (as is commonly vsed), especially when they dreame of such weighty matters, and being at last withal hand at the very instant, there was one of the mariners that tolde him, he saw a litle bote of the riuer rowing towards them, and that there were men in it that shooke their clokes at them, & held out their hands. Thereupon Peticius standing vp, knew Pompey straight, euen in like case as he had dreamed of him the night before: and clapping his head for anger, commaunded his mariners to let downe his bore, and gaue him his hand, calling him Pompey by his name, mistaking (seeing him in that estate) what misfortune had happened to him. Therupon, not looking to be intreated, nor that he should tell him of his mishap, he receiued him into his shippe, and all those he would haue with him: and then hoisted saile. With Pompey there were both the Lemnli, & Faonius. Shortly after also, they perceiued king Deiotarus comming from the riuer to them, that beckened and made signes to receiue them: which they did. At supper time, the master of the shippe, made ready such meate as he had aboard. Faonius seeing Pompey for lacke of men to waite on him, washing of him selfe: ran vnto him, washed him, and annointed him, and afterwarde continued still to waite vpon him, and to doe such seruice about him, as seruantes do to their masters, euen to washing of his feete, & making ready of his supper. VVhen a simple man saw him, that could no skill of seruice, he sayd:

Good gods, how every thing becommeth noble men!

C Pompey passing then by the citie of AMPHIPOLIS, coasted from thence into the Ile of Lesbos, to goe fetch his wife Cornelia and his sonne, being then in the city of MYTILENE. There hauing cast out his anker, and riding at rode, he put a messenger on the shore & sent him into the citie to his wife: not according to her expectation, who was still put in good hope by continuall letters and newes brought vnto her, that the warre, was ended and determined by the city of D Y R R A C H I V M. This messenger now finding her in this hope, had not the hart so much as to salute her, but letting her vnderstand rather by his teares then wordes, the great misfortune Pompey had: tolde her, the must dispatch quickly, if she would see Pompey with one shippe only, and none of his, but borrowed. The young Lady hearing these newes, fell downe in a fount before him, and neither spake nor stured of long time: but after she was come to D herselfe, remembering that it was no time to weepe and lament, she went with speede through the city vnto the sea side. There Pompey meeting her, tooke her in his armes, & embraced her. But she sinking vnder him, fell downe, and sayd: Our alas, woe worth my hard fortune, nor thine (good husband) that I see thee now brought to one poore shippe, who before thou marriedst thy vnfortunate Cornelia, wert wont to saile these seas with five hundred shippes. Alas, why art thou come to see me, and why diddest thou not leaue me to cursed fate and my wicked destiny: fith my selfe is cause of all this thy euill? Alas, how happy a woman had I bene, if I had bene dead, before I heard of the death of my first husband Publius Crassus, whom the wretched PARTHIANS slew? And how wife a woman had I bene, (if according to my determination) I had killed my selfe immediately after him: where now I lue to bring yet this misfortune vnto

E Pompey the great! It is reported that Cornelia spake these words, and that Pompey also answered her in this manner. Peraduenture, Cornelia mine, thou hast knowen a better fortune, which hath also deceiued thee, because the hath continued longer with me then her manner is. But since we are borne men, we must patiently beare these troubles, and proue fortune againe. For it is no impossible matter for vs againe to come into prosperitie out of this present miserie, as to fall out of late prosperitie into present calamitie. When Cornelia heard him say so, she sent backe into the city for her stuffe and family. The MYTILENIANS also came openly to salute Pompey, and prayed him to come into the city, and to refresh him selfe: but Pompey would not, & gaue them counsell to obey the conqueror, & not to feare any thing, for Caesar was a iust man, and of a courteous nature. Then Pompey turning vnto Cratippus the Philosopher, who came among the citizens also to see him: made his complaint vnto him, and reasoned a litle with him about diuine providence. Cratippus courteously yielded vnto him, putting him still in better hope, saying least he would haue grown too hot and troubleosome, if he would haue holden him hard to it. For Pompey at the length might haue asked him, what prouidence of the gods there had bene in his doings? And Cratippus might haue answered him, that for the ill government of the common wealth at Rome, it was of necessity that it should fall into the hands of a foueraigne Prince. Peradventure Cratippus might then haue asked him: how, and whereby Pompey wouldst thou make vs beleue, if thou haddest ouercome Cæsar, that thou wouldst haue had thy good fortune better then he? But for diuine matters, referre them to the goddess as it pleaseth them. Pompey taking his wife and friends with him, hoisted saile, and landed no where, but compelled to take freshe acates and water. The first city he came vnto, was ATTALIA in the contry of PAMPHYLIA. Thither came to him certaine gallies out of CILICIA, & many souldiers also, inso much he had a three score Senators of ROME againe in his company. Then, understanding that his army by sea was yet whole, and that Cæsar had gathered together a great number of his souldiers after the ouerthrowe, whome he had transported with him into AFRICK: he lamented, and complained vnto his friends, that they had compelled him to fight by land, & not suffred him to helpe him selfe with his other force wherein he was the stronger, and that he kept not still neere vnto his army by sea, that if fortune failed him by land, he might yet presently haue prepared to his power ready by sea, to haue resisted his enemy. To confesse a troth, Pompey committed not so great a fault in all this warre, neither did Cæsar put forth a better deuise, then to make his enemy fight farre from his armie by sea. Thus Pompey being driuen to attempt somewhat according to his small abilitie, he sent Ambassadors vnto the cities. To others, he went him selfe in person alio to require money, wherewith he manned and armed some ships. This notwithstanding, fearing the sodaine approach of his enemy, leaue he should preuent him before he could put any reasonable force in readines for to resist him: he bethought him selfe what place he might best retire vnto for his most safetie. When he had considered of it, he thought that there was neuer a prouince of the ROMANS that could saue and defend them. And for other straunge realmes, he thought PARTHIA about all other, was the best place to receiue them into at that present, hauing so smal power as they had; and that was better able to helpe & aide them with more power then they. Other of his counsell were of minde to go into AFRICK, vnto king Iuba. But Theophanes LESBIAN said, he thought it a great folly, to leaue ÆGYPT which was but three dayes failing from thence, and king Ptolomy, (being but lately comen to mans state, and bound vnto Pompey for the late friendshippe and honor his father found of him) and to goe put him selfe into the hands of the PARTHANS, the vilest, and vnfaithfullest nation in the world, and not to proue the modesty of a ROMANE, that had bene his father in law, whose prosperity if he could haue endured, he might haue bene the chiefest man: and now to put him selfe to Asfaxes good will, who could not away with Crassus when he liued. Further, he thought it an ill parte also, for him to go cary his young wife of the noble house of Scipio, amongst the barbarous people, who thinke it lawfull for the to vse what villany and infoleny they list to any. For, admit the haue no villany offered her by them: yet is it an vndecent thing, to thinke she might haue bene dishonored, they hauing her in their power to doe it. There was no perswasion (as they say) but this only that turned Pompey vnto Euphrates: for it seemeth that Pompeys counsell, and not his fortune, made him take that way. Being determined therefore to flie into ÆGYPT, he departed out of CYPRVS in a gally of SELEVCIA with his wife Cornelia. The residue of his traine imbarke also, some into gallies, & others into marchauntes shippes of great burden, and so safely passed the sea without daunger. When Pompey heard newes that king Ptolomy was in the cite of PELSVSIVM with his armie, making warre against his sister: he went thither, and sent a messenger before vnto the king, to aduertise him of his arriuall, and to intreate him to receiue him. King Ptolomy was then but a young man, inso much as one Pothinus gouerned all the whole realme vnder him. He assembled a counsell of the chiefest and wisest men of the court, who had such credit and authoritie as it pleased him to geue them. They being assembled, he commaunded euery man in the kings name to say his minde touching the receiuing of Pompey, whether the king should receiue him or not. It was a miserable thinge to see Pothinus, an eunuche of the kinges, and Theodotus of CHIO, an hyered schoolemaster to teache the young king rethoricke, and Achillas of ÆGYPTIAN to consult among them selues what they should doe with Pompey the great. These were the

A die chiefest counsellors of all his eunuches, and of those that had brought him up. Nowe did Pompey ride at ancker vpon the shore side, expecting the resolution of this counsell: in the which the opinions of other were diuers, for they would not haue receiued him: the other also, that he should be receiued. But the Rethorician Theodotus, to shew his eloquence, perswaded them, that neither the one nor the other was to be accepted. For, sayd he, if we receiue him, we shall haue Cæsar our enemy, and Pompey our Lord: and if they do deny him on the other side, Pompey will blame them for refusing of him, and Cæsar for not keeping of him. Therefore, this should be the best resolution, to send to kill him: for thereby, they should winne the good will of the one, and not feare the displeasure of the other: and some say moreouer, that he added this mocke withall: a dead man bites not. They being determined of this among them selues, he gave Achillas commaund to doe it. He taking with him Septimius (who had charge aforetime vnder Pompey) and Salinius an other Centurion also, with three or foure souldiers besides, they made towards Pompeys gallye, about whom were at that time, the chiefest of his traine, to see what would become of this matter. But when they saw the likelihood of their entertainment, and that it was not in Princely show and maner, nor nothing answerable to the hope which Theophanes had put them in, seeing to few men come to them in a siter bote, they began then to mistrust the small accompt that was made of them, & counsellled Pompey to returne backe, and to launce againe into the sea, being out of the daunger of the hatching of a flare. In the meane time, the siter bote drew neere, and Septimius rose, and saluted Pompey in the ROMAN tongue, by the name of Imperator, as much as fountaine Capitaine: and Salinius also spake to him in the Greeke tongue, and bad him come into his bote, because that by the shore side, there was a great deale of muddie and sande bankes; so that his gally should haue no water to bring him in. At the very same time, they saw a farrte of diuers of the kings gallies which were arming with all speede possible, & all the shore besides full of souldiers. Thus, though Pompey & his company would haue altered their mindes, they could not haue told how to haue escaped: & furthermore, shewing that they had mistrusted the, then they had geuen him the other occasion to haue executed his cruelty. So taking his leaue of his wife Cornelia, who lamented his death before his end, he commaunded two Centurions to go down before him into the ÆGYPTIAN bote, and Philp one of his slaves enfranchised, with an other slave called Seynes. When Achillas reached out his hande to receiue him into his bote, he turned him to his wife, and so done, and sayd these verses of Sophocles vnto them:

The man that into Court comes free, Must there in state of bondage be.

These were the last words he spake vnto his people, when he left his owne gally, & went into the ÆGYPTIAN bote. The lande being a great way off from his gally, when he saw neuer a man in the bote speake friendly vnto him, beholding Septimius, he said vnto him: me thinks my friend I should know thee, for that thou hast serued with me heretofore. The other nodded with his head that it was true, but gaue him no answer, nor shewed him any curtesie. Pompey seeing that no man spake to him, tooke a little booke he had in his hande, in the which he had wrytten an oration that he ment to make vnto king Ptolomy, & beganne to read it. When they came neere the shore, Cornelia with her seruants and friends about her, stode vp in her shippe in great feare, to see what should become of Pompey. So, she hoped well, when the saw many of the kings people on the shore, comming towards Pompey at his landing, as it were to receiue and honor him. But euen as Pompey tooke Philp his hande to arise more easily, Septimius came first behinde him and thrust him through with his sword. Next vnto him also, Salinius and Achillas drew out their swords in like manner. Pompey then did no more but tooke vp his gowne with his hands, and hidde his face, and manly abidde the wounds they gaue him, only fighting a litle. Thus being nine and fifty yeare olde, he ended his life the next day after the day of his birth. That they rode at ancker in their shippes, when they saw him murdered, gaue such a fearful crye, that it was hard to the shore: the wailing vp their ankers with spede, they hoysed saile, and departed their way, hauing winde at will that blew a lusty gale, as soone as they had gotten the maine sea. The *ÆGYPTIAN*s which prepared to rowe after them, when they saw they were past their reach, and vnpossible to be ouertaken: they let them goe.

Then hauing striken of Pompeys heade, they threwe his body ouer borde, for a miserable spectacle to all those that were desirous to see him. Philip his infranchised bondman remained by it, vntill such time as the ÆGYPTIANS had scene it their bellies full. Then hauing washed his body with falk water, and wrapped it vp in an old shirt of his, because he had no other shift to lay it in: he sought vpon the sands, & found at the length a peece of an old fishers bone, enough to serue to burne his naked bodie with, but not all fully out. As he was busie gathering the broken peeces of this bone together, thither came vnto him an old ROMANE, whom his youth had serued, vnder Pompey, and sayd vnto him: O friend, what art thou that preparrest the funeralls of Pompey the great? Philip answered, that he was a bondman of his infranchised. Well, said he, thou shalt not haue all this honor alone, I pray thee yet let me accompany thee in so deuout a deede, that I may not altogether repent me to haue dwelt so long in a strangers contrie, where I haue abidden such miserie and trouble: but that to recompence me withall, I may haue this good happe, with mine owne hands to touche Pompeys body, and to helpe to bury the only and most famous Captaine of the ROMANS. The next day after, Lucius Lentulus not knowing what had passed, comming out of CYRVS, sailed by the shore side, and perceived a fire made for funeralls, and Philip standing by it, whom he knew not at the first. So he asked him, what is he that is dead and buried there? But straight fetching a great sigh, as he sayd he, perhappes it is Pompey the great. Then he landed a litle, and was straight taken and slaine. This was the end of Pompey the great. Not longe after, Cæsar also came into Ægypt, that was in great warres, where Pompeys head was presented vnto him: but he turned his head aside, and would not see it: and abhorred him that brought it, as a detestable murderer. Then taking his ringe wherewith he sealed his letters, whereupon was grauen a Lyon holding a sword: he burst out a weeping. Achilles and Pothinus he put to death. King Ptolemy him self also, being ouerthrowen in battell by the riuer of Nilus, vanished away, and was neuer heard of after. Theodotus the Rethoritian escaped Cæsars hands, & wandred vp & downe Ægypt in great misery, despised of euery man: Afterwards, Marcus Brutus (who slue Cæsar) coming quering ASTA, met with him by chance, and putting him to all the torments he could possibly deuise, at the length slue him. The ashes of Pompeys bodie were afterwards brought vnto his wife Corneelia, who buried them in a towne of hers by the ciue of ALBA.

THE COMPARISON OF Pompey with Agessilaus.

Now that we haue declared vnto you, the liues of Agessilaus and Pompey: let vs compare their maners and condicions together, which are these. First, Pompey came to his honor and greatnesse, by his integritie and so aduanced him selfe: and was a great aide vnto Sylla, doing many noble exploits, helping him to rid those tyrans out of ITALIE, who held it in bondage. But Agessilaus viurped the kingdom of LACEDÆMON, against the law of gods and men, condemning Leotychides for a bastard, whom his brother auowed to be his lawfull sonne: and condemned besides the oracle of the gods, which gaue warning of a lame king. Furthermore, Pompey did honor Sylla while he liued, and when he was dead, gaue his body honorable buriall in despite of Lepidus: and married his daughter vnto Panstus, the sonne of Sylla. Agessilaus contrarily did dishonor Lysander, upon light occasion: but Pompey had done no lesse for Sylla, than Sylla had done for him. Lysander on thother side, had made Agessilaus king of LACEDÆMON, and Lieutenant generall of all GREECE. Thirdly, the iniuries that Pompey did vnto the common weale, were done of necessitie, to please Cæsar and Scipio, both of them his fathers in law. Agessilaus also, to satisfie his sonnes loue, faued Sphodrias life that had deserved death, for the mischief he had done the ATHENIANS: and he willingly also tooke parte with Phobidas, not secretly, but openly, because he had broken the peace made with the THEBANS. To conclude, what hurt Pompey did vnto the ROMANS, either through ignorance, or to pleasure his friends: the same did Agessilaus vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, through anger & selfe wil, in renewing warre with the BOEOTIANS, upon a full peace concluded. If we shall reckon of the fortune of the one and the other, in the faultes they committed: Pompeys fortune vnto the ROMANS was vnlooked for. But Agessilaus would not suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to auoyd the lame kingdom, though they knew it before. For, though Leotychides had bene pronounced a bastard ten thousand times, yet had not the race of the Euryontides failed, but they could haue found another lawfull king among them, that should haue gone vpright: had not Lysander, fauoring Agessilaus, kept the true meaning of the oracle from the LACEDÆMONIANS. On thother side againe for matters of gouernment, there was neuer such an excellent deuise found out, as was done by Agessilaus: to helpe the feare and daunger the LACEDÆMONIANS were in, for those that fled at the battell of LEVCTRES, when he counselled them to let the law sleepe for that day. Neither can any man matche Pompeys with the like: who, to shew his friends what power he was of, did breake the lawes which him selfe had made. For Agessilaus being driuen of necessity to abolish the law, to saue the life of his citizens, found such a deuise that the law was not hurtfull to the common wealth, neither yet was put downe for feare it should doe hurt. I must needs commend this for a great vertue and ciuility in Agessilaus, who so soone as he received the Scytala (or scrowle of parchment from the Ephori) returned into his contrie, and left the warre of Asia. He did not as Pompey, who made him selfe great to the benefit of the common wealth, and for the common wealths sake, did forsake such honor and so great authority, as neuer Capitaine before him, but Alexander the great, had the like in those partes. But now to other matter. Touching their battells and employes in warres, the multitude of victories and triumphes that Pompey obtained, and the great armies that he led: Xenophon him selfe if he were alive, could not compare Agesilavus victories vnto his: although for the singular vertues and qualities he had in him, for recompence thereof he had liberie graunted him, to wryte and speake of Agesilavus what he thought good. Me thinks also, there was great difference betwext Pompey and Agesilavus, in their equitie and clemencie towards their enemies. For, whilst Agesilavus went about to conquer THEBES, and utterly to raze and destroy the cite of MESSINA, the one being an auncient cite of his contrie, and the other the capitall cite of BOBOTIA: he had almost lost his owne cite of SPARTA, for at the least he lost the commaundement and rule he had ouer the rest of GREECE. The other contrarily gaue cities vnto pirates to dwell in, which were willing to chaunge their trade and manner of life: and when it was in his choyse to lead Tigranes king of ARMENIA in triumphe at ROME, he chose rather to make him a confederat of the ROMANES, saying, that he preferred perpetual honor before one dayes glorie. But since it is reason we should geue the first place and honor of the discipline of warres, vnto a Capitaine of the greatest skill and experience in warres: the LACEDÆMONIAN then leaue the ROMANE farre behind. For first of all Agesilavus neuer forsooke his cite, though it was besieged with three score and ten thousand men, and that there were very fewe within the same to defende it, the which also a litle before had bene ouerthrowen at the battell of LEVCTRES. And Pompey on the other side, hearinge that he had with fife thousand foote men onely had taken a towne in ITALIE: fled from ROME in great feare. And therein he can not be excused of one of these two: either that he fled cowardly for so few men, or else that he had a false imagination of more. For he conveyed his wife and children away, but he left all the rest without defence, and fled: where in deede he should either haue overcome, valliantly fighting for defense of his contrie, or else haue receiued the conditions of peace which the conquerors should haue offered him. For, he was a citizen and allied vnto him. For he that thought it an vntollerable thing to prolong the rearme of his gouernment, or to graunt him a second Consulshippe: did now geue him oportunitie, suffering him to take the city of ROME, to say vnto Metellus the Tribune, & the rest, that they were all his prisoners. Sith therefore it is the chiefest point of an excellent Capitaine, to compell his enemies to fight when he findeth him selfe the stronger, and also to keepe him selfe from compulsion of fight when he is the weaker: Agesilavus excelling in that, did euer keepe him selfe inuincible. Cæsar also had great skill therein, to keepe him selfe from daunger being the weaker, and againe could tell howe to compell Pompey to hazard battell, to his vtter destruction by lande, where he was the weaker: and by this meanes he made him selfe Lorde of the treasure, vitells, and also of the sea, which his enemies had in their handes, without fighting. That which they alleage in his excuse, is that which most doth condemne him, specially for so great and skilfull a Capitaine. For as it is likely enough, that a young Generall of an armie may easily be brought from his wife and safe counsell, with rumor and tumult of a few fearefull men, that should perswade him it were a shame and dishonor for him if he did otherwise: yet were this no straunge matter, but a fault to be pardoned. But for Pompey the great, whose campe the ROMANES called their contrie, and his tent the Senate, and called all the Prators and Consuls that gouerned at ROME, rebells and traitors to the common wealth of ROME: who could excuse him (who was neuer scene commaunded by other then him selfe, but had bene alwayes chiefe Capitaine and Generall in any warre he made, and euer had the vpper hand) but that he was drawn on by the scoffes of Faonius, and Domitius, to hazard battell, to endanger the whole Empire and liberty of ROME, only for feare they should call him king Agamemnon? Who, if he had so much regarded present infamie, he should haue fought from the beginning for defense of the cite of ROME, and not to haue taken example of Themistocles policie by flying, and afterwards to thinke it a shame as he did, to lye in THE-

SALT

A SALIN a time without fighting. Neither did God appoint them the fieldes of Pharfalia for a Theater, or close campe, of necessitie to fight which of them should haue the Empire of ROME. Further, there was no Heralde to summon him to fight, as there are at games of price, where he must answer to his name, and come and fight, or else to loofe the honor of the crowne vnto another. But there were infinite other fieldes and townes (and as a man would say the whole earth) which the commoditie of his armie by sea gaue him choyse to conquer if he would rather haue followed the steppes of Fabius Maximus, of Marius, of Lucullus, or of Agesilavus him selfe: who did patiently abide no lesse tumultes within the cite selfe of SPARTA, when the THEBANS went to summon him to come out to fight, for all the rest of his contrie. And in ÆGYPT also, he did abide many false accusations against him, where with the king him selfe did burden him, praying him alwayes to haue a litle patience. In fine, hauing followed the best counsell which he had determined with him selfe from the beginning, he saued the ÆGYPTIANS against their willes: and furthermore, he did not only keepe the cite of SPARTA from so great a daunger, but did also set vp tokens of triumphe in the same against the THEBANS, whereby, he was not compelled at that time to lead them out to the slaughter, and besides that, gaue his citizens occasion to obtaine victorie afterwards. Hereupon Agesilavus was highly praised of them, whose liues he had saued against their willes. And Pompey contrarily was blamed by them felues, through whom he had offended: yet some say, that he was deceived by his father in law Scipio. For he meaning to keepe the most parte of the money to him selfe which he had brought out of ASIA, did hasten and perswade Pompey to geue battell, telling him that there was no money left. The which though it had bene true, a worthie Capitaine should not so lightly haue bene brought into error, vpon a false account, to hazard him selfe to loofe all. Thus may we see what both of them were, by comparing them together. Furthermore for their iorneyes into ÆGYPT, the one fled thither by force: the other willingly went thither with small honor, for moneys sake to serue the barbarous people, with intent afterwards to make warre with the GREGIANS.

Lastly, in that which we accuse the ÆGYPTIANS for Pompeys sake: for the like matter doe they againe accuse Agesilavus. For, the one was cruelly put to death, & betrayed by them whom he trusted: & Agesilavus forsooke them which trusted him, and went to the enemies, hauing brought aide to fight against them.

THE LIFE OF

Alexander the great.

Having determined in this volume to write the life of king Alexander, & of Iulius Caesar, that ouercame Pompey: hauing to speake of many things, I will vse none other preface, but only desire the readers not to blame me though I do not declare al things at large, but briefly touch diuers, chiefly in those their noblest acts & most worthy of memory. For they must remember, that my intent is not to write histories, but only liues. For, the noblest deedes doe not alwayes shew mens vertues and vices, but oftentimes a light occasion, a word, or some sporte makes mens naturall dispositions and maners appeare more plaine, then the famous battells wonne, wherein are slaine tenne thousande men, or the great armies, or cities wonne by siege or assault. For like as painters or drawers of pictures, which make no account of other partes of the bodie, do take the resemblaunces of the face and fauor of the countenance, in the which consisteth the iudgement of their maners & disposition: euen so they must geue vs leaue to seeke out the signes and tokens of the minde only, and thereby shewe the life of either of them, referring you vnto others to wryte the warres, battells, and other great things they did. It is certaine that Alexander was descended from Hercules by Carynus, and that of his mothers side, he came of the blood of the AEacides by Neoptolemus. They say also, that king Philip his father when he was a young man, fell in fancie with his mother Olympias, which at that time also was a young maiden, and an orphan without father or mother, in the Ile of SAMOTHRACIA, where they were both receiued into the misterie and fraternity of the house of the religious: and that afterwards, he did aske her in mariage of her brother Arymbas, with whose consent they were married together. The night before they lay in wedded bed, the bride dreamed, that lightning fell into her belly, and that withall, there was a great light fire that dispersed it selfe all about into diuers flames. King Philip her husband also, shortly after he was married, dreamed that he did seale his wiues belly, and that the seale wherewith he sealed, left behinde the printe of a Lyon. Certaine wifards and soothlayers, tolde Philip that this dreame gaue him warning to looke straightly to his wife. But Aristander TELMESIAN answered againe, that it signified his wife was conceiued with childe, for that they doe not seale a vessel that hath nothing in it: and that she was with childe with a boy, which shoulde haue a

A Lions hart. It is reported also, that many times as she lay a sleepe in her bed, there was seene a serpent lying by her, the which was the chiefe cause (as some presuppose) that Withdrew Philips loue and kindnes from her, and caused him that he lay not so oft with her, as before he was wont to doe: either for that he feared some charme or enchantment, or else for that he thought him selfe vnmeet for her company, supposing her to be beloued of some god. Some do also report this after an other sort: as in this maner. That the women in those parts of long time, haue bene commonly posselt with the spirite of Orpheus, and the diuine fury of Bacchus, whereupon they are called Clodones, & Mimallones (as much as warlike, & fierce) and doe many things like vnto the women of EDONIA, and THRACIA, dwelling about the mountaine Æmus. Hereby it appeareth, that this word Threskeuin (signifying in the Greeke tongue, too superstitiously geuen to the ceremonies of the gods) came from them. For Olympias aboute other womē, louing to be inspired with such diuine madnes & fury: did celebrate their solemne sacrifices with a certaine horrible & barbarous maner. For in these daunces to Bacchus, she carried a great number of tame snakes about her, the which gliding upon the lute wherewith the women were dressed in those ceremonies, & winding the selues about the lide iaulings they had in their hands, & the garlands about their heads: thereby they made men the more afraid of them. Whereupon Philip after this dreame, sent Ghoro MEGALOPOLITAN vnto the oracle of Apollo at DELPHES, to inquire what it signified. Answer was geuen him, that he should do sacrifice vnto Iupiter Hammon, & honor him aboue all gods: & that he had lost one of his eyes, with the which he peeping in at a crany of his chamber dore, saw the god in forme of a snake C ly by his wife. Furthermore, Olympias (as Erato Sthenes writeth) bidding her sonne farewell whē he went to conquer ASIA, after she had secretly tolde him alone, by whom he was begotten: she prayed him to be valliant, & to shew himselfe worthy his sonne, that begat him. Others tel also, that she was angry with this report, saying: will Alexander neuer leaue to make me suspected of Iuno? So it is, that Alexander was borne on the sixt day of the moneth of Hecatombæon, (in english, Iune) which the MACEDONIANS call Lous. On the very same day, the temple of Diana in the city of EPHESVS was burnt, as Hegeſias MAGNESIAN doth witness, whose crye & exclamation was so terrible & cold, that it was enough to haue quenched that fire. It is not to be wondered at, that Diana suffered her temple to be burnt, being like a midwife, busie about Alexanders birth. But this is true, that all the priests, magitians and soothlayers, which were at that time in EPHESVS, iudging that this did prognosticate some maruelous great misfortune to come, like men bestraught of their wits, they ran vp & downe the city, smiting of their faces, & crying that some great plague & mischief was borne that day vnto ASIA. Shortly after that king Philip had wonne the city of POTIDEA, three messengers came to him the same day that brought him great newes. The first, that Parmenio had wonne a notable battell of the ILYRIANS; the second, that his horse only wan the bell & price at the Olympian games; & the third, that his wife had brought him a sonne called Alexander. Philip being maruelous glad to heare these newes, the soothlayers did make his ioy yet greater: assuring him that his sonne which was borne with three victories all together, should be inuincible. Now for his stature & personage, the statues and images made of him by Lyſippus doe best declare it, for that he would be E drawn of no man but him only. Diuers of his successors & friends did afterwards counterfeate his image, but that excellent workman Lyſippus only, of all other the chiefeſt, hath perfectly drawn and resembled Alexanders maner of holding his necke, somewhat hanging downe towards the left side, & also the swete looke & cast of his eyes. But when Apelles painted Alexander, holding lightning in his hand, he did not shew his fresh colour, but made him somewhat blacke and swarther, then his face in deede was: for naturally he had a very fayre white colour; mingled al with red, which chiefly appeared in his face & in his breast. I remember I red also in the cōmentaries of Aristoxenus, that his skin had a maruelous good fauor, & that his breath was very swete, inſomuch that his body had so swete a smell of it selfe, that all the apparell he wore next vnto his body, tooke thereof a passing delightful fauor, as if it had bene perfumed. F And the cause hereof peraduenture might be, the very temperature & constitution of his body, which was hot and burning like fire. For Theophrastus is of opinion, that the swete fauor commeth by means of the heate that dryeth vp the moisture of the bodie. By which reason also it appeareth, that the drie & hot countries parched with heate of the sunne, are those that deliuer vnto vs the best spices: bicause that the sunne drieth vp the moylture of the outward parts, as a matter of corruption. This natural heate that Alexander had, made him (as it appeareth) to be giuen to drinke, & to be hasty. Euen from his childhood they saw that he was giuen to be chaff. For though otherwise he was very hot & hasty, yet was he hardly moued with lust or pleasure of the body, & would moderately vse it. But on thother side, the ambition & desire he had of honor, shewed a certaine graemes of minde & noble courage, passing his yeares. For he was not (as his father Philip) desirous of all kind of glory: who like a Rethoritian had a desire to vtter his eloquence, & stamped in his coynes, the victories he had wonne at the Olympian games, by the swift running of his horse & coches. For when he was asked one day (bicause he was swift of foote) whether he would assay to run for victory at the Olympian games: I could be content, said he, so I might run with kings. And yet to speake generally, he mistlied all such contention for games. For it seemeth that he vtterly mistlied all wrestling & other exercise for prife, where men did vse all their strength: but otherwise he him self made certen festiual daies & games of prife, for common stage plaiers, musitians, & singers, & for the very Poets also. He delighted also in hunting of diuers kinds of beastes, and playing at the staffe. Ambassadors being sent on a time from the king of PERSIA, whilst his father was in some iorney out of his realme: Alexander familiarly entertaining of them, so wan them with his courteous entertainment, (for that he vsed no childish questions vnto them, nor asked them trifling matters, but what distance it was from one place to an other, & which way they went into the high contries of ASIA, & of the king of PERSIA him self, how he was towards his enemies, & what power he had) that he did rauish them with delight to heare him, in so much that they made no more account of Philips eloquence & sharpe wit, in respect of his sonnes courage, & noble minde, nor attempt great enterprises. For when they brought him newes that his father had taken some famous city, or had won some great battell, he was nothing glad to heare it, but would say to his playfellows, sirs, my father will haue all, I shall haue nothing left me to conquer with you, that shalbe ought worth. For he delighting neither in pleasure nor riches, but only in valian-nes & honor, thought, that the greater conquests & realmes his father should leaue him, the lesse he should haue to do for himselfe. And therefore, seeing that his fathers dominions & Empire increased dayly more and more, perceiving all occasion taken from him to do any great attempt: he desired no riches nor pleasure, but warres & battells, & aspired to a signory where he might win honor. He had diuers men appointed him (as it is to be supposed) to bring him vp as schoolemasters, gouernors, & groomes of his chamber to attend vpon him: and among those, Leonides was the chiefeest man that had the gouernment & charge of him, a man of a euere disposition, & a kinsman also vnto the Queene Olympias. He mistlied to be called a master or tutor, though it be an office of good charge, wherupō the others called him Alexander gouernor, bicause he was a noble man, & allied to the Prince. But he that bare the name of his schoolemaster, was Lysimachus, an ACARNANIAN borne, who had no other manner of ciuility in him, sauing that he called him selfe Phoenix, Alexander Achilles, & Philip Peleus: & therefore he was well thought of, and was the seconde person next vnto Leonides. At what time Philonius the THESSALIAN had brought Eucelph the horse to sell vnto king Philip, asking thirteene talens, & they went into the field to ryde him. The horse was found so rough & churlish that the ryders said he would neuer do seruice, for he would let no man get vp on his backe, nor abide any of the gentlemen vses about king Philip, but would yerke out at them. Thereupon, Philip being affrayed, commaunded them to cary him away as a wild beast, & altogether vnprofitable the which they had done, had not Alexander that stood by said, O gods, what a horse do they turne away, for lacke of skil & hart to handle him. Philip heard what he said, but held his peace.

Alexander oft repeating his wordes, seeming to be fory that they should send backe the horse againe: why, said Philip, doest thou control them that haue more experience than thou, & that know better then thou how to handle a horse? Alexander answered, & yet me thinkes I should handle him better than all they haue done. But if thou canst not, no more the they, replied Philip: what wilt thou forset for thy folly? I am cōtent (y Alexander) to ieopard the price of the horse. euery man laughed to heare his aunswere: and the wager was layed betwene them. Then ran Alexander to the horse, and tooke him by the bridle: & turned him towards the sunne. It seemed that he had marked (as I suppose) how madde the horse was to see his owne shadow, which was euer before him in his eye, as he sturred to & fro. Then Alexander speaking gendly to the horse, and clapping him on the backe with his hand, till he had left his fury & snoring: softly let fall his cloke from him, and lightly leaping on his backe, got vp without any daunger, and holding the reines of the bridle hard, without striking or stirring the horse, made him to be gentle enough. Then when he sawe that the furie of the horse was past, and that he be-ganne to galloppe, he put him to his full career, and layed on spurres and voyce a good. Philip at the first with feare beholding his sonnes agility, least he should take some hurt, laid neuer a word: but when he saw him redly turne the horse at the end of his career, in a brauery for that he had done, all the lookers on gaue a shouete for ioy. The father on thother side (as they say) fell a weeping for ioy. And when Alexander was lighted from the horse, he sayd vnto him kissing his head: O sonne, thou must needs haue a realme that is meete for thee, for MACEDON will not hold thee. Furthermore, considering that of nature he was not to be won by extea-mity, & that by gentle meanes and perswasion he could make him do what he would: he euer sought rather to perswade then cōmaund him in any thing he had to do. Now Philip putting no great affaice in his schoolemasters of musicke & humanity, for the instruction & education of his sonne, whom he had appointed to teach him, but thinking rather that he needed men of greater learning than their capacities would reache vnto: and that as Sophocles sayth,

He needed many reynes, and many bits at once:

C Heseut for Aristotle (the greatest Philosopher in his time, & best learned) to teach his sonne, vnto whom he gaue honorable stipend. For Philip hauing won & takē before, the city of STAGYRA, where Aristotle was borne: for his sake he built it againe, & replenished it with inhabitants which fled away, or otherwise were in bondage. He appointed them for a schoole house and dwelling place, the pleasant house that is by the city of MISIA. In that place are yet seene seats of stone which Aristotle caused to be made, & clofe walks to walke in the shadow. It is thought also, that Alexander did not only learne of Aristotle, moral philosophy & humanity, but also he heard of him other more secret, hard, & graue doctrine, which Aristotles schollers do properly call Acroamata, or Epoptica, meaning things speculative, which requireth the masters teaching to vnderstand the, or els are kept from cōmon knowledge: which sciences, they did not cōmonly teach. Alexander being passed into ASIA, & hearing that Aristotle had put out certen bookes of that matter: for the honors sake of philosophy, he wrote a letter vnto him, somewhat too plaine, & of this effect. Alexander, vnto Aristotle greeting. Thou hast not done well to put forth the Acroamatical sciences. For wherin that we excell other, if those things which thou hast secretly taught vs, be made cōmon to all: I do thee to vnderstand, that I had rather excell other in excellency of knowledge, then in greatnes of power. Farewel. Wherunto Aristotle to pacifie this his ambitious humor, wrote vnto him againe, that these bookes were published, & not published. For to say truly, in al his treatises which be called μετὰ φυσικὰ there is no plain instruction profitable for any man, neither to picke out by himselfe, nor yet to be taught by any other, then Aristotle him selfe, or his schollers. So that it is written as a memorial for them that haue bene entred & brought vp in the Peripateticke sect & doctrine. It seemeth also, that it was Aristotle aboue all other, that made Alexander take delight to study phisick. For Alexander did not only like the knowledge of speculation, but would exercise practise also, & help his frends when they were sicke: & made besides certaine remedies, & rules to lue by: as appeareth by his letters he wrote, that of his owne nature he was much geue to his booke, & desired to read much. He learned also the Iliaides of Homer, of Aristotles correction, which they call μετὰ διορθου: the corrected, as hauing passed vnder the rule: & laid it euery night vnder his beds head with his dagger, calling it (as Onesivrates writeth) the institution of martiall discipline.
 And when he was in the high contries of ASIA, where he could not readily come by other bookes, he wrote vnto Harpalus to send them to him. Harpalus sent him the histories of Phili- stus, with diuers tragedies of Euripides, Sophocles, and Aeschylus: and certaine hymnes of Tel- lestus and Philoxenus. Alexander did reuerence Aristotle at the first, as his father, and so he teamed him: bicause from his natural father he had life, but from him, the knowledge to lue.

But afterwards he suspected him somewhat, yet he did him no hurt, neither was he so friendly to him as he had bene: whereby men perceived that he did not beare him the good will he was wont to doe. This notwithstanding, he left not that zeale and desire he had to the studie of Philosophie, which he had learned from his youth, and still continued with him. For he shewed diuers testimonies thereof. As, the honor he did vnto Anaxarchus the Philosopher. The fittie talentes which he sent vnto Xenocrates, Dandamis, and Calanus: of whom he made great account. When king Philip made warre with the BIZANTINES, Alexander being but sixteen years olde, was left his Lieutenaut in MACEDON, with the custodie and charge of his great feale: at what time he also subdued the MEDARIANS which had rebelled against him, and hauing wonne their citie by assault, he draue out the barbarous people, and made a Colonie of it of sundrie nations, and called it ALEXANDROPOLIS, to say, the citie of Alexander. He was with his father at the battell of CHERONEA against the GRECIANS, where it was reported, that it was he that gaue charge first of all upon the holie bande of the THEBANS. Furthermore, there was an old oke scene in my time, which the contry men commonly call Alexanders oke, because his tent or paullion was fastned to it: and not farre from thence is the channell house, where those MACEDONIANS were buried that were slaine at the battell. For these causes, his father Philip loued him very deere, and was glad to heare the MACEDONIANS call Alexander king, & him selfe their Captaine. Howbeit the troubles that fell out in his court afterwards, by reason of Philippes new mariages and loues, bred great quarrell and strife amongst the women: for the mischiefe of dissention & gealozy of women, doth separate the hartes of kings one from another, whereof was chiefest cause, the sharpenes of Olympias, who being a gealous woman, fretting, and of a reuenging minde, did incenle Alexander against his father. But the chiefest cause that prouoked Alexander, was Attalus at the marriage of Cleopatra, whom Philip married a maiden, falling in fancie with her when him selfe was past marriage. This was the matter: Attalus being vncle vnto this Cleopatra, fell droncke at the marriage, and hauing in his cuppes, he perswaded the MACEDONIANS that were at the feast, to pray to the goddess, that they might haue a lawfull heire of Philippe and Cleopatra, to succede him in the kingdome of MACEDON. Alexander being in a rage therewith threw a cuppe at his head, and sayd vnto him: why, traytor, what am I: dost thou take me for a bastard? Philip seeing that, rose from the board, and drew out his sword, but by good fortune for them both, being troubled with choller and wine, he fell downe on the grounde. Then Alexander mocking him, Joe, sayd he, to the MACEDONIANS, here is the man that prepared to go out of EVROPS into ASIA, and stepping onely from one bedde to another, ye see him layed alongest on the ground. After this great insolvency, he tooke his mother Olympias away with him, and carying her into his contrie of EPYRVS, he left her there, and him selfe afterwards went into ILLYRIA. In the meane time, Demetrius CORINTHIAN, a friend of king Philippes, and very familiar with him, came to see him. Philip when he had curteously welcommed him, asked him how the GRECIANS did agree together. Truly, O king, quod he, it importes you much to inquire of the agreement of the GRECIANS, when your owne court is so full of quarrell & contention. These words nipped Philip in such sorte, & caused him to know his fault, that through Demetrius meanes, whom he sent to perswade Alexander to returne, Alexander was made to come backe againe. Now when Pexodorus, a Prince of CARIA (desiring for necessities sake, to enter in league and friendship with Philip) offered his eldest daughter in marriage vnto Alexander king Philippes sonne, & had sent Aristocritus Ambassador into MACEDON for that purpose: the friends of Alexander & his mother, began againe to inuigile him with new reports and suspitions, how Philip by this great marriage would aduance Arideus to his vtter vndoing, and leaue him his heire in the kingdome. Alexander being nettled therewith sent one Thestalus a plaier of tragedies into CARIA to Pexodorus: to perswade him to leaue Arideus, that was a bastard & a foole: & rather to make alliance with Alexander. This offer pleased Pexodorus far better, to haue Alexander his sonne in law, than Arideus. Philip vnderstanding this, went himself into Alexanders chabert, taking Philotas with him (the sonne of Parmenion) one of his familiars, & bitterly tooke vp Alexander, telling him that he had a base mind, & was unworthy to be left his heire after his death, if he would cast himselfe away, marrying the daughter of a CARIAN, that was a slaue & subiect

A of a barbarous king. Therupon he wrote letters vnto CORINTH, that they should send Thestalus boild vnto him. And furthermore, he banished out of MACEDON, Harpalus, Nearchus, Phrygius, & Pholomy, his sonnes companions: whom Alexander afterwards called home againe, & placed them in great authority about him. Shortly after, Pausanias sustaining villany by the counsell and commaundement of Attalus & Cleopatra, crauing iustice of Philip, and finding no amends: he conuerted all his anger against him, and for hispight flue him him selfe. Of this murder, most men accused Quene Olympias, who (as it is reported) allured this young man, hauing iust cause of anger, to kill him. And Alexander also went not cleare from suspicion of this murder. For some say, that Pausanias after this villanie was done him, complained vnto Alexander, and told him how he had bene abused: who recited these verses to him of Euripides, in the tragedie of Medea, where she said in anger, that she would be reuenged:

Both of the bridegroome and the bride, And of the father in lawe.

Notwithstanding, afterwards he caused diligent searche to be made, and all them to be severely punished that were of the conspiracie: and was angrie also that his mother Olympias had cruelly slaine Cleopatra. So he came to be king of MACEDON at twenty yeares of age, and found his realme greatly enuyed & hated of dangerous enemies, and euery way full of danger. For, the barbarous nations that were neere neighbours vnto MACEDON, could not abide the bondage of straungers, but desired to haue their naturall kinges. Neither had Philip time enough to bridle and pacifie GREECE, which he had conquered by force of armes: but hauing Calide altered the gouernementes, had through his insolencie left them all in great trouble and ready to rebell, for that they had not long bene acquainted to obey. Therupon Alexanders counsell of MACEDON, being afraid of the troublesome time, were of opinion, that Alexander should vtterly forsake the affaires of GREECE, and not to follow them with extremitie, but that he should seeke to winne the barbarous people by gentle meanes, that had rebelled against him, and wisely to remedy these new sturres. But he farre otherwise determined to stablsh his safety by corage and magnanimitie: perswading him selfe, that if they saw him stowpe and yeld at the beginning, how litle so euer it were, euery one would be upon him. Therupon, he straight quenched all the rebellion of the barbarous people, inuading them sodainly with his armie, by the riuier of DANVBY, where in a great battell he ouerthrew Syrmus, king of the TRIBALLIANS. Furthermore, hauing intelligence that the THEBANS were reuolted, and that the ATHENIANS also were confederate with them: to make them know that he was a man, he marched with his armie towards the streight of Thermopiles, saying that he would make Demosthenes the Orator see (who in his oratiōs, whilest he was in ILLYRIA, & in the contry of the TRIBALLIANS, called him child) that he was grown a stripling passing through THESSALY, & should finde him a man before the walles of ATHENS. When he came with his armie vnto the gates of THEBES, he was willing to geue them of the citie occasion to repent them: and therefore onely demanded Phanix and Prothytes, authors of the rebellion. Furthermore, he proclaimed by trompet, pardon and safetie vnto all them that would yeld vnto him. The THEBANS on thother side, demanded of him Philotas, & Antipater, two of his chiefest seruantes, & made the crier proclaime in the citie, that all such as would defend the libertie of GREECE, should ioyne with them. Then did Alexander leaue the MACEDONIANS at libertie to make warre with all crueltie. Then the THEBANS fought with greater corage and desire then they were able, considering that their enemies were many against one. And on thother side also, when the garrison of the MACEDONIANS which were within the castell of CADMIA, made a fallie vpon them, and gaue them charge in the reterward: then they being enuironned of all sides, were slaine in manner euery one of them, their citie taken, destroyed, & raised euen to the hard ground. This he did, specially to make all the rest of the people of GREECE afraid by example of this great calamitie and miserie of the THEBANS, to thend none of them should dare from thenceforth once to rise against him. He would cloke this crueltie of his vnder the complaints of his confederates, the PHOCIANS and PLATYBIANS: who complaining to him of the injuries the THEBANS had offered, could not denie them iustice. Now amongft the other miferies & calamities of the poore citie of T H E B E S, there were certaine T H R A C I A N fouldiers, who hauing fpoyled and defaced the houfe of Timoclea, a vertuous ladie and of noble parentage, they deuided her goods among them: and their captaine hauing rauifhed her by force, asked her, whether ſhe had any where hidden any gold or filuer. The ladie told him, he had. Then leading him into her garden, ſhe brought him vnto a well: where ſhe ſaid he had caft all her iuells and precious things, when ſhe heard the citie was taken. The barbarous T H R A C I A N ſtooped to looke into the well: the ſtanding behind him, thruſt him in, and then threw ſtones enow on him, & fo killed him. The fouldiers when they knew it, tooke and bound her, & fo caried her vnto Alexander. When Alexander ſaw her countenance, & marked her gate: he ſuppoſed her at the firſt to be ſome great lady, ſhe followed the fouldiers with ſuch a maieltie & boldnes. Alexander the asking her what ſhe was: ſhe answered, that ſhe was the ſiſter of Theagenes, who fought a battell with king Philip before the citie of C H E R O N E A, where being generall he was ſlaine, valiantly fighting for the defence of the libertie of G R E E C E. Alexander wondering at her noble anſwere and couragious dede, commaunded no man ſhould touche her nor her children, & fo freely let her goe whether ſhe would. He made league alſo with the A T H E N I A N S, though they were very ſorry for their miſerable fortune. For the day of the ſolemne feaſt of their miſeries being come, they left it off, mourning for the T H E B A N S: courteouſly entreteining all thoſe, that flying from C T H E B E S came to them for ſuccour. But whether it was for that his anger was paſt him, following therein the nature of Lyons: or bycauſe that after ſo great an example of cruelty, he would ſhew a ſingular clemency againe: he did not only pardon the A T H E N I A N S of all faultes committed, but did alſo counſell them to looke wifely to their doings, for their citie one daie ſhould commaund all G R E E C E, if he chaunced to die. Men report, that certenly he oftentimes repented him that he had delt ſo cruelly with the T H E B A N S, and the grieſe he tooke upon it was cauſe that he afterwards ſhewed him ſelfe more mercifull vnto diuers others. Afterwards alſo he did blame the furie of Bacchus, who to be reuenged of him, made him kill Clitus at the table being droncke, and the M A C E D O N I A N S alſo to reſuſe him to goe any further to conquer the I N D I A N S, which was an impfection of his enterpriſe, and a miniſhing alſo of D his honor. Befides, there was neuer T H E B A N afterwards, that had eſcaped the furie of his victorie, and did make any petition to him, but he had his fute. Thus was the ſtate of T H E B E S as you haue heard. Then the G R E C I A N S hauing aſſembled a generall counſell of all the ſtates of G R E E C E within the ſtraights of Peloponneſus: there it was determined that they would make warre with the P E R S I A N S. Whereupon they choſe Alexander generall for all G R E E C E. Then diuers men coming to viſite Alexander, aſwell philoſophers, as gouernours of ſtates, to congratulate with him for his electiõ, he looked that Diogenes Simopian (who dwelt at C O R I N T H) would likewiſe come as the reſt had done: but when he ſaw he made no reckoning of him, and that he kept ſtill in the ſuburbes of C O R I N T H, at a place called C R A N I V M, he went him ſelfe vnto him, and found him layed all along in the ſunne. When Diogenes ſaw ſo many coming E towards him, he ſate vp a litle, and looked full upon Alexander. Alexander courteouſly ſpake vnto him, and asked him, if he lacked any thing. Yea ſaid he, that I do: that thou ſtand out of my ſunne a litle. Alexander was ſo well pleaſed with this anſwere, and maruelled ſo much at the great boldnes of this man, to ſe how ſmall account he made of him: that when he went his way from him, Alexanders familiars laughing at Diogenes, & mocking him, he told them: maſters ſay what you liſt, truly if I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes. Alexander being deſirous to heare what the oracle of Apollo Delphian would ſay vnto him touching the ſucceſſe of his iorney into A S I A: he went vnto the citie of D E L P H E S. It chaunced ſo, that he came thither in the dayes which they call vnfortunate, on which dayes no man vſed to aſke Apollo any thing. This notwithstanding, he ſent firſt vnto the Nunne which pronounced the oracles, F to pray her to come to him. But the reſufed to come, alleaging the cuſtome which forbade her to goe. before he had geuen vnto some landes, and vnto other a towne, and to others againe, the cus-tome of some haen. Thus by his bountie hauing in manner spent almost the reuenues of the crown of MACEDON, Perdiccas asked him: my Lord, what will you keepe for your selfe? hope, sayd he. Then, o Perdiccas againe, we will also haue some parte, since we goe with you: and so refused the reuenue which the king had geuen him for his pencion. Many others did also the like. But such as were contented to take his liberaltie, or would aske him any thing, he gaue them very frankly, and in such liberaltie spent all the reuenue he had. With this defier & determination, he went on to the fraight of HELLESPONT, & going to the cite of ILLYM, he did sacrifice vnto Diana, and made funerall effusions vnto the demy goddess (to wit, vnto the princes which died in the warre of TROYA, whose bodies where buried there) and specially vnto Achilles, whose graue he annotated with oyle, and ranne naked round about it with his familiers, according to the ancient custome of funerals. Then he couered it with nosegayes and flowers, saying, that Achilles was happy, who while he liued had a faithfull frend, and after his death an excellent herauld to singe his praise. When he had done, & went vp and downe the cite to see all the monuments and notable things there: one asked him, if he would fee Paris harpe. He answered againe, he would very faine fee Achilles harpe, who played & sung apon it all the famous actes done by valliant men in former times. In the meane time, Darius king of PERSSIA, hauing leauied a great armie, sent his capitaines and leutenants to tary Alexander at the riuer of GRANICVS. There was Alexander to fight of necessity, being the onely barre to stoppe his entrie into ASIA. Moreover, the capitaines of his counsell about him, were afraid of the depth of this riuer, and of the height of the bancke on thother side, which was ve-rie high and steepe, & could not be wonne without fighting. And some said also, that he should haue speciall care of the ancient regard of the moneth: by cause the kings of MACEDON did neuer vie to put their armie into the field in the moneth of Dafon, which is Iunie. For that, said Alexander, we will remedy foone: let them call it the second moneth, Artemisium, which is Maye. Furthermore Parmenis was of opinion, that he should not medle the first day, by cause it was very late. Alexander made answer againe, that HELLESPONT would blush for shame, if he were now afraid to passe ouer the riuer, since he had already commien ouer an arme of the sea. Therupon he him selfe first entred the riuer with thirtie guidons of horsemen, and marched forwardes against an infinite number of arrowes which the enemies shot at him; as he was comming vp the other bancke, which was very high and steepe, and worst of all, full of armed men and horsemen of the enemies: which stayed to receiue him in battell raye, thrusting his men downe into the riuer, which was very deepe, and ranne fo swift, that it almost caried them downe the streame: in fomuch that men thought him more rash than wife, to leade his men with such daunger. This notwithstanding, he was so wilfully bent that he would needes ouer, & in thend with great a doo recovered the other side, specially by cause the earth slidde away by reason of the mudd. So when he was ouer, he was driuen to fight belme on upon another, because his enemies did set vpon the first that were passed ouer, before they could put them selues into battell raze, with great cries, keeping their horses very close together, and fought first with their darts, and afterwards came to the sword when their darts were broken. Then many of them set vpon him alone, for he was easily to be knowne about the rest by his shield & the hinder part of his helmet, about the which there hong from thone side to thother, a maruelous faire white plume. Alexander had a blow with a dart on his thigh, but it hurt him not. Thereupon Rofaces & Spithridates, both two chiefe captaynes of the PERSIANS, setting upon Alexander at once, he left the one, and riding straight to Rofaces, who was excellently armed, he gaue him such a blow with his lance, that he brake it in his hand, and straight drew out his sword. But so soone as they two had closed together, Spithridates coming at toe side of him, raised him selfe vpon his stirrappes and gaue Alexander with all his might such a blow of his head with a battell axe, that he cut the creast of his helmet, and one of the sides of his plume, and made such a gash, that the edge of his battell axe touched the very heare of his head. And as he was lifting vp his hand to strike Alexander againe, great Climus preuenting him, thrust him through with a partisan, and at the very same instant, Rofaces also fell dead from his horse with a wound which Alexander gaue him with his sword. Now whilest the horsemen fought with such furie, the squadron of the battell of footemen of the MACEDONIANS had passed the riuier, and both the battells beganne to march one against the other. The PERSIANS slucke not manfully to it any long time, but straight turned their backs and fled, sauing the GRACIANS which tooke paie of king Darius: they drew together vpon a hill, and craued mercy of Alexander. But Alexander setting vpon them, more of will then discretion, had his horse killed vnder him, being thrust through the flankes with a sword. This was not Bucephalus, but an other horse he had. All his men that were slaine or hurt at this battell, were hurte amongst them valiantly fighting against desperate men. It is reported that there were slaine at this first battell, twenty thousand footemen of these barbarous people, & two thousand five hundred horsemen. Of Alexanders side, Aristobolus writeth, that there were slaine foure and thirty men in all, of the which, twelue of them were footemen. Alexander to honor their vallianties, caused euery one of their images to be made in bras by Lysippus. And because he would make the GRACIANS partakers of this victorie, he sent vnto the ATHENIANS three hundred of their targettes, which he had wonne at the battell, and generally vpon all the other spoiles, he put this honorable inscription. Alexander the sonne of Philip, and the D Gracians, excepting the Lacedemonians, haue vronne this spoile upon the barbarous Asians. As for plate of gold or siluer, also purple sikkes, or other such precious ware which he gat amongst the PERSIANS: he sent them all vnto his mother, a few except. This first victorie of Alexander, brought such a sodaine change amongst the barbarous people in Alexanders behalfe, that the cite selfe of SARDIS, the chiefe cite of the Empire of the barbarous people, or at the least through all the lowe contries and coastes upon the sea, they yeelded straight vnto him, sauing the cities of HALICARNASSVS and MILETVM, which did still resist him: howbeit at length he tooke the by force. When he had also conquered all thereabouts, he stood in doubt afterwards what he were best to determine. Sometime he had a maruelous desire, wholly to follow Darius wherefoeuer he were, and to venter all at a battell. An other time againe, he thought it better first to occupy him selfe in conquering of these lowe contries, & to make him selfe strong with the money and riches he should finde among them, that he might afterwards be the better able to follow him. In the contrie of LYDIA neere vnto the cite XANTHVM, they lay there is a springe that brake of it selfe, and ouerflowing the bankes about it, cast out a little table of copper from the bottome, vpon the which were graued certen carrectes in olde letters, which said: that the kingdom of the PERSIANS should be destroyed by the GRACIANS. This did further so encourage Alexander, that he made haft to cleere all the sea coast, euen as farre as CILICIA and PHOENICIA. But the wonderfull good successe he had, runninge alongest all the coast of PAMPHILIA, gaue diuers historiographers occasion to set forth his doings with admiration, saying that it was one of the wonders of the worlde, that the furies of the sea, which vnto all other was extreame rough, and many times would swell ouer the toppes of the high rocks vpon the cliffes, fell calme vnto him. And it appeareth that Ma-

Alexanders victory of the Persians at Granicum.

Alexander him selfe in a comedie of his doth witnesse this wonderfull happyness of Alexander, when merily he sayeth:

O great Alexander, how great is thy state?
For thou with thy selfe mayst thus iustly debate.
If any man lying I list for too call,
He commeth and humbly before me doth fall.
And if through the sources my iorney doe lye, The waves giue me vna, and the Sea becomes drye.

Yet Alexander him selfe simply writeth in his epistles (without any great wonder) that by sea he passed a place called the ladder, and that to passe thence, he tooke shippe in the cite of PHASELIDIS. There he remained many dayes, and when he saw the image of Theodestes PHASELITAN, standing in the market place: he went in a daunce thither one euening after supper, and cast flowers and garlandes upon his image, honoring the memorie of the dead, though it seemed but in sport, for that he was his companion when he lyued, by means of Aristotle and his philosophie. After that he ouercame also the PERSIANS, who thought to haue resisted him, and conquered all PHRYGIA besides. There in the cite of GORDIVS, which is said to be the ancient seate of king Midus: he saw the charret that is so much spok of, which is bound with the bark of a cornell tree, and it was told him for a trothe, of the barbarous people, that they beleued it as a prophie: that whosoever could vndoe the bande of that bark, was certainly ordeyned to be king of all the world. It is commonly reported, that Alexander prouing one vnto that bande, and finding no endes to vndoe it by, they were so many folde wreathed one within the other: he drew out his sword, and cut the knot in the midst. So that then many endes appeared. But Aristobolus writeth, that he had quickly vndone the knot by taking the bolt out of the axtree, which holdeth the beame and body of the charret and so seuered them a fonder. Departing thence, he conquered the PAPLAGONIANS & CAPPADOCIANS, and vnderstood of the death of Memnon, that was Darius generall of his army by Sea, and in whom was all their hope to trouble and withstand Alexander: whereupon he was the bolder to goe on with his determination to leade his army into the high contries of ASIA. Then did king Darius him selfe come against Alexander, hauing leaued a great power at SUSA, of six hundred thousand fighting men, trusting to that multitude, and also to a dreame, the which his wifards had expounded rather to flatter him, then to tell him truly. Darius dreamed that he saw all the armie of the MACEDONIANS on a fire, and Alexander seruing of him in the selfe same attier that he him selfe wore when he was one of the chamber vnto the late king his predecessor: and that when he came into the temple of Belus, he sodainly vanished from him. By this dreame it plainly appeared, that the gods did signifie vnto him, that the MACEDONIANS should haue noble successe in their doings, & that Alexander should conquer all ASIA, euen as king Darius had done, when he was but Agandes vnto the king: and that shortly after, he should end his life with great honor. This furthermore made him bolde also, when he saw that Alexander remained a good while in CILICIA, supposing it had bene for that he was afraid of him. Howbeit it was by reason of a sicknes he had, the which some say he got, by extreme paines and trauell, & others also, because he washed him selfe in the riuier of Cydus, which was cold as life. Howfoeuer it came, there was none of the other phisicians that durst vndertake to cure him, thinking his disease vncurable, and no medicines to preuaile that they could giue him, and fearing also that the MACEDONIANS would laie it to their charge, if Alexander miscaried. But Philip ACARNANIAN, considering his master was very ill, and bearing him selfe of his loue and good will towards him, thought he should not doe that became him, if he did not proue (seeing him in extremitie and danger of life) the utmost remedies of phisicke, what daunger so euer he put him selfe into: and therefore tooke vpon him to minister phisicke vnto Alexander, and perswaded him to drinke it boldly if he would quickly be whole, & goe to the warres. In the meane time, Parmenio wrote him a letter from the campe, aduertising him, that he should beware of Philip his phisitian, for he was bribed and corrupted by Darius, with large promises of great riches, that he would geue him with his daughter in mariage, to kill his master. Alexander when he had redde this letter, layed it vnder his beddes head, and made none of his neereft familiars acquainted therewith. When the howe came that he should take his medicine, Philip came into his chamber with other of the kings familiars, & brought a cup in his hand with the pocion he should drinke. Alexander then gaue him the letter, & withall, cheerefully tooke the cup of him, shewing no manner of feare or mistrust of any thing. It was a wonderfull thing and worth the fight, how one reading the letter, and thother drinking the medicine both at one instant, they looked one upon another, howbeit not both with like cheerefull countenance. For Alexander looked merily upon him, plainly shewing the trust he had in his phisician Philip, and how much he loued him: and the phisician alfo beheld Alexander, like a man perplexed & amazed, to be so fallily accused, & straight lift vp his handes to heauen, calling the goddes to witnesse that he was innocent, and then came to Alexanders bed side, and prayed him to be of good cheere, and boldly to doe as he would aduise him. The medicine beginning to worke, ouercame the diseafe, and draue for the time, to the lowest partes of his body, all his natural strength and powers: in fomuch as his speach failed him, and he fell into such a weaknes, and almost swooning, that his pulse did scarce beate, and his senses were welneere taken from him. But that being past, Philip in few dayes recovered him againe. Now, when Alexander had gotten some strength, he shewed him selfe openly vnto the Macedonians: for they would not be pacified, nor perswaded of his health, vntill they had seene him. In king Darius campe, there was one Amyntas a Macedonian, & banisht out of his contrie, who knew Alexanders disposition very well. He finding that Darius ment to meete with Alexander within the straights and vallies of the mountaines: besought him to tarie rather where he was, being a plaine open contrie round about him, considering that he had a great hoste of men to fight with a few enemies, and that it was most for his aduantage to meete with him in the open field. Darius answered him againe, that he was afraid of nothing but that he would flie, before he could come to him. Amyntas replied, for that, O king, I prae you feare not: for I warrant you upon my life he will come to you, yea and is now on wards on his way comming towards you. All these perswasions of Amyntas could not turne Darius from making his campe to marche towards Cilicia. At the selfe same time also, Alexander went towards Syria to meete with him. But it chaunced one night, that the one of them missed of the other, and when day was come, they both returned backe againe: Alexander being glad of this happe, & making hast to meete with his enemy within the straights. Darius also seeking to winne Alexanders lodging from whence he came, and to bring his army out of the straites: beganne then to find the fault & error committed, for that he had shut him selfe vp in the straights, (holden in on the one side with the mountaine, and on the other with the Sea, and the riuer of Pindarus that ranne betwene both) and that he was driuen to disperse his armie into diuers companies, in a stonie and ill fauored contrie, ill for horsemen to trauell, being on the contrarie side a great aduantage for his enemies, which were excellent good footemen, and but few in number. But now, as fortune gaue Alexander the field as he would wite it to fight for his aduantage: so could he tell excellently well how to set his men in battell raye to winne the victorie. For albeit that Alexander had the lesse number by many then his enemy, yet he had such policy and cast with him, that he foresaw all, and would not be entronned: For he did put out the right winge of his battell a great deale further, then he did his left winge, and fighting him selfe in the left winge in the foremost ranckes, he made all the barbarous people flie that stood before him: howbeit, he was hurt on his thighe with a blow of a sword. Chares writeth, that Darius selfe did hurte him, and that they fought together man to man. Notwithstanding Alexander selfe writing of this battell vnto Antipater sayeth, that in deede he was hurte on the thighe with a sword, howbeit it did put him in no danger: but he writeth not that Darius did hurte him. Thus hauing wonne a famous victory, and slaine about a hundred and tenne thousand of his enemies, he could not yet take Darius, bycause he fled, hauing still foure or fure forlonges vantage before him: howbeit he tooke his charriot of battell wherein he fought, and his bow also. Then he returned from the chafe, & found the Macedonians sacking & spoiling all the rest of the campe of the barbarous people, where there was infinite riches (although they had left the most parte of their cariage behind them in the cite of Damas, to come lighter to the battell) but yet referred for him selfe all king Darius tent,

A tent, which was full of a great number of officers, of riche moueables, and of gold and siluer. So, when he was come to the campe, putting of his armor, he entred into the bathie and sayed: come on, lette vs goe and walthe of the sweate of the battell in Darius owne bathie. Naye, replied one of his familiars againe, in Alexanders bathie: for the gooddes of the vanquished are rightly the vanquishers. When he came into the bathie, and sawe the basons and yewers, the boxes, and vyolles for perfumes, all of cleane gold, excellently wrought, all the chamber perfumed passing sweetely, that it was like a parradise: then going out of his bathie, and comming into his tent, seeing it so stately and large, his bedde, the table, and supper, and all ready in such sumptuous sort, that it was wonderfull, he turned him vnto his familiars and said: this was a king in deede, was he not thinke ye? As he was ready to goe to his supper, and was brought him, that they were bringing vnto him amongst other Ladies taken prisoners, king Darius mother and his wife, and two of his daughters vnmarrid: who hauing seene his chariot and bowe, burst out into lamentable cries, and violent beating of their selues thinking Darius had bene slaine. Alexander pawed a good while and gaue no aunswere, pitying more their misfortune, then reioycing at his owne goodhappe. Then he presently sent one Leontatus vnto them, to let them vnderstand, that Darius was a hue, and that they should not neede to be afraid of Alexander, for he did not fight with Darius, but for his kingdome only: and as for them, that they should haue at his handes all that they had of Darius before, when he had his whole kingdome in his handes. As these wordes pleased the captiue Ladies, so the deedes that followed, made them finde his clemencie to be no lesse. For first he suffered them to burie as many of the Persian Lordes as they would, euen of them that had bene slaine in the battell, and to take as much filkes of the spoiles, iuelles, and ornaments, as they thought good to honor their funerall with: & also did lessen no parte of their honor, nor of the number of their officers and seruantes, nor of any iorte of their estate which they had before, but did allowe them also greater pencions, then they had before. But about all, the princelyest grace, and most noble fauor that Alexander shewed vnto these captiue princesses, which had alwayes liued in honorable fame and chastitie, was this: That they neuer heard worde, or so much as any suspicion that should make them afraied to be dishonored or deflowred: but were priuately among them selues vniuisited or repayed vnto by any man, but of their owne, not as if they had bene in a campe of their enemies, but as if they had bene kept in some close Monasterie: although Darius wife (as it is written) was passing faire, as Darius also was a goodly prince, and that his daughters likewise did resemble their father and mother. Alexander thinking it more princely for a kinge, as I suppose to conquer him selfe, then to ouercome his enemies: did neither touche them nor any other, maide or wife, before he married them, Barsine onely excepted, who being left Memmons widow (generall of kinge Darius by sea) was taken by the cite of Damas. She being excellently well learned in the Greeke tongue, and of good entertainment (being the daughter of Artabazus, who came of a kinges daughter) Alexander was bolde with her by Parmenios procurement, (as Aristobolus writeth) who intised him to embrace the companie of so excellent a woman, and passing faire besides. Furthermore, beholding the other Persian Ladies besides which were prisoners, what goodly faire women they weré: he spake it pleasauntly, that the Ladies of Persia made mens eyes sore to behold them. Notwithstanding, preferring the beaute of his continencie, before their sweete faire faces: he passed by without any sparke of affection towards them, more then if they had bene images of stone without life. To confirme this, Philoxenus whom he had left his lieutenaunt in the lowe contries upon the sea coast, wrote vnto him on a time, that one Theodorus a marchaunt of Tarentum, had to sell two goodly young boies, maruelous faire: and therefore that he sent vnto him to knowe his pleasure, if he would bye them. Therewith he was so offended, that many times he cried out alowde: O, my frendes, what villany hath euer Philoxenus scene in me, that he should deuise (hauing nothing to doe there) to purchase me such infamie? whereupon he wrote vnto him from the campe, with reprochfull wordes, that he should send that vile Tarentin marchaunt Theodorus and his marchaundise to the Deuill. He sharply punished also one Agnon, that wrote vnto him he would bye a young boye called Grobylus (who for beautie bore the onely, name in CORINTHES, and bring him to him. Another time also, when he heard that Darius and Timotheus MACEDONIANS, vnder Parmenioes charge, had deflowered two of the fouldiers wiues that were strangers, and waged of him: he wrote vnto Parmenio to looke vnto it, and to examine the matter. And if he found them giltye of the rape, that then he should put them both to death, as brute beastes borne to destroie mankind. And in that letter he wrote thus of him selfe. For my selfe, said he, I haue neither seene, nor desired to see Darius wife: neither haue I suffred any speach of her beawtie before me. Moreouer he said, that he did vnderstand that he was mortall by these two thinges: to wit, sleepe, and lust: for, from the weakenes of our nature proceedeth sleepe and sensualitye. He was also no greedy gutte, but temperate in eating, as he shewed by many proofes: but chiefly in that he saide vnto the princeesse Ada, whom he adopted for his mother, and made her Queene of CARTA. For when (for the loue she bare him) she daily sent him sundrie delicate dishes of meate, tartes, and marchpaines, and besides the meate it selfe, the pastlers and cookes to make them, which were excellent workemen: he answered that he could not tell what to doe with them, for he had better cookes than those appointed him by his gouernour Leonidas, to witte: for his diner, to rise before daye; and to marche by night: and for his supper, to cate litle at diner. And my gouernour, said he, would oftentimes open the chestres where my bedding and apparell lay, to see if my mother had put any fine knacks or conceits among them. Furthermore, he was lesse geuen to wine, then men would haue iudged. For he was thought to be a greater bibber than he was, by cause he fate longe at the bourde, rather to talke then drinke. For euer when he dranke, he would propound some tedious matter, and yet but when he was at leysure. For hauing matters to doe, there was neither feaste, bancket, plaie, marriage, nor any pastime that could staie him: as they had done other captaynes. The which appeareth plainly by the shortenes of his life, and by the wonderfull and notable deedes he did, in that litle time he liued. When he had leysure, after he was vp in the morning, first of all he would doe sacrifice to the goddes, and then would goe to diner, passing awaie all the rest of the daye, in hunting, writing some thinge, taking vp some quarrell betwene fouldiers, or els in studying. If he went any iourney of no hastie busines, he would exercise him selfe by the waie as he went, shooting in his bowe, or learning to get vp or out of his charre sodenly, as it ranne. Oftentimes also for his pastime he would hunte the foxe, or ketch birds, as appeareth in his booke of remembraunces for euery daie. Then when he came to his lodging, he would enter into his bath, and rubbe and nointe him selfe: and would aske his pantelers and caruers if his supper were ready. He would euer suppleare, and was very curious to see, that euery man at his bourde was a like serued, and would sit longe at the table, by cause he euer loued to talke, as we haue told you before. Otherwise he was as noble a prince and gracious to waite apon, and as pleasaunt, as any king that euer was. For he lacked no grace nor comelines to adorne a prince, sauing that he would be somethinge ouerbusse in glorying in his owne deedes, much like vnto a bragging fouldier: neither was he contented him selfe to please his owne humour that waie, but would also suffer his familiars to loothe him euen to his teeth. And this was many times the destruction of honest men about him, the which would neither praise him in his presence, hating the flatterers, nor yet durst saye lesse of the praises which they gaue him. For of the first they were ashamed, and by the second they fell in daunger. After supper, he would washe him selfe againe, and sleepe vntill noone the next daye following, and oftentimes all daye longe. For him selfe, he was nothing curious of dainty dishes: for when any did send him rare frutes, or fishe, from the countries neere the sea side, he would fend them abroad vnto his frendes, and seldom kepe any thinge for him selfe. His table notwithstanding was alwayes very honorably serued, and did still increase his fare, as he did enlarge his conquestes: till it came to the summe of tenne thousand drachmas a daye. But there he stayed, and would not excede that summe, and moreouer commaunded all men that would feast him, that they should not spend about that summe. After this battell of ISSVS, he sent vnto the cite of DAMAS, to take all the gold and siluer, the cariage, and all the women and children of the PERSIANS which were left there, where the men of armes of the THESSALIANS spedde them full well. As did he fend them thither, by cause he sawe that they had fought valliantly at the daye of the battell: and so were the reite of his armie also well stored with money. There the MACEDONIANS hauing tasted first of the golde, siluer, women, and barbarous life: as dogges by cent doe follow the tracke of beastes, euen so were they greedy to follow after the goodes of the PERSIANS. First Alexander thought it best to winne all the sea coaste. Thether came the kinges of CYPRVS, and PHOENICIA, and deliuered vp to him the whole lland & all PHOENICIA, sauing onely the cite of TYRE. That cite he besieged seuen moneths together by lande, with great bulwarkes and diuers engines of batterie, and by sea, with two hundred gallies. During this sege, Alexander dreamed one night, that Hercules held out his hand vnto him ouer the walles of the cite, and called him by his name: and there were diuers TYRIANS also that dreamed in likewise, that Apollo told them that he would goe vnto Alexander, by cause he was not pleased with their doings in the cite. Thereupon they bound his image, (which was of a wonderfull bignes) with grat chaines, and nailed him downe fast to the base, as if he had bene a traitour that would haue yielded him selfe vnto their enemies, and called him Alexandrine, as much as fauouring Alexander. Alexander had there also another dreame. For he dreamed that he sawe a Satyre a farre of sporting with him, and when he thought to haue commen neere to haue taken him, he still escaped from him: vntill at the length, after he had runne a good while after him, and intreated him, he fell into his handes. The footesayers being asked what this dreame should signifie, answered probably, by deuiding Satyrs into two, and then it is Σατυρ: which signifieth, the cite of TYRE shalbe thine. And they doo yet shew vnto this daie, the fontaine where Alexander thought he sawe the Satyre. Continuing this sege, he went to make warre with the ARABIANS, that dwell apon the mountaine Antiliban, where he was in great daunger of being cast away, onely by cause he heard his tutor Lysimachus that followed him, saye boldly, that he was not inferior, nor older than the Phoenix. For when they came at the foote of the mountaine, they left their horses, and went vp a foote: and Alexander was of so courteous a nature, that he would not leaue his tutor Lysimachus behind him (who was so very that he could goe no further) but by cause it was darke night, & for that the enemies were not farre from them, he came behind to encourage his tutor, and in maner to carie him. By this meanes, vnwares, he was farre from his armie with very few men about him, and benighted besides: moreouer it was very colde, and the waie was very ill. At the length, perceyuing diuers fire: which the enemies had made, some in one place, and some in another, trusting to his valliantnes, hauing alwayes provided remedie in extremitie, when the MACEDONIANS were distressed, him selfe euer putting to his owne hand: he ranne vnto them that had made the fires next him, and killing two of the barbarous people that laye by the fire side, he snatched awaye a fire brand, and ranne with it to his owne men, who made a great fire. At this the barbarous people were so afraid, that they ranne their waye as fast as they could. Other also thinking to come and sette vpon him, he flue them euery man, and so laye there that night, him selfe and his men without daunger. Thus Chares reporteth this matter. Now for the sege of TYRE, that fell out thus. Alexander caused the most parte of his armie to take rest, being ouerharried: and wearyed with so many battelles as they had fought: and sent a few of his men onely to geue assault vnto the cite, to kepe the TYRIANS occupied, that they should take no rest. One daye the footeslayer Aristander sacrificing vnto the goddes, hauing considered of the signes of the intralles of the beastes: did assure them that were present, that the cite should be taken by the later ende of the moneth. Euery bodie laughed to heare him: for that daye was the very last daye of the moneth. Alexander seeing him amated, as one that could not tell what to saie to it, seeking euer to bringe those tokens to effect, which the footeslayers did prognosticate: commaunded them that they should not reckon that daye the thirde day, but the seuen and twentie, and immediatly vpon it, made the trompet sounde the allarme, & geue a hotter assault to the walles, then he had thought to haue done before. They fought valliantly on both sides, in so much as they that were left in the campe, could not kepe in, but must needs runne to thassaile to helpe their companions. The TYRIANS seeing thassaile so hot on euery side, their hartes began to faile them, and by this meanes was the cite taken the selfe same day.

An other time also, when Alexander was before GAZA, the chiefe citie of SYRIA, there fell a clodde of earth vpon his shoulder, out of the which there flew a bird into the ayer. The bird lightinge apon one of the engines of his battrie, was caught with the nettes made of finewes which couered ouer the ropes of the engines. Aristander did prognosticate, that it signified he should be hurt in his shoulder, notwithstanding that he should yet take the towne. And in deede so it came to passe. When he sent great presentes of spoiles which he wanne at the sacke of this citie, vnto his mother Olympias, Cleopatra, and diuers others of his frendes among other thinges, he sent vnto Leonidas his gouernour, five hundred talentes waight of frankensence, and a hundred talentes waight of myrrer: remembering the hope he put him in to when he was a childe. For, as Alexander was vpon a daye sacrificyng vnto the goddes, he tooke both his handes full of frankensence to cast into the fire, to make a perfume thereof. When his gouernour Leonidas saw him, he said thus vnto him: When thou hast conquered the contrie where these sweete thinges grow, then beliberal of thy perfume: but now, spare that litle thou hast at this present. Alexander calling to minde at that time his admonition, wrote vnto him in this sorte: we do send thee plenty of frankensence & myrrer, because thou shouldest no more be a niggard vnto the goddes. There was brought vnto him a litle coffer also, which was thought to be the preciouslest thinge and the richest, that was gotten of all the spoiles and riches, taken at the ouerthrow of Darius. When he saw it, he asked his familiars that were about him, what they thought fittest, and the best thinge to be put into it. Some said one thinge, some said an other thinge: but he said, he would put the Iliades of Homer into it; as the worthiest thinge. This is confirmed by the best historiographers. Now if that which the ALEXANDRIANS report vpon Heraclides wordes, be true: then it appeareth that he did prostitute him selfe much by Homer in this iorney. For it is reported that when he had conquered EGYPT, he determined to builde a great citie, and to replenish it with a great number of GRÆCIANS, and to call it after his name. But as he was about to inclose a certain ground, which he had chosen by thaduise of his engineers and workemasters: the night before he had a maruelous dreame, that he sawe an olde man standing before him, full of white heares, with an honorable preface, and comming towards him said these verbes.

Pharos.

Within the forming sea there lyes a certain land, right Against the shore of Egypt, which of ancient Pharos hight.
As soone as he rose the next morning, he went to see this Ile of PHAROS, the which at that time was a litle about the mouth of the riuer of Nylus, called Canoia, howbeit it is now ioyned vnto firme lande, being forced by mans hand. This, he thought the meetest place that could be, to builde the citie which he had determined. For it is as a tongue or a great bartoe of earth, broade enough, that separeteth a great lake on the one side, and the sea on thother, the which doeth ioyn hard to a great bauen. Then he said that Homer was wonderfull in all his thinges, but that amongst others, he was an excellent Architecture: and commaunded, that straight they should cast the platforme of the citie, according to the situation of the place. Now they found at that time, no chalker, nor white earth there to marke withall, wherefore they were driuen to take meale, and with that did marke out vpon the earth being blacke, by the compasse of the towne that was round and circular, and being deuided into two equal partes, either of them resembled the skirtes and faction of the MACEDONIAN cloke. Alexander liked this draught passingly well. But there rose apon the sodaine out of the riuer or lake, such an infinite multitude of great fowle of all sortes, that they couered the element as it had bene a clowde, and lighting within this circuite, did eate vp all the meale, and left not a crumme. Alexander liked not these signes. Notwithstanding, his soothsayers bad him not be discouraged, for they told him it was a signe that he should builde a citie there, so pleinsfull of all thinges, that he should mainteine all sortes of people. Then he commaunded them, vnto whom he had geuen the charge of the building, that they should goe forward with their worke, and he him selfe in the meane time, tooke his iorney to goe visite the temple of Jupiter Hammon. The iorney was long, and there were many troubles by the waie, but two dangers above all the rest most speciall. The first, lacke of water, by cause they had to trauell many dayes

Alexander journey vnto the citie of Hammon.

A dayes iorney through a great desert. The second was, the daunger of the rising of the southe winde by the waie, to blow the sand abroade, which was of a wonderfull length. And it is reported, that on a time there rose such a tempest in that desert, that blew vp whole hilles of sand, which flew fittie thousand men of Cambyses armie. Euery man in Alexanders traine did know these daungers very well: howbeit it was hard to dissuade Alexander from any thing which he had a desire vnto. For, fortune fauoring him in all his attempes, made him constant and resolute in his determinations: and his noble courage besides, made him inuincible in all thinges he tooke in hand, in so much as he did not only compell his enemies, but he had power also of time and place. In that voyage, in stead of these former daungers, spoken of, he had many helpes, the which are supposed were sent him from the goddes, by the oracles that followed afterwards. For in a certain sorte, they haue beleued the oracles that were written of him. First of all, the wonderfull water and great showers that fell from the element did keepe him from feare of the first daunger, and did quenche their thirst, and moistened the drieres of the sand in such sorte, that there came a sweete freshe ayer from it. Furthermore, when the markes were hidden from the guides to shew them the waie, and that they wandred vp and downe, they could not tell where: there came crows vnto them that did guide them flying before them: flying fast when they saw them follow them, and stayed for them when they were behinde. But Callisthenes writeth a greater wonder then this, that in the night time, with the very noise of the crows, they brought them againe into the right waie which had lost their waie. Thus Alexander in thend, hauing passed through this wilderness, he came vnto the temple he sought for: where, the prophet or chiefe priest saluted him from the god Hammun, as from his father. Then Alexander asked him, if any of the murderers that had killed his father, were left aliue. The priest answered him, and bad him take heede he did not blaspheme, for his father was no mortall man. Then Alexander againe rehearsing that he had spoken, asked him, if the murderers that had conspired the death of Philip his father were all punished. After that, he asked him touching his kingdome, if he would graunt him to be king ouer all the world. The god answered him by the mouth of his prophet, he should: and that the death of Philip was fully reuenged. Then did Alexander offer great presentes vnto the god, and gaue money large to the priests, & ministers of the temple. This is that the most parte of writers doe declare, touching Alexanders demaund, and the oracles geuen him. Yet did Alexander him selfe write vnto his mother; that he had secret oracles from the god, which he would onely impart vnto her, at his retorne into MACEDON. Others saie also, that the prophet meaning to salute him in the Greeke tongue to welcome him the better, would haue said vnto him, O Paision, as much as deere sonne: but that he tripped a litle in his tongue, by cause the Greeke was not his naturall tongue, and placed an s, for an n, in the latter ende, saying, O Pai dios, to wit, O sonne of Iupiter: and that Alexander was glad of that mistaking. Whereupon there ranne a rumor straight among his men, that Iupiter had called him his sonne. It is said also, that he heard Plammon the philosopher in EGYPT, and that he liked his wordes very well, when he saide that god was king of all mortall men: For (quoth he) he that commaundeth all things, must needs be god. But Alexander selfe spake better, and like a philosopher, when he said: That god generally was father to all mortall men, but that particularly he did elect the best sorte for him selfe. To conclude, he shewed him selfe more arrogant vnto the barbarous people, and made as though he certainly beleued that he had bene begotten of some god: but vnto the GRÆCIANS he spake more modestly of diuine generation. For in a letter he wrote vnto the ATHENIANS touching the citie of SAMOS, he said: I gaue ye not that noble free citie, but it was geuen you, at that time by him whom they called my Lord & father: meaning Philip. Afterwards also being stricken with an arrow, and feeling great paine of it: My frendes said he, This blood which is spilt, is mans blood, and not as Homer said,

And the report goeth also, that Alexander vpon a time sending a litle fische vnto Hephestion Anaxarchus should saye as it were in mockery, that they which about others seeke for haue with great trouble and hazard of life, haue either small pleasure in the world, or els as little as others haue. By these proofes and reasons alleged, we maie thinke that Alexander had no vaine nor presumptuous opinion of him selfe, to thinke that he was otherwise begotten of a god, but that he did it in policie to kepe other men vnder obedience, by the opinion conceiued of his godhead. Retorning out of PHOENICIA into EGYPT, he made many sacrifices, feastes, and processions in honor of the goddess, fondry daunces, Tragedies, and such like pastimes goodly to behold: not onely for the sumptuous setting out of them, but also for the good will and diligence of the setters forth of them, which stirred euery one to exceede the other. For the kings of the *CYPR*ANS were the setters of them forth, as at ATHENS they draw by lot a citizen of euery tribe of the people, to defraie the charges of these pastimes. These kings were very earnest who should doe best, but specially Nicocreon, king of SALAMINA in *CYPR*US: and Pasiteras, Lord of the citie of SOLES. For it fell to their lot to furnish two of the excellentest plaiers, Pasiteras furnished Athenodorus, and Nicocreon Theffalus: whom Alexander loued singularly well, though he made no shew of it, vntill that Athenodorus was declared victor, by the iudges deputed to geue sentence. For when he went from the plaies, he told them he did like the iudges opinion well, notwithstanding, he would haue bene contented to haue geuen the one halfe of his realme, not to haue seene Theffalus ouercome. Athenodorus being condemned vpon a time by the ATHENIANS, by cause he was not in ATHENS at the feastes of Bacchus, when the Comedies and Tragedies were plaid, and a fine fet of his head for his absence: he besought Alexander to write vnto them in his behalfe, that they would releafe his penalty. Alexander would not so doe, but sent thither his money whereof he was condemned, and paid it for him of his owne purse. Also when Lycos SCARPHIAN, an excellent stage player had pleased Alexander well, and did soite in a verse in his comedy, concerning a petition of tenne talents: Alexander laughing at it, gaue it him: Darius at that time wrote vnto Alexander, and vnto certain of his frendes also, to pray him to take tenne thousand tallentes for the ransome of all those prisoners he had in his handes, and for all the countries, landes and signories on this side the ruer of Euphrates, and one of his daughters also in marriage, that from thence forth he might be his kinsman and frend. Alexander imparted this to his counsell. Amongest them Parmenio said vnto him: if I were Alexander, he, surely I would accept this offer. So would I in deede, Alexander againe; if I were Parmenio. In fine, he wrote againe vnto Darius, that if he would submit him selfe, he would vse him courteously: if not, that then he would presently marche towardes him. But he repented him afterwarde, when king Darius wife was dead with childe: For without dissimulation it greeued him much, that he had lost for noble an occasion to shew his courtiesie and clemencie. This notwithstanding, he gaue her body honorable buriall, sparing for no cost. Amongest the Eunuches of the queenes chamber, there was one Tircus taken prisoner, among the women: who stealing out of Alexander's campe, taking his horse backe, rode vnto Darius to bring him newes of the death of his wife. Then Darius beating of his head, & weeping bitterly, cried out aloud: O goddes! what wretched happe haue the PERSIANS? that haue not onely had the wife and sister of their king taken prisoners euen in his life time, but now that she is dead also in trauell of childe, she hath bene deprived of princely buriall? Then spake the Eunuch to him, and said: For her buriall, most gracious king, & for all due honor that might be wished her, PERSIA hath no cause to complaine of her hard fortune. For, neither did Queene Statira your wife whilest she liued prisoner, nor your mother, nor daughters, want any parte or ior of their honor they were wont to haue before, sauing onely to see the light of your honour, the which, god Orontes did graunt to restore againe (if it be his will) vnto your maiestie: neither was there any honore wanting at her death (to set forth her stately funeralles) that might be gotten, but more, was lamented also with the teares of your enemies: For Alexander is as mercifull in victorie, as he is valliant in battell. Darius hearing the Eunuches wordes, being vexed in minde for very grieife: tooke the Eunuche aside into the secretest place of his tent, and said vnto him. If thou be not, with the misfortune of the PERSIANS, become a MACEDONIAN, but dost in thy hart

A hat acknowledge Darius, for thy soueraine Lord and master: I pray thee, and do also conuine thee, by the reuerence thou bearest vnto this bright light of the sunne, and so the right hande of the king, that thou doe tell me truly. Are these the least euils which I lament in Statira, her imprisonment and death? And did she not in her life make vs more miserable by her dishonor, than if we had dishonorably fallen into the hands of a cruell enemy? For, what honest communication I pray thee, can a young victorious Prince haue with his enemies wife a prisoner: hauing done her so much honor as he hath done? Darius going on with these speeches, Tircus the eunuch fell downe on his knees, & besought him not to say so, neither to blemish the vertue of Alexander in that sort, nor yet so to dishonor his sister and wife deceased, and thereby also to deprive him selfe of the great comfort he could wish to haue in this calamitie, which was, to be ouercome by an enemy that had greater vertues than a man could possibly haue: but rather that he should wonder at Alexander's vertue, who had shewed him selfe chaster to the Ladies, than valliant against the PERSIANS. And therewithall, the eunuch confirmed the great honesty, chastity, and noble minde of Alexander, by many great and deepe othes. Then Darius comming out among his frendes againe, holding vp his handes vnto the heauens, made this prayer vnto the gods. O heavenly gods, creators of men, & protectors of kings and realmes: first, I beseech you graunt me, that restoring the PERSIANS againe to their former good state, I may leaue the realme vnto my successors, with that glorie and fame I received of my predecessors: that obtaining victory, I may vie Alexander with that great honor and curtesie, which he hath in my misery shewed vnto those I loued best in the world. Or Coderwise, if the time appointed be come, that the kingdom of PERSIA must needs haue end, either through diuine reuenge, or by naturall change of earthly things: Then, good goddes, yet graunt, that none but Alexander after me, may sit in Cyrus throne. Darius's writers do agree, that these things came euen thus to passe. Now Alexander hauing conquered all ASIA on this side the ruer of Euphrates, he went to meete with Darius, that came downe with ten hundred thousand fighting men. It was told him by some of his frendes to make him laugh, that the slaues of his army had deuised them selues in two parts, and had chosen them a Generall of either parte, naming the one Alexander, and the other Darius: and that at the first, they beganne to skirmish only with cloddes of earth, and afterwarde with fistes, but at the last, they grew so hot, that they came to plaine stones and staues, so that they could not be parted. Alexander hearing that, would needs haue the two Generalls fight hand to hand one with the other: and Alexander selfe did arme him that was called Alexander, & Philotas the other which was called Darius. All the army thereupon was gathered together to see this combat betweene the, as a thing that did betoken good or ill lucke to come. The fight was sharp betweene them, but in the end, he that was called Alexander ouercame the other: and Alexander to reward him, gaue him twelue villages, with priuiledge to goe after the PERSIAN maner. This it is written by Erastosthenes. The great battell that Alexander fought with Darius, was not (as many writers report) at Arbeles, but at Gaufameles, which signifieth in the PERSIAN tongue, the house of the cammell. For some one of the ancient kings of PERSIA that had escaped from the hands of his enemies, flying vpon a drumbledary cammell, lodged him in that place, and therefore appointed the reuenues of certaine villages to keepe the cammell there. There fell out at that time an eclipse of the moone, in the month called Boedromion (now August) but the time that the feast of the misteries was celebrated at ATHENS. The eleventh night after that, both their armies being in sight of the other, Darius kept his men in battell ray, and went him selfe by torch light viewing his bandes and companies. Alexander on thother side whilest his MACEDONIAN souldiers slept, was before his tent with Aristander the Soothsayer, and made certain secret ceremonies and sacrifices vnto Apollo. The ancient Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, specially Parmenio, seeing all the vallie betweene the ruer of Niphates, and the mountaines of the GORDIENS, all on a bright light with the fires of the barbarous people, and hearing a dreadful noise as of a confused multitude of people that filled their campe with the sound thereof: they were amazed, and consulted, that in one day it was in manner vnpossible to fight a battell with such an incredible multitude of people. Thereupon they went vnto Alexander after he had ended his ceremonies, and did counsell him to geue battell by night, bicaufe the darkenes thereof should helpe to keepe all feare from his men, which the fight of A their enemies would bring them into. But then he gaue them this notable answer: I will not steale victorie, &c. This answer seemed very fonde and arrogant to some, that he was so pleasaunt, being neere so great danger. Howbeit others thinke that it was a present noble corage, and a deepe consideration of him, to thinke what should happen: thereby to geue Darius no manner of occasion (if he were ouercomen) to take hart againe, and to proue another battell, accusing the darkenes of the night as cause of his ouerthrow: as he had done at the first conflikt, imputing his ouerthrowe to the mountaines, the straights, and the sea. For, sayd he, Darius will neuer leaue to make warres with vs for lacke of men, nor munition, but using so large a realme as he hath, & such a world of people besides: but then he will no more hafard battell, when his hart is done, and all hope taken from him, and that he seeth his army at noone dayes ouerthrowen by plaine battell. After his Captaines were gone from him, he went into his tent, and layed him downe to sleepe, and slept all that night more soundly than he was wont to doe before: inso much as the Lordes and Princes of his campe comming to waite upon him at his vprising, marueled when they found him so founde a sleepe, and therefore of them felues they commaunded the souldiers to eate. Afterwards, perceiuing that time came fast upon them, Parmenio went into Alexander's chamber, and comming to his beddes side, called him twice or thrise by his name, till at the last he waked him, and asked him how it chaunced that he slept so long, like one that had already ouercome, & that did not thinke he should fight as great and dangerous a battell as euer he did in his life. Why, sayd Alexander, laughing on him: doest thou not thinke we haue already ouercomen, being troubled no more with running after Darius vp and downe a contrie vtterly destroyed, as we should otherwise haue bene compelled to haue done, if he would not haue comen to battell, and destroyed the contrie before vs? Now Alexander did not only thinke him selfe before the battell, but euen at the very instant of battell, a noble man of corage, and of great iudgement. For Parmenio leading the left wing of his battell, the men of armes of the BACTRIANS gaue such a fierce onlie vpon the MACEDONIANS, that they made them geue backe: and Maceum also, king Darius Lieutenant, sent certaine troupes of horsemen out of their battell, to geue charge vpon them that were left in the campe to garde the cariage. Parmenio being amazed with either of both attempts, sent immediately to aduertise Alexander, that all their campe and cariage would be lost, if he did not fend presently to aide the rereward. When these newes came to Alexander from Parmenio, he had already geuen the signall of battell vnto his men for to geue charge. Whereupon he answered the messenger that brought him these newes, that he should tell Parmenio he was a mad man and out of his wits, not remembring that if they wanne the battell, they should not only saue their owne cariage, but also winne the cariage of their enemies: & if it were their chaunce to lose it, then that they should not neede to care for their cariage, nor for their slaues, but only to thinke to dye honorably, valiantly fighting for his life. Hauing sent this message vnto Parmenio, he put on his helmet. The rest of his armor for his body, he had put on before in his tent, which was, a SICILIAN cassocke, and vpon that a brigandine made of many foldes of canvas with oyle holes, which was gotten among the spoyle at the battell of Issus. His head peece was as bright as silver, made by Theophilus the armorer: his collar fute like to the same, all set full of pretious stones, and he had a sword by his side, maruelous light, and of excellent temper, which the king of the CITIZIANS had geuen him, vpon of sumptuous workman ship, farre aboue all the rest he ware. It was of the workman ship of Heliicon, the which the RHODIANS gaue him for a present, and this he commonly wore when he went to battell. Now when he did set his men in battell ray, or made any motion vnto them, or did ryde alongest the bands to take view of them: he alwayes vsed to ryde vpon an other horse to spare Bucephalus, because he was then somewhat olde: notwithstanding, when he ment in deede to fight, then Bucephalus was brought vnto him, and as soone as he was gotten vp on his backe, the trompet sounded, & he gaue charge. Then, after he had made long exhortations to incorage the men of armes of the THESSALIANS, and the other GRECIANS also, and when they had all promised him they would stick to him like men, and prayed him

A to lead them, and geue charge vpon the enemies: he tooke his lance in his left hande, and holding vp his right hande vnto heauen, besought the goddes (as Callisthenes writeth) that it were true, he was begotten of Iupiter, that it would please them that day to helpe him, and to encourage the GRECIANS. The Soothlayer Aristander was then a horsebacke hard by Alexander, apparelled all in white, & a crowne of gold on his head, who shewed Alexander when he made his prayer, an Eagle flying ouer his head, and pointing directly towards his enemies. This maruelously encouraged all the army that saw it, and with this ioi, the men of armes of Alexander's side, encouraging one another, did set spurs to their horse to charge upon the enemies. The battell of the footemen of the PERSIANS, beganne a litle to geue way, and before the foremost could come to geue them charge, the barbarous people turned their backs, and fled. The chafe was great, Alexander driving them that fled vpon the middell of their owne battell, where Darius selfe was in person. He spied him a farre of ouer the foremost rankes in the middell of his battell, being a goodly tall Prince, standing in a chariot of warre, compassed in rounde with great troupes of horsemen, all set in goodly ordinance to receiue the enemy. But when they saw Alexander at hand with so grimme a looke, chasing them that fled, through those that yet kept their rankes there fell such a feare among them, that the most parte disperfed them selues. Notwithstanding, the best and most valiantest men fought it out to the death before their king, and falling dead one upon another, they did let them that the enemies could not so well follow Darius. For they lying one by another on the ground, drawing on to the last gaspe, did yet take both men and horses by the legges to hinder them. Darius. Then seeing nothing but terror and destruction before his eyes, and that the bandes which he had set before him for safegard, came backe vpon him, so as he could not deuise how to turne his chariot forward nor backward, the wheelles were so hindered and stayed with the heapes of dead bodies, and that the horse also being set upon and hidde in manner in this conflikt, fell leaping and plunging for feare, so that the charrettiere could no longer guide nor driue them: he got vp vpon a mare that lately had foale, and so saued him selfe flying apon her. And yet had he not thus escaped, had not Parmenio once againe sent vnto Alexander to pray him to come and aide him: bicaufe there was yet a great Squadron whole together that made no countenance to flee. Somewhat there was in it, that they accused Parmenio that day to haue delibed so slackely and cowardly, either bicaufe his age had taken his corage from him, or else for that he enuid Alexander's greatnes and prosperity, who against his will became ouer great as Callisthenes sayd. In fine, Alexander was angry with the second message, and yet told not his men truly the cause why, but faining that he would haue them leaue killing, and bicaufe also night came on: he caused the trompet sound retreat, and so went towards his army, whom he thought to be in distresse. Notwithstanding, newes came to him by the way, that in that place also, they had geuen the enemies the ouerthrowe, and that they fled euery way for life. The battell hauing this successe, euery man thought that the kingdom of the PERSIANS was vtterly ouerthrowen, and that Alexander likewise was become only king of all ASIA: whereupon he made sumptuous sacrifices vnto the goddes, and gaue great riches, houses, lands and possessions vnto his frendes and familiars. Furthermore, to shewe his liberalitie also vnto the GRECIANS, he wrote vnto them, that he would haue all tyrannies suppressed through out all GREECE, and that all the GRECIANS should liue at libertie vnder their owne lawes. Particularly also he wrote vnto the PLATONIANS, that he would reedifie their citie againe, bicaufe their predecessors in time past, had geuen their contrie vnto the GRECIANS, to fight against the barbarous people for the defence of the common libertie of all GREECE. He sent also into EGYPT vnto the GROTONIANS, parte of the spoyle, to honor the memory of the valiantest, and goodwill of Phaylus their citizen, who in the time of the warres with the MEDES, (when all the GRECIANS that dwelt in ITALIE had forsaken their naturall contrie men of GREECE it selfe, bicaufe they thought they could not otherwise scape) went with a shippe of his vnto SALAMINA, which he armed and set forth at his owne charges; bicaufe he would be at the battell and partake also of the common daunger with the GRECIANS: such honor did Alexander beare vnto prowe, that he loued to reward & remember the worthy deedes of men. Then Alexander marching with his army into the contry of BACTRIA, they all yielded straight vnto

him. When he came into the contrie of the ECBATANIANS, he marueled when he saw opening of the earth, out of the which there came continuall sparkes of fire as out of a well: & that hard by also the earth spued out continually a kinde of *maund or chalkie clay somewhat liquid, of such abundance, as it seemed like a lake. This maund or chalie is like vnto a kinde of lyme or clay, but it is so easie to be sette a fire, that not touching it with any flame, by the brightnes only of the light that commeth out of the fire, it is set afire, & doth also set the ayer a fire which is betwene both. The barbarous people of that contrie, being desirous to shewe Alexander the nature of that Naptha, scattered the streete that led to his lodging, with some of it. Then the day being thut in, they fired it at one of the endes, and the first droppes taking fire, in the twinkling of an eye, all the rest from one end of the streete to the other was of a flame, and though it was darke and within night, lightned all the place thereabout. Alexander being in bath at that time, and waited apon by a page called Stewen: (a hard fauor ed boy, but yet that had an excellent sweete voyce to sing) one Athenophanes an A THENIAN, that alwayes pointed & bathed the king, & much delighted him with his pleasaunt conceites, asked him if he would see the trial of this Naptha apon Stewen: for if the fire tooke and went not out, then he would say it had a wonderfull force, and was vnquencheable. The page was contented to haue it proued apon him. But so soone as they had layed it on him, and did but touche it only, it tooke straight of such a flame, and so fired his body, that Alexander him selfe was in a maruelous perplexitie withall. And lure had it not bene by good happe, that there were many by ready with vessells full of water to put into the bath, it had bene vnpossible to haue saued the boy from being burnt to nothing: and yet so he escaped narrowly, and besides was sicke long after. Now some apply this Naptha vnto the fable of Medea, saying that therewith she rubbed the crowne and lawne she gaue vnto the daughter of Creon at her marriage, so much spoken of in the tragedies. For neither the crowne nor the lawne could cast fire of them selues, neither did the fire light by chaunce. But by oyling them with this Naptha she wrought a certaine aptnes to receiue more forcibly the operation of the fire, which was in place where the bride fate. For the beames which the fire calteth out, haue ouer some bodies no other force, but to heet and lighten them. But such as haue an oily drie humor, and thereby a simpathy and proportionable conformitie with the nature of the fire: it easly enflameth and setteth a fire, by the forcible impressiō of his beames. Howbeit they make a great question of the cause of this naturall force of Naptha,* or whether this liquid substance and moyst humor that taketh fire D so easily, doth come of the earth that is fatty and apt to conceiue fire. For this contrie of B A B Y L O N is very hot, inso much as oftentimes barley being put into the ground, it bloweth it vp againe, as if the earth by vehement inflammation had a strong blast to cast it out: and men in the extreamest heate of the sommer, doe sleepe there, vpon great leather budgets filled full of fresh water. Harpalus, whom Alexander left there his Lieutenaut & Gouvernor of that contrie, desiring to set forth and beautifie the gardens of the kings pallace & walkes of the fame, with all manner of plantes of G R E E C E: he brought all the rest to good passe, sauing Iuie only, which the earth could neuer abide, but it euer dyed, because the heate and temper of the earth killed it, and the Iuie of it selfe liketh fresh ayer and a cold ground. This digression is somewhat from the matter, but peraduenture the reader will not thinke it troublesome, howe hard soeuer he E finde it, so it be not our tedious. Alexander hauing wonne the city of S V S A, he found within the castell foure thousand talantes in ready coyne, gold and siluer, besides other infinite treasure and inestimable, amongst the which (it is sayd) he found to the value of fise thousand talantes weight of * purple HERMIONA like which they had safe locked vp & kept the secret of two hundred yeres faue ten, and yet the colour kept as freshe as if it had bene newly made. Some say that the cause why it was so well kept, came by meanes of the dying of it, with blacke nie, in silkes which before had bene dyed redde, and with white oyle in white silkes. For, there are silkes leene of that colour of as long a time, that keepe colour as well as the other. But writeth furthermore, that the kinges of P E R S I A made water to be brought from the riuer of Nylus and Ister (otherwise called Danubie) which they did locke vp with their other treasure F for a confirmation of the greatnes of their Empire, and to shew that they were Lordes of the world. The wayes to enter into P E R S I A being very hard of passage, and in manner vnpassable,

A (both for the illness of the wayes, as also for the gard that kept them, which were the choicest men of P E R S I A) Darius also being fled thither: there was one that spake the Greeke and P E R S I A N tongue (whose father was borne in the contrie of L Y C I A, & his mother a P A R S I A N) that guided Alexander into P E R S I A, by some compasse fetched about not very long, according to the Oracles aunswere of Alexander geuen by the mouth of Nunne Pythias, when he was a child: that a L Y C I A N should guide and lead him against the P E R S I A N S. There was then great slaughter made in P E R S I A of the prisoners that were taken. For Alexander him selfe wyryeth, that he commaunded the men should be put to the sword, thinking that the best way to serue his turne. It is sayd also, that there he found a maruelous treasure of gold and siluer in readie money, as he had done before in the cite of S V S A: the which he caried away with all the rest of the kings rich wardroppe, and with it laded tenne thousande moyles, and fise thousande cammells. Alexander entering into the castell of the chiefe cite of P E R S I A, saw by chaunce a great image of Xerxes lye on the ground, the which vnwares was thrown downe by the multitude of the souldiers that came in, thronging one upon another. Thereupon he stayed, and spake vnto it as if it had bene aliue, saying: I can not tell whether I should passe by thee, and let thee lye, for the warre thou madest somtime against the G R E E C I A N S: or whether I should lift thee vp, respecting the noble minde & vertues thou haddest. In thend, when he had roode mure a long time, considering of it, he went his way: and meaning to refresh his weary army, because it was the winter quarter, he remained there foure monethes together. The reporte goeth, that the first time that Alexander sate vnder the cloth of state of king Darius, all of rich C gold: Demargthus C O R I N T H I A N (who first beganne to loue him euen in his father *Philip*pes time) burst out in teares for ioy, good old man, saying that the G R E E C I A N S long time dead before, were deprivied of this blessed happe, to see Alexander set in king Xerxes princely chaire. After that, preparing againe to goe against Darius, he would needes make mery one day, and refresh him selfe with some banquet. It chaunced so, that he with his companions was bidden to a priuate feast priuately, where was assembled some fine curtisians of his familiars who with their sendes taried at the banquet. Amongst them was that famous Thais, borne in the contrie of A T T I C A, & then concubine to Ptolomy, king of E G Y P T after Alexander's death. She finely praising Alexander, and partly in sporting wise, began to vtter matter in affection of her contrie, but yet of greater importance than became her mouth: saying, that that day the founde D her selfe fully recompenced to her great good liking, for all the paines she had takē, traouelling through all the contries of A S I A, following of his armie, now that she had this fauor & good happe to be mery and pleasaunt, in the prowde and stately pallace of the great kings of P E R S I A. But yet it would doe her more good, for a recreation, to burne Xerxes house with the fire of ioy, who had burnt the city of A T H E N S: and her selfe to geue the fire to it, before so noble a Prince as Alexander. Because euer after it might be said, that the women following his campe, had taken more noble reuenge of the P E R S I A N S, for the wronges and iniuries they had done vnto G R E E C E: than all the Captaines of G R E E C E that euer were had done, either by lande or sea. When she had sayd, Alexander's familiars about him, clapped their hands, and made great noise for ioy, saying: that it were as good a deede as could be possible, and perswaded Alexander E der vnto it. Alexander yielding to their perswasions, rose vp, and putting a garland of flowers apon his head, went formeest him selfe: and all his familiars followed after him, crying and dauncing all about the castell. The other M A C E D O N I A N S hearing of it also, came thither immediately with torches light and great ioy, hoping that this was a good signe that Alexander ment to returne againe into M A C E D O N, and not to dwell in the contrie of the barbarous people, sith he did burne and destroy the kings castell. Thus, and in this sorte it was thought to be burnt. Some writers thinke otherwise: that it was not burnt with such sport, but by determination of the counsell. But how soeuer it was, all they graunt, that Alexander did presently repent him, and commaunded the fire to be quenched straight. For his liberality, that good will and readines to geue, increased with his conquestes: and when he did bestowe giftes of any, F he would besides his gift euer geue them good countenance, on whom he bestowed his grace and fauor. And here I will recite a few examples thereof. Aristo being Collonell of the P E R S I A N S, hauing slaine one of his enemies, he brought him his head, and sayd: such a present,

*The strength and power of Naptha, in the contrie of Ecbatania.

Alexanders journey into Persia.

Alexander found a marvellous treasure in Persia.

The infamous boldnes of Thais the harlot.

Perspolis set a fire by Alexander.

O king, by vs, is euer rewarded with a cuppe of golde. Yea, q Alexander, smyling upon him: A with an emprie cuppe. But I drinke to thee this cuppe full of good wine, and doe geue thee cuppe & all. An other time, he met with a poore MACEDONIAN that led a moyle laden with gold of the kings: and when the poore moyle was so weary that he could no longer cary her burden, the moyleter put it upon his owne backe, and loded him selfe withall, carying it to a good pretie way: howbeit in thende being ouerloden, was about to throwe it downe on the ground. Alexander perceiuing it, asked him what burden he caried. When it was tolde him well, q he to the moyleter, be not weary yet, but carie it into the tent, for I geue it thee. To be short, he was angrier with them that would take nothing of him, then he was with those that would aske him somewhat. He wrote also vnto Phocion, that he would take him no more for his friend, if he would refuse his giftes. It seemed that he had geuen nothing vnto a young boy called Serapion (who euer did serue them the ball that played at tennis) because he asked him nothing. Wherefore, the king playing on a time, this young boy threw the ball to others that played with him, and not to him selfe. The king marueling at it, at the length sayd vnto him: why, my boy, doest thou not geue me the ball? Because your maiestie doth not aske it me, q he. Alexander then vnderstanding his meaning, laughed at the boy, & did much for him afterwards. There was attending on him also one Proteas, a pleasaunt conceited man, & that could flent finely. It chaunced vpon some occasion that Alexander fell out with him: whereupon some of his friends were intercessors to the king for him, & besought him to pardon him: and Proteas him selfe also being present, craued pardon with teares in his eyes. Alexander thereupon forgaue him. Then pleasauntly replied Proteas, I desire it may please your grace, that I may receiue some testimonie to assure me I am in your fauor. Thereupon the king straight commaunded one to geue him five talents. The goods and riches he gaue vnto his familiars and gard about him, were very great, as it appeareth plainly by a letter which his mother Olympias wrote vnto him to this effect: I know thou sparest not to geue thy friends large giftes, and that thou makest much of them: but thereby thou makest them kings fellows, they get many frendes, and leaue the poste alone without any. His mother did many times write such like matters vnto him, the which Alexander kept very secret, sauing one day when he opened one of them, Hephestion being present drew neere, and red the letter with him, as he was wont to do. Alexander did let him alone, but when he had red it, he plucked the seale of armes from his finger, wherewith he did vfe to seale his letters, and put it to Hephestions mouth. He gaue also vnto the sonne of Mazens, (that was the chiefeest man about Darius) a seconde gouernment, besides that which he had before, and greater than the first. This young noble man refused it, saying: why, and it please your grace, before there was but one Darius, but you now make many Alexanders. He gaue vnto Parmenio also, Bagoas house, where (as is reported) he found a thousand talents worth, of the spoyle and goods of the SVSANS. He wrote also vnto Antipater, that he should keepe a gard about his person, for he had many enemies that lay in waite for him. He did send also many goodly presents vnto his mother, but withall he wrote vnto her, that she would meddle no more with his matters nor gifts, taking vpon her the office of a Captaine. She storming at it, he paciently did brooke her anger. Antipater an other time, wryting a long letter vnto him against his mother Olympias, when he had red it ouer: loe, said he, Antipater knoweth not, that one teare of the mothers eye will wipe out tenne thousand such letters. Furthermore, Alexander perceiuing on a time, that his frendes became very dissolute & licentious in dyet and life, and that Agnon TEIAN had his corked shooes nayled with siluer nayles, that Leonatus also caused diuers cammells to be loded amongst his cariage with powder of EGYPT, to put upon him when he wrestled or vfed any other exercise of body: & that also they caried after Philotas, toyles for chafe and vfed any other exercise of body: & that there were also that vfed precious perfumes & sweete fauors when they bathed them selues, more then there were that rubbed them selues with plaine oyle, and that they had fine chamberlaines to rubbe them in the bath, and to make their beddes soft and delicate: he wisely and courteously rebuked them and sayd, I maruell, sayd he, that you which haue fought in so often and great battells, doe not remember that they which trauell, doe sleepe more sweete and soundly, than they that take their ease and doe nothing: and that you doe not marke, that comparing

A comparing your life, with the manner of the life of the PERSIANS, to liue at pleasure is a vile thing, and to trauell is Princely. And howe I pray you, can a man take paine to dreffe his owne horse, or to make cleane his lance or helmet, that for slothfull curiosities sake, disdaineth to rubbe his owne bodie with his fine fingers? Are you ignorant, that the type of honor in all our victorie consisteth, in scornning to doe that which we see them doe, whom we haue vanquished and overcome? To bring them therefore by his example, to acquaint them selues with hardnes: he tooke more paines in warres and in hunting, and did hazard him selfe more dangerously, then euer he had done before. Whereupon an Ambassador of LACEDÆMON being present to see him fight with a Lyon, and to kill him, sayd vnto him: truly your grace hath fought well with this Lyon, and tried which of you two should be king. Craterus after that, caused this hunting to be set vp in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES: where are the images of the Lyon, of the dogges, and of the king fighting with the Lyon, and of him selfe also that came to helpe him, all those images being of copper, some made by Lysippus, the rest by Leochares. Thus Alexander did put him selfe vnto all toberdies, as well to exercise his strength and courage, as also to allure his men to doe the like. This notwithstanding, his frendes and familiars hauing wealth at will, as men exceeding riche, they would needes liue delicately and at ease, and would take no more paines, milking vtterly to goe vp and downe the contries to make warre here and there: and thereupon beganne a litle to finde fault with Alexander, and to speake euill of him. Which at the first Alexander tooke quietly, saying, that it was honor for a king to suffer him selfe to be slandered and ill spoken of, for doing of good. And yet the least good turnes he did vnto his frendes, did shewe his hartie loue and honor he bare them, as shall appeare vnto you by some examples that followe. Pencestas being bitten by a beare, did let his frendes vnderstande it by letters, but he wrote nothing thereof vnto Alexander. Alexander was offended therewith, and wrote vnto him thus. Send me worde at the least yet how thou doest, and whether any of thy fellows doe forsake thee at the hunting, to thende they may be punished. Hephestion being absent about certaine businesse he had, Alexander wrote vnto him, that as they were hunting a bea called Ichnemnon, Craterus vnfortunatly crosseing Perdiccas darte, was stricken through both his thighes. Pencestas being cured of a great disease, Alexander wrote vnto Alexippus his Phisitian that had cured him, and gaue him thanks. Craterus also being sicke, he dreamed of him one night, and therefore made certaine sacrifices for the recouerie of his health, and sent vnto him, willing him to doe the like. And when the Phisitian Pausanias ment to geue him a drinke of Eclleborum, he wrote letters vnto him, telling him what daunger he was in, and prayed him to be careful how he receiued that medicine. He did also put Ephialtes and Cissus in prison, who brought him the first newes of Harpalus flying, because they did wrongfully accuse & slander him. When he had comaunded there should be a bill made of all the olde mens names, and diseased persons that were in his campe, to sende them home againe into their contry: there was one Eurylochus ÆGEBIAN that made his name be billed among the sicke persons, & it was found afterwards that he was not sicke, and confessed that he did it only to follow a young woman called Telephus, with whom he was in loue, who was returning homewards towards the sea side. Alexander asked him, whether this woman were free or bond: he answered him, that she was a curtisan free borne. Then sayd Alexander vnto Eurylochus, I would be glad to further thy loue, yet I can not force her to tarie: but seeke to winne her by giftes and fayer wordes to be contented to tarie, so thence she is a free woman. It is a wonderful thing to see what paines he would take, to write for his frendes, euen in such trifles as he did. As, when he wrote into CLITIA for a seruauent of Selenus that was fled from his master, sending straight commaundement, that they should carefully lay for him. And by an other letter he commendeth Pencestas, for that he had stayed and taken one Nicon, a slaue of Craterus. And by one other letter also vnto Megabazus, touching an other bondman that had taken sanctuarie in a temple: he commaunded him also to seeke to intise him out of the sanctuarie, to laye hold on him if he could, but otherwise not to meddle with him in any case. It is sayd also, that at the first when he vfed to fit in iudgement to heare criminall causes, whilst the accuser went on with his complaint and accusation: he always vfed to lay his hande vpon one of his eares to keepe that cleane from the matter of accusation, thereby referring it to heare the purgacion and iustificacion of the person condemned. But afterwarde, the number of accusations that were brought before him, didde prouoke and alter him, that he did beleue the false accusations, by the great number of the true that were brought in. But nothinge put him more in rage, then when he vnderhoode that he had spoken ill of him: and then he was so fierce, as no pardon would be graunted, for that he loued his honor, more then his kingdome or life. Then at that time he went against Darius, thinking that he ment to fight againe: but vnderstanding that Bessus had taken him, then he gaue the THESSALIANS leaue to departe home into their contrie, and gaue them two thousand talentes, ouer and aboue their ordinarie pay. Alexander had then a maruelous long, hard, and painefull iorney in following of Darius: for in eleuen dayes, he rode three thousande three hundred furlong, inso much as the most parte of his men were euen wearie, and done, for lacke of water. It chaunced him one day to meete with certaine MA-CEDONIANS that caried (vpon moyles) goate skinned full of water, which they had fashed from a riuier. They seeing Alexander in manner deade for thirst, being about noone ranne quickly to him, and in a headpeece brought him water. Alexander asked them, to whom they caried this water. They answered him againe, that they caried it to their children, but yet we would haue your grace to liue: for though we lose them, we may get more children. When they had sayd so, Alexander tooke the helmer with water, and perceiving that the men of armes that were about him, and had followed him, did thrust out their neckes to looke vpon this water, he gaue the water backe againe vnto them that had geuen it him, and thanked them, but dranke none of it. For, sayd he, if I drinke alone, all these men here will faint. Then they seeing the noble corage and curtesie of Alexander, cried out that he should lead them: and therewithall beganne to spurre their horses, saying, that they were not wea-rie nor a thirst, nor did thinke them selues mortall, so long as they had such a king. Euerie man was a like willing to followe Alexander, yet had he but three score only that entred with him into the enemies campe. There, passinge ouer much golde and siluer which was scattered abroad in the market place, and going also by many charriottes full of women and children, which they found in the fields, flying away at all aduenture: they ranne vpon the spurre vntill they had ouertaken the foremost that fled, thinking to haue founde Darius amongst them.

But at the length, with much a doe, they founde him layed along in a coche, hauing many woundes vpon his bodie, some of darts and some speares. So, he being almost at the last call, called for some drinke, and dranke colde water, which Polystratus gaue him. To whom when he had dronke, he sayd: this is my last misshap, my friend, that hauing receiued this pleasure, I can not requite thee: howbeit Alexander will recompence thee, and the goddess, Alexander, for the liberalitie and curtesie which he hath shewed vnto my wife and children, whom I pray thee embrace for my sake. At these last wordes, he tooke Polystratus by the hande, and so gaue vp the goast. Alexander came immediately after, and plainly shewed that he was sone for his death and misfortune: and vndoing his owne cloke, he cast it vpon the body of Darius.
After that, hauing by good happe gotten Bessus into his hands, he tare him in peces with two high straight trees which he bowed downe vnder, and tied his legges to eche of them: so that when the trees were let goe, they gaue a sodaine cruell ierke vp and caried either tree, a peece of his bodie with it. Then Alexander hauing geuen Darius corse Princely buriall, and embalmed him: he sent it vnto his mother, and receiued his brother Exathres for one of his friends.
From thence he went into the contrie of HYRCANIA with all the flower of his armie, where he sawe the gulfes of the sea Caspium, which he thought of no lesse greatnesse, then the sea of PONTVS, howbeit calmer then the other seas be. He could not then certainly finde out what it was, nor from whence it came: but of likelyhoode he thought it was some breaking out of the lake or marish of Meotin. Yet some ancient naturall Philosophers seemed to knowe truly what it was. For many yeares before Alexanders voyage and conquest, they wrote that of the foure chiefe gulfes of the sea that commeth from the Ocean, and doe entre within maine land, that which is most northerly, is the sea Caspium, which they call also Hyrcan-ium. As Alexander went through the contrie, certaine barbarous people sodainely sette vpon them that led Bucephalus his horse, and tooke him: but with that he was in such a rage, would put man, woman, and childe to the sword, if they brought him not his horse againe.

Whereuppon, when his horse was returned home, and that they bearded vp their cities and fortes into his handes: he did vse them all very curtesiously, and mozeouer did geue them money for the ransom of his horse, which they restored. Departing thence, he entred into the contrie of PARTHYA. There hauing leasure enough, he beganne to apparell himselfe after the facion of the barbarous people, because he thought thereby the better to winne the hearts of the contrie men, flaming him selfe vnto their owne facions: or else to trye the hearts of the MACEDONIANS, to see how they would like the manner of the PERSIANS, which he ment to bring them vnto) in reuerencing of him as they did their king, by litle and litle acquainting them to allow the alteration and change of his life. This notwithstanding, he would not at the first take vp the apparell of the MEDES, which was verie straunge, and altogether barbarous. For he went not without briches, nor did weare a long gowne trailing on the grounde; nor a high copant hatte, but tooke a meane apparell betwixt the MEDES & the PERSIANS, more modest then theirs, and more costly than the last: and yerat the first he did not weare it, but when he would take with the barbarous people, or else priuately amongst his friends and familiars. Afterwards notwithstanding, he shewed him selfe openly to the people in that apparell, when he gaue them audience. This sight grieved the MACEDONIANS much; but they had his virtues in such admiration, that they thought it meete in some things he should take his owne pleasure, sithence he had bene often hurt in the warres, and not long before had his legge broken with an arrow, and an other time, had such a blow with a stone full in his necke, that it made him spurre blinde a great while after, and yet neuerthelesse he neuer eschewed any bodely daunger. For he passed ouer the riuier of Oreaxtes, which he tooke to be Tanis, and hauing in battell ouerthrowen the SCYTHIANS, he followed them in chase aboue a hundred furlong, notwithstanding that at that instant he had a loosenesse of bodie. Thither came vnto him (as it is reported) the Queene of the AMAZONS, as many wryters doo testifie: among the which are these, Clitarchus, Polyeritus, Onesiferus, Antigenes, and Histier. But Chares, Plutony, Anticlidus, & Philon THEBAN, Philip the historiographer, Hecataeus ERASTRIAN, Philip CHALCIDIAN, and Duris SAMIAN, all these doe wryte that it was not true: and it seemeth also that Alexander selfe doth confirme it. For, wryting all things particularly vnto Antipater as they happened vnto him, he wrote vnto him that the king of SCYTHIA offered him his daughter in marriage: but there he maketh no mention at all of any AMAZON. It is also sayd, that Onesiferus long time after that he had receiued vnto king Dysmachus, the fourth booke of his historie, where he did speake of the AMAZON. Dysmachus tynnyling, sayd vnto him: why, and where was I then? But for that matter, to credit or not credit it, Alexander's estimation thereby is neither impayed nor aduanced. Furthermore, Alexander fearing that the MA-CEDONIANS, being weaie with this long warre, would goe no further: he left all the rest of his armie behinde, and tooke only twentie thousande footemen, and three thousand horsemen of the choicest men of his armie, and with them inuaded the contrie of HYRCANIA.
There he made an oration vnto them, and told them, that the barbarous people of ASIA had E but sene them as it were in a dreame, and if they should now returne backe into MACEDON, hauing but onely sturred them, and not altogether subdued ASIA: the people offended with them, would sette vpon them as they went home, as if they were no better than women.
Neuerthelesse, he gaue any man leaue to returne that would, protelling therewith against them that would goe, how they did forsake him, his friends, and those who had so good hartes towards him, as to follow him in so noble a iorney, to conquer the whole earth vnto the MA-CEDONIANS. This selfe matter is reported thus in a letter which Alexander wrote vnto Antipater: and there he wryteth furthermore, that hauing made this oration vnto them, they all cried out, and bad him leade them into what parte of the worlde he would. When they had granted their good wills, it was no hard matter afterwards, to winne the rest of the common force who followed the example of the chiefeft. Thereuppon he did frame him selfe the more to liue after the facion of the contrie there, and enterchangeable also to bring the men of that contrie vnto the manner of the MACEDONIANS: being perswaded, that by this mixture and entercchange of manners one with an other, he should by frendshippe more then force, make them agree louingly together, when that he should be so farre from the contry of Parmenio. For this purpose therefore, he chose thirty thousand of their children of that contry, and set them to learne the Greke tongue, and to be brought vp in the discipline of warres, after the Macedonians manner: and gaue them schoolemasters and Captaines to traine them in such facultie. And for the marrying of Roxane, he fancied her, seeing her at a feast where he was, which fell out as well for his turne, as if he had with better aduise and counsell loued her. For the barbarous people were verie proude of this matche when they sawe him make alliance with them in this sorte, inasmuch as they loued him better then they did before, because they saw in those things he was alwayes so chaste and continent, that notwithstanding he was maruelously in loue with her, yet he would not dishonorably touche this young Ladie, before he was married vnto her. Furthermore, Alexander considering that of the two men which he loued best, Hephestion liked well of his matche, and went apparelled as him selfe did, and that Craterus contrarily did still vse the Macedonian manner: he delt in all assayes with the barbarous people, by Hephestion, and with the Grecians and Macedonians, by Craterus. To be short, he loued the one, and honored the other: saying, that Hephestion loued Alexander, and Craterus loued the king. Hereuppon these two persons bare one another grudge in their harts, and oftentimes brake out in open quarrell: inasmuch as on a time being in India, they drew their swordes and fought together, and diuers of their frendes ranne to take part with either side. Thither came Alexander selfe also, who openly before them all, bitterly tooke vp Hephestion, and called him foole and bedlem, saying: doest thou not know, that whatsoeuer he C be that should take Alexander from me, he should neuer liue? Priuately also, he sharply rebuked Craterus, and calling them both before him, he made them frendes together, swearing by Iupiter Hammon, and by all the other gods, that he loued them two of all men liuing, neuertheless if euer he founde that they fell out together againe, they should both dye for it, or him at the least that first beganne to quarrell. So euer after that they say, there was neuer fowle word nor deede betwene them, not so much as in sport only. There was also one Philotas, the sonne of Parmenio, a man of great authority among the Macedonians, who next vnto Alexander was the most valliantest man, the pacientest to abide paine, the liberallest, and one that loued his men & frendes better then any noble man in the campe whatsoever. Of him it is reported, that a frend of his came to him on a time to borrow money: and he commaunded straight one of his men to let him haue it. His purse bearer answered him, that he had none. Why, sayd his master, doest thou tell me so? Hast thou not plate, and apparell to sell or gage to helpe him to some? Howbeit otherwise, he had such a pride & glory to shew his riches, to apprell himselfe so sumptuously, and to be more fine and prynced then became a priuate man, that this made him to be hated: because he tooke vp him to be a great man & to looke bigge on the matter, which became him ill fauoredly, and therefore euery man through his owne folly, fell in milking with him. Inasmuch as his owne father said one day vnto him: sonne I pray thee be more humble & lowly. This Philotas had long before bene complained vpon vnto Alexander, because that when the cariage of king Darius armie (which was in the cite of Damas) was taken after the battell of Cilicia, among many prisoners that were taken and brought vnto Alexander E campe, there was one Anigona, a passing fayre young curtisan, borne in the cite of Pinna. Philotas founde meanes to gette her, and like a young man that was in loue with her, making merie with her at the table, fondly lette fall braue wordes and boastes of a souldier, saying, that what notable thinges were done, they were done by him selfe and his father: and called Alexander at euerie worde, young man, and sayd that by their meanes he helde his name and kingdome. This curtisan tolde one of his frendes what he sayd, and that frende tolde an other frende, and so went from man to man (as commonly it doth) till at the length it came to Craterus eares. He tooke the curtisan, and brought her vnto Alexander, vnto whom she tolde as much as she had sayd before. Alexander bad her still make much of Philotas, and to tell him euery word what he sayd of him. Philotas knowing nothing that he was thus circumvented, did euer frequent her companie, and would be bold commonly to speake many foolish and vndiscreete words against the king, sometime in anger, & sometime againe in a brauery.

Why Philotas was suspected, and enuied of Alexander.

Alexander this notwithstanding, though he had manifest prooffe and cause to accuse Philotas, yet he dissembled it for that time, and would not be known of it: either for that he knew Parmenio loued him, or else for that he was affrayed of their great power and authoritie. About that time there was one Limnus Chalafrican a Macedonian, that layed great and secret waite to kill Alexander: and being in loue with a young man called Nicomachus, enticed him to helpe him to doe this deede. The young man wisely denied it, & tolde the same to his brother called Rabinius. He went vnto Philotas, and prayed him to bring them both before Alexander, for they had a matter of great importance to impart vnto him. Philotas would not let him speake with the king (but why, no man could tell) telling them that the king had greater matters in hande, and was not at leasure. Then they went vnto an other, and he brought them vnto Alexander: vnto whom first they opened the treason of Limnus conspired against him: and by the way they tolde also, how they had bene twise before with Philotas, who would not let them come in, nor speake with them. That angered Alexander greatly, and he was the more offended also, when Limnus was slaine by him, whome he sent to apprehend him, telling him for this he would not be taken: and thought that by his death he had lost a great meane to come to the light of this treason and conspiracie. Then Alexander frowning vppon Philotas, brought all his enemies vpon his backe, that of long time had hated him. For they began to speake boldly, that it was time for the king to looke about him, for it was not to be supposed that this Limnus Chalafrican of him selfe durst haue entred into that treason: but rather that he was a minister, and a chiefe instrument, set on by a greater personage then he: and therefore C that it should Alexander vpon to examine them straightly, which had cause to doope this treason secret. After Alexander once gaue eare vnto such wordes and vehement presumptions, there was straight brought in a thousand accusations against Philotas. Thereupon he was apprehended, and in the presence of diuers Eordes and familiars of the king put to the torture, Alexander selfe beinge behinde a hanginge, to heare what he would say. It is reported, that when he hearde howe faintly and pitifully he besought Hephestion to take pitie of him, he sayd vnto him selfe: alas, poore Philotas, thou that hast so faint a hart, howe durst thou take vpon thee so great matters? In fine, Philotas was put to death, and immediately after he was executed, Alexander sent also with speede vnto the realme of Media to kill Parmenio, who was his Lieutenant there, and one that had serued king Philippe his father, in his greatest affayres, and who onely of all other the olde seruantes of his father had procured Alexander to take in hande the conquest of Asia: and who also of three sonnes which he brought out with him, had seene two of them dye before him, and afterwarde was slaine him selfe with the third. This crueltie of Alexander made his frendes affrayed of him, and specially Anipater A who secretly sent Ambassadors vnto the Ætolians, to make league with them, because they them selves also were affrayed of Alexander, for that they had put the Daniades to death. Alexander hearing that, sayd, that he himselfe, and not the sonnes of the Oeniades, would be reuenged of the Ætolians. Not long after that, followed the murder of Clitus, the which to heare it simple tolde, would seeme much more cruell than the death of Rabinius. But reportinge the cause and the time together in which it chaunced: it will be founde E that it was not of sette purpose, but by chance, and unfortunately, that Alexander beinge overcome with wine, did vnluckely wreake his anger vpon Clitus. The manner of his misfortune was this. There came certaine men of the lowe contries from the sea side, that brought apples of Greece vnto Alexander. Alexander wondering to see them so greene and fayre, sent for Clitus to shewe him them, and to geue him some of them. Clitus by chance did sacrifice at that time vnto the goddess, and left his sacrifice to goe vnto Alexander: howbeit there were three weathers that followed him, on whome the accustomed sprinckles had bene done already to haue sacrificed them. Alexander vnderstandinge that, tolde it to his Soothsayers, Aristander, and Cleomantis: Laconian, who both did answer him, that it was an ill signe. Alexander thereupon gaue order straight, that they should doe sacrifice F for the health of Clitus, and specialie for that three dayes before he dreamed one night that he sawe Clitus in a mourninge gowne, sittinge amongst the sonnes of Parmenio, the which were all dead before. This notwithstanding, Clitus did not make an ende of his sacrifice, but

Why Alexander was overcome of Clitus.

Alexander dreamed of Clitus.

came straight to supper to the kinge, who had that day sacrificed vnto Cæsar and Pollux. At this feast there was olde drinking, and all the supper time there were certaine verses long and made by a Poet, called Pranichus, (or as others lay, of one Pierion) against certaine Captaines of the MACEDONIANS, which had not long before bene ouercome by the barbarous people, and only to shame them, and to make the companie laugh. With these verses, auncient men that were at this feast, became much offended, and grewe angrie with the Poet that made them, and the minstrell that song them. Alexander on thother side, and his familiars liked them verie well, and commaunded the minstrell to sing still. Clitus therewithall being ouertaken with wine, and besides of a churlish nature, proude and arrogant, fell into greater choller, and sayd: what it was neither well nor honestlie done in that sorte to speake ill of these poore MACEDONIAN Captaines (and speciallie amongst the barbarous people their enemies) which were farre better men then they, that laughed them to scorn, although their fortune much worse then theirs. Alexander then replied, and sayd, that saying so, he pleased for him selfe; calling cowardlinesse, misfortune. Then Clitus standing vp, sayd againe but yet this my cowardlinesse faued thy life, that callest thy selfe the sonne of the goddes, when thou turnedst thy backe from Spithridates sword, and the blood which these poore MACEDONIANS did shedde for thee, and the woundes which they receiued of their bodies fighting for thee, haue made thee so great, that thou disdainest now to haue king Philip for thy father, and wilt needs make thy selfe the sonne of Iupiter Hammon. Alexander being moued with these words, straight replied: O, villen, thinkest thou to scape vnpunished for these proude words of thine, which thou vnest continually against me, making the MACEDONIANS rebell against Alexander? Clitus answered againe, too much are we punished, Alexander, for our paines and seruice to receiue such reward: nay, most happy thinke we them that long since are dead and gone, not now to see the MACEDONIANS scourged with rodde of the MEDES, & compelled to curry fauour with the PERSIANS, to haue access vnto their king. Thus Clitus boldly speaking against Alexander, and Alexander againe answering and reuiling him: the grauest men sought to pacifie this sturre and tumult. Alexander then turning him selfe vnto Xenodochus, CARDIAN, and Artemius COLOPHONIAN: doe you not thinke (sayd he) that the GREEKS are amongst the MACEDONIANS, as demy goddes that walke among brute beastes? Clitus for all this would not geue ouer his impudencie and mallapertnesse, but cried out, and bad Alexander speake openlie what he had to say, or else not to bidde free men come to supper with him that were wont to speake frankly: if not, to keepe with the barbarous slaues that honored his PERSIAN girdell, and long white garment. Then coulde Alexander no longer hold his choller, but tooke an apple that was vpon his table, and threw it at Clitus, and looked for his sword, the which Aristophanes, one of his gard that waited on him, had of purpose taken from him. And when euerie man came straight about him to stay him, and to pray him to be contented: he immediatly rose from the borde, and called his gard vnto him in the MACEDONIAN tongue, (which was a signe of great trouble to followe after it) and commaunded a trompetor to sound the alarme. But he drawing backe, would not found: whereupon Alexander strake him with his fist. Notwithstanding, the trompetor was greatly commended afterwards, for that he only kept the campe that they rose not. All this could not quiet Clitus, whereupon his frends with much a doe thrust him out of the halle: but he came in againe at an other dore, and arrogantly and vnreuerently rehearsed this verse of the Poet Euripides, out of Andromaches tragedie:

Are into Grace crept now a dayes.*

Then Alexander taking a partizan from one of his gard, as Clitus was coming towards him, and had lift vp the hanging before the dore, he ranne him through the body, so that Clitus fell to the ground, and fetching one grone, died presently. Alexanders choller had left him straight, and he became maruelous sorrowfull: and when he saw his frendes round about him say neuer a word, he plucked the partizan out of his body, & would haue thrust it into his owne throte. Howbeit his gard about him caught him by the hands, & caried him perforce into his chamber: & there he did nothing all that night but weepe bitterly, & the next day following,

The malapertnes of Clitus against Alexander.

As vntill such time as he was able to crie no more, but lying on the ground, onely laie sighing. His frendes hearing his voice no more; were afraid, and came into this chamber by force to comfort him. But Alexander would heare none of them, saying Alexander the Scotchfayer, who remembered him of his dreame he had of Clitus before, which was a prognodication of that which had happened: whereby it appeared that it was his destiny before he was borne. This seemed to comfort Alexander. Afterwards they brought in Callisthenes the philosopher, a highman of Aristoteles, and Anaxarchus borne in ABDASIA. Of these two, Callisthenes fought by gentle talke, not mouing any matter offensive to comfort Alexander foron. But Anaxarchus that from the beginning had taken a way by him selfe in the studie of philosophie, being accepted a braine sicke man, and one that despised his companions: he coming into Alexanders chamber, alio with him, cryed out at the dore as he came in: See, yonder is Alexander the great whom all the world lookes vpon, and is afraid of. Seewhere he lies, weeping like a slaue on the ground, that is afraid of the lawe, and of the reproche of men: as if he him selfe should not geue them law; and stablish the boundes of iustice or iniustice; sitthence he hath ouercome to be Lord and master, and not to be subiect and slaue to a vaine opinion. Knowest thou not that the poets saie, that Iupiter hath Themis to wit, right and iustice placed of either hand on him? what significeth that, but all that the prince doth, is wholly right, and iust? These wordes of Anaxarchus did comfort the sorrowfull hate of king Alexander at that time, but therewithall, they made Alexanders maners afterwards more fierce and dissolute. For as he thereby did maruelously grow in fauor with the king, even so did he make the company of Callisthenes; (who of him selfe was not very pleasaunt, because of his grauery and sowrenesse) much more hateful and disliked then before. It is written also that there was certain rattle one night at king Alexanders borde touching the seasons of the year, & temperatenes of the ayer, and that Callisthenes was of their opinion which maintained, that the contry they were in at that time was much colder, and the winter also sharper then in GREECE. Anaxarchus held the contrary opinion, and stilly maintained it, in so much as Callisthenes said vnto him: and yet must thou graunt, that it is colder here then there. For there, all the winter time thou couldest goe with a single cloke on thy backe onely, and here thou must haue three or foure garments vpon thee when thou art at thy borde. This galled Anaxarchus to the quick, and made him more angry then before: and for the other rethoricians and flatterers, they did also hate him, because they saw him followed of young men for his eloquence, and beloued also of olde men for his honest life, the which was very graue, modest, and contented with his owne, desiring no mans els. Whereby men found, that the reason he alleged for following of Alexander in this voyage, was true: for he said that he came to be an humble suitor to the king to restore his banished citizens into their countrie againe, and to replenish their cite with inhabitants. Now, though his estimation made him chiefly to be enuyed, yet did he him selfe geue his enemies occasion to accuse him: For oftentimes being inuited by the king to supper, either he would not come, or if he came, he would be mute, and say nothing, shewing by his grauery and silence, that nothing pleased him that was either said or done. Whereupon Alexander selfe said on a time vnto him:

I can not thinke that person vnwise, That in his owne case hath no eyes.

It is reported of him also, that being at supper on a time with the king, diuers requesting him to make an oration on the suddain in commendation of the MACEDONIANS: he made such an eloquent oration vpon that matter, that all they that heard him rose from the borde, and clapping their hands for ioy, cast nosegayes and flowers vpon him. But yet Alexander at that time said vnto him that, which the Poet Euripides said:

It is no maystry to be eloquent, In handling of a plentiful argument.

Nay, but vnter then thy eloquence in reproving of the MACEDONIANS, that hearing their fautes, they may learne to amend. Then Callisthenes chaunging copy, spake boldly many things against the MACEDONIANS: Declaring, that the dissention amongst the GREEKS did increase king Philip's power, alleaging these verses:

Callisthenes, and Anaxarchus, do comfort Alexander.

The cause why Callisthenes was so reuenged.

But by this occasiō, he purchased him selfe great ill will of the MACEDONIANS in so much, as Alexander selfe said at that time, that he had not so much shewed his eloquence, as the noblest & ancientest men among the MACEDONIANS durst but whisper one in an others eare, though they did all vtterly mislike it: whereby he did yet deliuer GRACE from open shame, & Alexander from a greater, bringing him from that manner of adoration of his person. This notwithstanding, he vndid him selfe because he would seeme rather by presumption to bringe him to it, then by reason to perswade him. CHARES MITYLENIAN hath written, that Alexander hauing dronke at a certain feast where he hapned to be, reached his cuppe vnto one of his frendes, who after he had taken it of him, rose vp first on his feete, and dranke also, turning him towards the goddes, and first making solemne reuerence, he went and killed Alexander, and then late him downe againe. All the rest that were at the feast, did the like one after another, and Callisthenes also, who tooke the cuppe when it came to his turne, (the king not looking on him, but talking with Hephæstus) after he had dronke, came to the king to kisse him as others had done. Howbeit one Demetrius called Phidus, said vnto the king, kisse him not: I pray your grace, for hee of all men hath done you no reuerence. Alexander turned his head aside, and would not kisse him. Then cryed Callisthenes out aloud: well, y^e he, then I will goe my waie, with lesse then others, by a kisse. And thus beganne Alexanders grudge first against Callisthenes, by meanes whereof Hephæstus was credited the better, when he said that Callisthenes had promised him to reuerence Alexander, although that he had broken promise. After him also Lysimachus, Agnon, and diuers others beganne to plaie their partes against him, saying, that this Sophister went bragging vp and downe, as if he had destroyed a whole tyrannie, and that all the young men followed him to honor him, as if among so many thousand souldiers, neuer a man of them had so noble a hart as he. And therefore, when the treason of Hermolus against Alexander, person was discovered, they found the accusation probable, the which some false detractors had informed against Callisthenes: who had answered Hermolus that asked him, how he could come to be famous aboue all men, thus: in killing the famousest person. And to animate him to goe forward with this treason, he had told him further, that he should not be afraid of a golden bedde, but remember that he had to doe with a man, which was sometime sicke and hurte as other men were. This notwithstanding, there was neuer a one of Hermolus confederates, that would once name Callisthenes, what tormentes soeuer they abidde, to bewray who were their companions. And Alexander selfe also writing of this treason immediately after, vnto Craterus, Attalus, and Alceus, said, that their seruantes which had bene racked and put to the torter, did constantly affirme that they onely had conspired his death, and no man els was priuie vnto it. But afterwarde, he sent an other letter vnto Antipater, wherein he directly accused Callisthenes, and said, that his seruantes had already bene stoned to death by the MACEDONIANS, howbeit that he him selfe would afterwards also punish the master, and those that had sent vnto him, and that had receiued the murtherers into their cities, who came of purpose to kill him. And therein he plainly shewed the ill will he bare vnto Aristotle, for that Callisthenes had bene brought vp with him, being his kinsman, and the sonne of Hero, Aristotles neece. Some saie, that Alexander trusted Callisthenes vp. Others againe report, that he died of sickness in prison. Neuertheles CHARES writeth, that Callisthenes was kept prisoner seuen moneths together, because he should haue had his iudgement in open counsaill euen in the presence of Aristotle him selfe: howbeit, being very farte, he

As he was eaten in the ende by lice, and so died, about the time that Alexander was hurt, fighting against the MALTIAN Oxydracians, in the conquest of INDIA, but these things chanced a good while after. Demetrius CORINTHIAN being very old, had a great desire to see Alexander: and when he had seene him, he said that the GREEKES which were dead long before, were deprived of that blisse and happyness: that they could not see Alexander sitte in the royall seat of king Darius. Howbeit, he did not long enioy the kinges good will vnto him, for he died of a sickness soone after he came vnto his campe, & Alexander did honor his funerals for all the armie in their armor did cast vp a mōūte of earth facioned like a tombe, which was a great compasse about, & foure score cubittes high. His ashes afterwarde were brought with an honorable conuoy, vnto the sea side, in a charriot with foure hōffes richly set out.

Alexander being ready to take his iorney to goe conquer INDIA, perceyuing that his armie was very heavy & vnwildom to remoue, for the wonderful carriage and spoiles they had with them, the carres one morning being loden, he first burnt his owne carriage, & next his tentes, & then commaunded that they should also set the carriage of the MACEDONIANS a fire, which counsell seemed more dangerous to be resolued of, then the prooffe of the execution fell out difficulte. For there are very few of them that were angry therewith, & the most part of them (as if they had bene secretly moued by some god) with lowde cryes of ioy, one of them gaue vnto an other such necessary things as they had neede of, and afterwarde of them selues did burne and spoile all the rest. This made Alexander much more rigorous then he was before, besides that he was already become cruell enough, and without mercy or perdon, did sharply punish euery man that offended. For hauing commaunded Menander one of his frendes, to kepe him a strong holde: he put him to death, because he would not remaine there. Furthermore, he him selfe slue Ordatas (a captaine of the barbarous people) with a darte, for that he rebelled against him. About that time, there was an ewe that had eaned a lambe, which had upon her head, the forme and purple culler of the kinges hatte, after the PERSIAN manner, called Tiara, hauing two stones hanging on each side of it. Alexander abhorred this monstrous signe, in so much as he poured him selfe by certain BABYLONIAN priestes, which he alwayes caried about with him for that purpose, and said vnto his frendes: that this monster did not so much moue him for respect of him selfe, as it did for them, fearing that the goddes after his death had predestined the force and power of his kingdom to fall into the handes of some Oyle reserued in the waynes.

D base cowardly person. This notwithstanding, an other signe and token which chanced in the necke of that, did take away this feare and discouragement he had. For a MACEDONIAN called Proxenus, that had charge of the kinges carriage, as he digged in a certain place by the riuier of Oxus, to set vp the kinges tent and his lodging, he found a certain fatte and oyle vaine, which after they had drawn out the first, there came out also an other cleerer, which differed nothing, neither in smell, taste, nor fauor, from naturall oyle, hauing the glosse and fannes so like, as there could be discerned no difference betwene them: the which was so much more to be wondered at, because that in all that contry there were no olyues. They say also, that the water of the riuier selfe of Oxus is very soft, & maketh their skinnes fatte, which wash or bathe them selues therein. And yet it appeareth by that which Alexander selfe wrote vnto Antipater, that he was very glad of it, putting that amongst the greatest signes which the goddes had sent vnto him. The Soothelayers did interpret this wonder, that it was a signe, that he should haue a noble, but yet a painefull voyage: for the goddes, said they, haue geuen oyle vnto men to refresh their wearynes. And truly so did he susteine many daungers in those warres, and was oftentimes hurt in fight. But the greatest losse he had of his men, was for lacke of vittells, and by the infection of the ayer. For he, struiuing to ouercome fortune by valiantnes, and her force by vertue, thought nothing impossible for a valiant man, neither any thing able to withstand a noble harre. It is reported, that when he went to besiege a strong holde which Sisimethres kept, being thought vnfallable, and that his souldiers were in dispeire of it: he asked one Oxyarthes, what hart Sisimethres had. Oxyarthes answered him, that he was the veriest coward in the world. O, that is well, y^e Alexander: then it is to be wonne, if that be true thou saiest, sithence the captaine of the peece is but a coward. So he tooke it of a fodaine, by putting Sisimethres in a great feare. After that also, he did besiege an other peece of as great strength, and difficultie to assault as the other, and making the young souldiers of the MACEDONIANS to go to thassault, he called one of them vnto him, whose name also was Alexander, vnto whom he said thus, Alexander, this daie thou must fight like a man, and it be but for thy name sake. The young man did not forget his words, for he fought so valliantly, that he was slaine, for whom Alexander was very sory. An other time when his men were affraid, & durst not come nere vnto the cite of NISA to assault, because there ranne a very deepe riuer hard by the walles: he came to the riuers side, and said; oh, what a coward am I, that neuer learned to swimme; and so prepared him selfe to swimme ouer upon his shilde. After he had caused them to reit from the assault, there came ambassadors vnto him from the cities besieged, to craue pardon of him. They wondered at him at the first, when they saw him armed, without any pompe or other ceremonie about him: but much more, when a chaier was brought him to sit downe on, that he commaunded the oldest man amongst them called Acuphis, to take it to him; and sit him downe. Acuphis marveling at Alexanders great curtesie, asked him: what they should doe for him, thenceforth to be his good frendes. I will, said Alexander, that they from whom thou comest as ambassador vnto vs, doe make thee their king: and withall that they doe send me a hundred of their best men for hostages. Acuphis, smiling, answered him againe: but I shall rule them better, O king, if I send you the worst, and not the best. There was a king called Taxiles a very wise man, who had a great contrie in INDIA, no lesse in biggnes and circuit then all EGYPT, and as full of good pasture and frutes as any country in the world could be: who came on a tyme to salute Alexander, and sayd vnto him. What should we neede, Alexander, to fight, and make warres one with an other, if thou comest not to take away our water, and our necessary commoditie to liue by: for which thinges, men of iudgement must needs fight. As for other goods, if I be richer then thou, I am ready to giue thee of myne: and if I haue lesse, I will not thinke skorne to thanke thee, if thou wilt giue me some of thine. Alexander being pleased to heare him speake thus wisely, embraced him, and sayd vnto him. Thinkest thou this meeting of ours can be without fight, for all these goodly fayre wordes? no, no, thou hast wonne nothing by that: for I will fight and contend with thee in honestie and curtesie, because thou shalt not exceede me in bowtie and liberalitie. So Alexander taking diuers gifts of him, but giuing more vnto Taxiles: he dranke to him one night at supper, and said, I drinke to thee a thousand talents in gold. This geste misliked Alexanders friendes: but in recompence thereof, he wanne the hartes of many of those barbarous Lordes and Princes of that country. There was a certaine number of souldiers of the INDIANS, the warlikest men of all that country: who being mercenary souldiers, were euer enterentyed in seruice of the great free cities, which they valiantly defended, and did great hurt vnto Alexander in diuers places. Alexander hauing made peace with them in a cite where they were kept in: when they came abrode upon suertie of this peace which they had made, he met with them as they went their way, and put them all to the sword. There was but this onely fault, to bleamish the honor of his noble deedes in all his warres: for in all thinges els, he shewed mercy and equitie. Furthermore, the graue Philosophers and wise men of INDIA did greatly trouble him also. For they reproued the kinges and Princes of the INDIANS for that they yielded vnto Alexander, & procured the free cities to take armes against him. But by their occasion, he tooke diuers of their cities. For king Porus, Alexander selfe writeth in his Epistles, all his actes at large which he did against him. For he sayth, that both their camps lying on either side of the riuer of Hydaspes, king Porus set his Elephants upon the banke of the riuer with their heades towards their enemies, to keepe them from passing ouer: and that he him selfe did continually make a noise and tumult in his campe, to acquaint his men not to be affraid of the barbarous people. Furthermore, that in a darke night when there was no moone light, he tooke part of his footemen, & the choice of his horsemen, and went farre from his enemies to get ouer into a litle llande. When he was come into the llande, there fell a wonderful shower of raine, great windes, lightnings and thunders upon his campe, inso much as he saw many of his men burnt by lightning in this litle llande. This notwithstanding, he did not leaue to get ouer to the other side of the riuer. The riuer being swollen with the great flood of rayne that fell the night before, ouerflowing the bankes, it did eate into the ground where the water ranne: so that Alexander when he had

A had passed ouer the riuer, and was come to the other side, found him selfe in very ill case, for that he could hardly keepe his feete, because the earth was very slippery vnder him, and the rage of the water had eaten into it, and broke it downe on euery side. It is written of him, that then he sayd vnto the ATHENIANS: O ATHENIANS, could ye thinke that I could take such paines, and put my selfe into so many daungers, onely to be praised of you? Thus Osefervitus reporteth it. But Alexander selfe writeth, that they left their rafters or great peeces of tymber pinned together whereupon they had passed ouer the streame of the mayne riuer: and that they waded thorow the other arme or gutt of the water which had broken the earth, vnto their breasts with their harnesse on their backs. Furthermore, when he had passed ouer both waters, he rode with his horsemen twenty furlonges before the battell of his footemen: thinking that if his enemies came to giue him charge with their men of armes, that he was the stronger: and if they would also aduance their footemen forward, that his footemen also should come tyme enough. One of the twaine fel out as he had gessed. For a thousand horsemen, and three skore charrets armed with his ennemies, gaue him charge before their great company, whom he ouerthrew, and tooke all their charrets, & slue foure hundred of the men of armes in the fildes. King Porus then knowing by those signes that Alexander was there in person, and had passed ouer the riuer: he marched towards him with all his armie in battell ray, sauing a few which he left behinde to resist the MACEDONIANS, if they shewed force to passe ouer the riuer. Alexander being affraid of the great multitude of his ennemies, and of the terror of the Elephants, did not giue charge upon the middelt of the battell, but being him selfe in the left winge, gaue charge upon the corner of the enemies left winge, and also commaunded them that were in the right winge to doe the like. So, both the endes of the enemies armie were broken and put to flight: and they that fled, ranne vnto the Elephants, & gathered them selues together about them. Thus the battell being begon, the conflict continued long, inso much as the enemies were scantily all ouerthrowne by three of the clocke in the afternoone. Many writers doe agree, that Porus was foure cubits and a shaft length hier and bigger then the Elephant, although the Elephant was very great, and as bigge as a horse: and besides that the Elephant did shew great wit and care, to saue the king his Maister. For whilest he perceyued his Maister was stronge enough, he lustily repulst those which came to assaile him: but when he found that he began to faint, hauing many woundes upon his body, and arrowes sticking in it: then being affraid lest his Maister should fall downe from his backe, he softly fell on his knees, and gently taking his dartes and arrowes with his troncke, which he had in his body, he plucked them all from him one after an other. Porus being taken, Alexander asked him, howe he should handle him, princely, answered Porus. Alexander asked him agayne, if he would saye any thing els. I comprehend all, sayde he, in this word princely. Thereupon Alexander did not onely leaue him his provinces and Realmes, whereof before he was king, by the name of his Liefetenant: but gaue him many other contries also. When he had subdued all the free people, of the which there were fiftene severall nations, fise thousand of no small cities, besides an infinite number of villages, and thryle as many other contries: he made Philip one of his friendes, his Liefetenant of all those contries: his horse Bucephalus dyed at this battell, not in the fildes, but afterwards whilest he was in cure for the woundes he had on his body: but as Osefervitus sayth, he dyed euen worse for very age. Alexander was as sory for his death, as if he had lost any of his familiar friendes: and for prooffe thereof, he built a great cite in the place where his horse was buryed, upon the riuer of Hydaspes, the which he called after his name, Bucephalia. It is reported also, that hauing lost a dogge of his called Peritas, which he had brought vnto of a whelp, and loued very dearely: he built also a cite, and called it after his name. Sotion writeth, that he hearde it reported thus of Potamon LESBIAN. This last battell against king Porus, killed the MACEDONIANS hartes, and made them that they had no desire to goe any further to conquer INDIA. For finding that they had such a doe to ouercome them, though they were but twenty thousand footemen, and two thousand horse, they spake yll of Alexander when he went about to compell them to passe ouer the ryuer of Ganges, vnderstanding by the contry men that it was two and thirty furlong ouer, and a hundred fadam deepe: and howe that the banke of the ryuer was full of souldiers, horsemen, and Elephants. For it was reported, that the kings of the GAN-ARIDS, & the PERSIANS were on thother side with foure score thousand horsemen, two hundred thousand footemen, eight thousand charretts or carts of warre wel armed, and six thousand Elephants of warre. This was no fable, nor frivulous tale. For, a king called Androcottus (who reigned not long after,) gaue vnto Seleucus, five hundred Elephants at one time, & conquered all INDIA with fixe hundred thousand fighting men. Alexander then offended with his mens refusal, kept close in his tent for certeine daies, and lay vpon the ground, saying, that he did not thank them, for all that they had done thithervnto, vnles they passed ouer the ryuer of Ganges also: And that to retorne backe againe, it was as much as to confesse that he had bene overcome. At the length, when he sawe and considered that there was great reason in his friendes perswasions which labored to comfort him, and that his souldiers came to the dore of his tent, crying and lamenting, humbly beseeching him to leade them backe againe: in thende he tooke pitie of them, and was contented to retorne. This notwithstanding, before he departed from those parties, he put forth many vaine and false deuises to make his name immortal amonge that people. He made armors of greater proportion then his owne, and mangers for horses, higher then the common fort: moreouer, he made bytts also fatte heauier then the common fort, and made them to be thrown and scattered abroad in euery place.

He built great altars also in honor of the godds, the which the kings of the PERSIANS haue in great veneration at this day: and passing ouer the riuer, doe make sacrifices there, after the manner of the GRECIANS. Androcottus at that time was a very young man, and sawe Alexan- der him selfe, and sayd afterwards, that Alexander had well nere taken and wonne all the con-try, the king which then reigned, was so hated of all his subiectes, for his wicked life, and base parentage he came of. Departing thence, he went to see the great sea Oceanum, and made di-uers boates with ores, in the which he easily went downe the riuers at his pleasure. Howbeit, this his pleasant going by water, was not without warre: for he would land oftentimes, and did assaile cities, and conquered all as he went. Yet in assailing the cite of the MALLIANS, (which they say are the warlikest men of all the INDIANS) he was almost slaine there. For, having with darts repulsed the enemies from the wall, he him selfe was the first man that sette foote on a ladder to gett vp, the which brake as soone as euer he was gotten vpon the ramper.
Then the barbarous people comming together against the wall, did throwe at him from beneath, and many tymes lighted vpon him. Alexander hauing fewe of his men about him, D made no more a doe, but leaped downe from the wall in the midst of his enemies, and by good happe lighted on his feete. His harnes making a great noyse with the fall, the barbarous people were afraid, thinking they had seene some light or spirite goe before him: so that at the first they all betooke them to their legges, and ranne scatteringly here and there. But after that, when they came againe to them selues, and sawe that he had but two gentlemen onely about him, they came and sette apon him of all handes, and fought with him at the sword or pulshe of the pyke, and so hurt him very fore through his armor: but one amonge the rest, being somewhat further of, gaue him such a terrible blowe with an arrowe, that he brake him through his curats, and thor him in at the side vnder his breast. The blow entred so into his body, that he fell downe on one of his knees. Whereupon, he that had stricken him with his arrow, ranne sodainly to him with a cimiter drawn in his hand. Howbeit Penceas & Limneus stepped before him, and were both hurt: Limneus was slaine presently, and Penceas fought it out, till at the length, Alexander selfe slew the barbarous man with his owne hand, after he had many greuous woundes vpon his body. At the length he had a blow with a dart on his necke that so astonished him, that he leane against the wall looking apon his enemies. In the meane time, the MACEDONIANS compassing him round about, tooke him, and caried him into his tent halfe in a sownde, and was past knowledge: Whereupon, there ranne a rumor straight in the campe, that Alexander was dead. They had much a doe to cut the arrowe asonder that was of wodde: so his curats being plucked with great paine, yet were they to plucke the arrow head out of his body, which stucke in one of his bones: the which as it is reported, was foure F fingers long, and three fingers broad. So that when they plucked it out, he sownded so oft, that he was almost dead. This notwithstanding, he ouercame the danger, and escaped. Being very weake, he kept diet a long time to recouer him selfe, and neuer came out of his tent: vntill he heard the MACEDONIANS cry, and make great noyse about his tent, desirous to see him. Then he put on a night gowne, and came out amongest them all, and after he had some sacrifice vnto the godds for recovery of his health, he went on his iorney againe, and in the same did conquer many great contreyes, and tooke diuers goodly cities. He did also take some of the wise men of the contry, which men doe all go naked, and therefore are called GRAMASOPHISTS; (to wit, Philosophers of INDIA) who had procured Sabbas to rebell against him, and had done great hurt vnto the MACEDONIANS. And because they were taken to be the sharpest and readiest of answer, he did put them (as he thought) many hard questions, & told them he would put the first man to death, that answered him worst, and so the rest in order, and made the eldest amonge them Iudge of their answers. The question he asked the first man, was this:

Whether the dead of the liuing, were the greater number. He answered, the liuing. For the dead sayd he, are no more men.

The second man he asked: whether the earth, or the sea brought forth most creatures. He answered, the earth. For the sea sayd he, is but a part of the earth.

To the third man: which of all beastes was the subtillest. That (sayd he) which man hetherto neuer knew.

To the fourth: why he did make Sabbas rebell? because sayd he, he should liue honorably, or dye vilely.

To the fift, which he thought was first, the daye, or the night? He answered, the daye, by a day. The king finding his answer straunge, added to this speech: strange questions, must needes haue strange answers.

Comming to the sixt man, he asked him: how a man should come to be beloued: If he be a good man sayd he, not terrible.

To the seuenth, how a man should be a god? In doing a thing, said he, impossible for a man.

To the eight, which was the ströger life or death life, said he, that suffreth so many troubles.

And vnto the ninth and last man: how long a man should liue? vntill sayd he, he thinke it better to dye, then to liue.

When Alexander had heard these answers, he turned vnto the Iudge, & bad him giue his iudgement vpon them. The Iudge said, they had all answered one worse then another. Then D that thou die first, said Alexander, because thou hast giuen such sentence: not so, O king, he if thou wilt not be a lier: because thou saidst, that thou wouldst kil him first, that had answered worst. In fine, Alexander did let them go with rewardes. He sent Onesivertus also vnto the other wise men of the INDIANS, which were of greatest fame amonge the, & that led a solitary & quiet lieto pray them to come vnto him. This Onesivertus the Philosopher, was Diogenes the Cinika scholler. It is reported, that Calanus one of these wise men, very sharply & proudly, bad him purge of his clothes, to heare his wordes naked: or otherwife that he would not speake to him, though he came from Iupiter him self. Yet Dandamis answered him more gently. For he hauing learned what maner of men Socrates, Pythagoras, and Diogenes were, said: that they seemed to haue bene wise men, & wel borne, notwithstanding that they had reuerenced the lawes too much in E their life time. Others write notwithstanding, that Dandamis said nothing els, but asked why Alexander had takē so painful a iorney in hand, as to come into INDIA. For Calanus (whose right name otherwife was Sphines) king Taxiles perswaded him to go vnto Alexander, who because he slured thoe he met, in the INDIAN tongue, saying Okeas much to sayds God. Eueye: rho GRECIANS named him Calanus. It is reported, that this Calanus did shew Alexander a figure & similitude of his kingdom, which was this. He threw downe before him a dry seare peece of leather, & then put his foote apon one of the endes of it. The leather being troden downe on that side, rose vp in al partes els, & going vp & downe with all still treading vpon the sides of the leather, he made Alexander see, that the leather being troden downe on the one side, & rose vp of al sides els, vntill such time as he put his foote in the midst of the leather, & then al the whole leather was plain aliue. His meaning thereby, was to let Alexander vnderstand, that the most part of his time he should keepe in the midst of his contry, & not to goe farre from it. Alexander continued seuen moneths traouling vpon the riuers, to goe to the great sea Oceanum. Then he rooke ship, & sailed into a little land called Scyllus, howbeit others call it Pitylus. There he landed, made sacrifices vnto the gods, & viewed the greames & nature of the sea, ceant, & all the situation of the coast upon that sea, as far as he could go. Then he made his prayers vnto the gods, that no conqueror liuing after him should go beyond the bounds of his journey & conquest, & so returned homeward. He commaunded his ships should fetch a compass about, & leave India on the right hand, & made Nearchus Admirall of all his fleet, & Ophichris chiefe Pilote. He him self in the meane time went by land through the contrie of the Araxes, & there he found great scarcitie of vittels, & lost many of his men so that he caried none out of India the fourth part of his men of war which he brought thither, which were in almoste score thousand footemen, & fifteen thousand horsemen. Some of the died of greuous diseases, others, by ill diet, others, by extreme heat & drowght, & the most of the by hunger, travelling through this barren contrie, where the poore men liued hardly, & had onely a few sheepe which they fed with sea fish, that made their flesh sauour very ill fauoured. At the length, when three score daies iorney he had painfully travelled through this contrie, he the entered into the cōtry called Gedrosia, where he found great plenty of all kind of vittels, which the gouernours, kings, & princes, neighbours vnto the same, did send vnto him. After he had refreshed his army there a litle, he wet through the cōtry of Carmania, where he continued fewe daies together banketing, going still through the contrie. For night & day, he was feasting continually with his friends upon a scaffold lōger then broad, rising vp of height, & drawn with eight goodly horse. After that scaffold followed diuers other chariots couered ouer, some with goodly rich arras, & purple silk, others with trim fresh boughes which they renewed at euery fields end: & in those were Alexanders other friends & captaines with garlands of flowers upon their heades, which dranke & made mery together. In all this armie, there was neither helmet, pike, dart, nor targette: but gold & silver bowles, cups, & flagons in the souldiers hands, all the way as they went, drawing wine out of great pipes & vessels which they caried with them, one drinking to another, some marching in the fields going forward, & others also set at the table. About the were the minstrels playing & piping on their flutes & shalmes, & some singing & dauncing, & fooling by the way as they wet. In all this dissolute marching through the cōtry, & in the middle of their dronkenies, they mingled with it sport, that euery mā did strue to counterfeate all the insolēcies of Bacchus, as if god Bacchus him self had ben there in person, & had led the momey. VVhen he came vnto the kings castel of Gedrosia, he staid there also certein daies to refresh his army with feasting & baketing. It is said, that one day when he had dronke hard, he went to see the games for dauncing, & amongst the, the games which a yong man called Bagoas had set forth, (with whom Alexander fell in liking) & bare the bel. This Bagoas being in his dauncing garments, came through the Theater, & sat him downe by Alexander. The Macedonians were so glad of it, that they shewted & clapped their hands for ioy, crying out alowde, to kisse him: so that in fine he toke him in his armes, & kised him, before them all. Thither came Nearchus his Admirall vnto him: who made report what he had sene & done in his nauigation. Alexander was so glad of that, as he was desirous to saile by sea him self: & so, entering into the sea oceanum by the mouth of Euphrates, with a great fleet of ships, to compass in all the coasts of Arabia & Africke, & thece into Mare Mediterraneum, by the straights of the pillars of Hercules. To this intent he built a great nūber of ships in the city of Thapsus, & sent for mariners, shipmasters, & pilots, out of all parts. But now, the difficultie of the iorney which he tooke upon him for the conquest of India, the danger he was in when he fought with the Mallians, & the nūber of his me which he lost besides which was very great, all these things considered together, making me beleue that he should neuer return with safetie: they made all the people (which he had conquered) bold to rise against him, & gaue his gouernours & Lieutenants of provinces occasion to commit great insolēcies, robberies, & exactions of people. To be short, it put all his kingdom in broile & sedition. In such as Olympius & Cleopatra rising against Antipater, they deuided his gouernment betwene the: Olympius choosing for her, the kingdō of Epirus; & Cleopatra, the kingdō of Macedon. Which when Alexander had heard, he said his mother was the wisest for the realme of Macedon would neuer haue suffred a womā to raigne ouer the. Therupon he sent Nearchus back again to the sea, deterning to fill all the sea coasts with warre. As he trauelled through

A through the cōtries farre fro the sea, he put his captaines & gouernours to death, which had revolted against him: & of those he slue Oxyartes, one of Abulites sonnes, by his own hād, rōning him thorow with a pike. And when Abulites self also had brought Alexander his showlders onely, without any other prouisiō made for vittels for his army: he made him put the money before his horse, which would not once touch it. Then sayd he vnto him: I pray thee to what purpose serueth this prouisiō? & therewithal immediatly committed him to prisō. As he came through the cōtry of Persia, he first renewed the old custō there, which was: that as often times as the kings did return home fro any far iorney, they gaue vnto euery womā a crown a peece. It is said therefore that for this cause, some of their natural kings many times did not returne again into their cōtry: & that Oechus amongst others did not so much as once returne back again, willingly banishing him self out of his cōtry, of niggardlines, because he would not be at this charge. After that, Cyrus tomb (king of Persia) being toid & broke vp, he put him to death that did it, although he were a Macedonian of the cite of Pella, (and none of the meanest) called Polymachus. When he had red the inscriptiō writte apō it in the Persian tongue, he would needs also haue it writte in the Greeke tongue: & this it was. O mā, vrthas so thou art, & vrthas neuer thou comest, fro I knowe thou shalt come. I am Cyrus that conquered the Empire of Persia, I pray thee enuy me not for this little earth that couereth my body. These words pearced Alexanders hart, when he considered the uncertainty of worldly things. There also, Calanus the Indian Philosopher, hauing had a flyxe a litle while, praied that they would make him a stacke of wod, such as they vse to burne dead bodies on, & then rode thither a horse back: & after he had made his praier vnto the godds, he calt those sprinklings upon him, which were vied to be sprinkled at the funerals of the dead. Then cutting of a locke of his heare before he went vp on the wodstacke, he bad all the Macedonians that were there farewell, & shooke them by the hands, praying the that day to be merry, and drinke freely with the king, whom he would see shortly after in the cite of Babylon. When he had said these words, he layd him down vpon the wodstacke, couered his face, & neuer sturred hand nor foote, nor quincned when the fire tooke him, but did sacrifice him self in this sort, as the manner of his contrie was, that the wife men should so sacrifice theselues. Another Indian also, who followed Julius Caesar, did the like many yeares after in the cite of Athens: & there is his tombe yet to be sene, commonly called the Indians tombe. When Alexander came from seing this sacrifice of Calanus, he did bid diuers of his friends & Captaines to D supper to him: & there did bring forth a crown for a reward vnto him that dranke best. He that drank most of all other, was one Promachus, that drank foure gallons of wine, & wan the crown, worth a talent: but he liued not aboue three dayes after. And of other also that fell in sport to quaffing, who should drink most, there died of the (as Chares writeth) one & forty persons: of an extreme cold that tooke the in their dronkenes & wine. VVhen they were in the cite of Susa, he married certein of his friends, & him self also married Statira, one of king Darius Daughters, disposing also of the other Persian Ladies (according to their estate and birth) vnto his best friends. He made also a solemne feast of comon mariages amongst the Macedonians, of the that had ben married before: At which feast, it is writte, that nine thousand persons sitting at the bords, he gaue vnto euery one of them a cup of gold to offer wine in honor of the gods. E And there also amongst other wōderful gifts, he did pay al the detts the Macedonians ought vnto their creditors, the which amounted vnto the summe of tenne thousand talents sauing a hundred & thirty lesse. VVherupon Antigenes with one eye, falsely putting in his name amongst the number of the detters, & bringing in one that said he had lent him money: Alexander caused him to be paid. But afterwards, when it was proued to his face, that there was no such matter: Alexander then was so offended with him, that he banished him his court, & deprived him of his captainship, notwithstanding that he had before shewed him self a valiant mā in the wars. For when he was but a yong man, he was shot into the eye, before the city of Perinth, which king Philip did beleage: & at that present time they would haue plucked the arrow out of his eye, but he neuer fainted for it, neither would suffer the to pul it out, before he had first driue his enemies within the wals of their cite. He toke this infamy very inwardly, & he was so sorry for it, that euery mā might see he was like to die for sorow. The Alexander hearing he should die, did pardō him, & bad him besides kepe the money which was giue him. Now the 3000.

young boyes which Alexander had left to the government of Captaines, to trayne & exercise them in the discipline of warre: they being grown strong men, & lusty youtthes, excellently well trained & ready in armes: Alexander reioyced when he saw them. This notwithstanding did much discourage the MACEDONIANS, & made them greatly affraid, because they thought that from thenceforth the king would make lesse accompt of the. For when Alexander would haue sent the sicke and impotent persons, which had bene maimed in the warres, into the low contry, to the sea side: they answered him, that so doing he should do them great wronge, to send these poore men from him in that sort, after they had done him all the seruice they could home to their contry & friends, in worse case then he tooke them from thence. And therefore they said, if he would send away some, let him send them all away as men vnseruiceable, specially sithence he had now such goodly yong daunters about him, with whom he might go conquer the world. Alexander was maruelously offended with their proud words, inso much that in his anger he reuiled them all, put away his ordinary gard, & tooke other PERSIANS in their place, making some the gard about his owne person, others, his vishers, heralds, & ministers to execute his will and commandement. The poore MACEDONIANS seeing Alexander thus waited on, & them selues so shamefully reiecte: they let fall their stoutnes, and after they had comoned of the matter together, they were ready to teare the selues for spite & malice. In fine whē they had laid their heads together, they consented to go vnto his tent & without weapons, naked in their shirts to yeld the selues vnto him, weeping & howling, beseeching him to do with the what pleased him, & so vnto the like reiecte vnthankful creatures. But Alexander, though his anger was now somewhat pacified, did not receiue the first time, neither did they also go to their waies, but remained there 2. daies & nights together, in this pitiful state, before the dore of his tent, lamenting vnto him, & calling him their loueraine & king: vntill that he came him self out of his tent the third day, & seeing the poore wretches in this greuous & pitiful state, he him self fel a weeping a long time. So, after he had a litle rebuked the, he called the curteously, & gaue the impotent & sicke persons leaue to depart home, rewarding the very honorably. Furthermore, he wrote vnto Antipater his Lieutenant, that he should alwaies giue the the highest place in al comon sports & assemblies, & that they should be crowned with garlands of flowers. Moreover, he commaunded that the orphans whose parents were slaine in the warres, should receiue the pay of their fathers. After Alexander was come vnto the cite of ECBATANA, in the kingdō of MEDIA, & that he had dispatched his waighiest causes: he gaue him self again vnto D publike sports, feasts, & pastimes, for that there were newly come vnto him out of GREECE, thousand excellent masters & deuisers of such sports. About that time it chauced, that Hephestion fell sicke of an agew. But he being a young man of warre, did not regard his mouth as he should haue done, but hauing spied oportunitie that his Phisitian Glaucus was gone vnto the Theater, to see the sports & pastimes: He went to dinner, and ate a roasted Capon whole, and dranke a great pot full of wine, which he had caused to be set in water: whereuppon his fever tooke him so sorely, that he liued not long after. Alexander vnwisely tooke the chauce of his death, & commaunded all the heares of his horse & mules to be presently shorn in toke of mourning, & that al the battlemēts of the walls of cities should also be ouerthrowne, & hong vpon Glaucus his Phisitian vpon a crosse, & commaunded that no minstrel should be heard play of any kind of instrument within his campe: vntill that there was brought him an oracle from Insipier Hammon, commaunding that Hephestion should be worshipped & sacrificed vnto, as a deny god. In thend, to passe ouer his mourning and sorow, he went vnto the warres, as vnto a hunting of men, and there subdued the people of the COSSARIANS, whom he pluckt vp by the rootes, and slue man, woman, and childe. And this was called the sacrifice of Hephestions funerals. Alexander furthermore being desirous to bestowe tenne thousand talents coste vpon his obsequies and funerals, and also to exceede the charge by the rarenes and excellencie of workemanshippe: amongst all other excellent workemasters, he desired one Stasirates, for he had euer passing inuention, and his worke was alwayes stately and sumptuous in any newe thinges he tooke in hande. For he talking one daye with Alexander, tolde him, that of all the Mountaynes he knewe in the worlde, he thought there was none more excellent to resemble the statue or image of a man, then was Mount Atho in THRACIA: and that if it were his

A his pleasure, he would make him the noblest and most durable image, that should bee in the world, which in his left hand should hold a citie to containe ten thousand persons, and out of his right hand, there should runne a great riuer into the sea. Yet Alexander would not harken to him, but then was talking with other workemen of more strange inuentions, & farre greater cost. Now as he was ready to take his iorney to go vnto BABYLON: Nearchus his Admirall came againe vnto him from the great sea Oceanum, by the riuer of Euphrates, and tolde him, how certaine CHALDEANS Soothlayers came vnto him, who did warne him that he should not goe into BABYLON. Howbeit Alexander made no reckoning of it, but went on. But when he came hard to the walls of BABYLON, he saw a great number of crows fighting & killing one of another, & some of them fell downe deade hard by him. Afterwards being tolde him that Agapollodorus the gouernor of the citie of BABYLON, hauing sacrificed vnto the goddesses, to knowe what should happen to him: he sent for the Soothlayer Pithagoras, to knowe of him if it were true. The Soothlayer denied it not. Then Alexander asked him, what signes he had in the sacrifice. He answered, that the lyuer of the beaſt had no head. O gods, said Alexander then, this is an ill signe: notwithstanding he did Pithagoras no hurt, but yet he repented him that he did not beleue Nearchus words. For this respect therefore Alexander lay much abroad in the contry from BABYLON, & did take his pleasure rowing vp & downe the riuer of Euphrates. Yet had he many other ill signes & tokes one vpō another, that made him affraid. For there was a tame asse that killed one of the greatest & goodliest Lions in all BABYLON, with one of his fecte. Another time when Alexander had put of his clothes, to be noynted to play at tennis: When he should put on his apparel againe, the yong gentlemen that plaied with him, found a man set in his chaire of estate, hauing the kings diademe on his head, & his gowne on his back, & said neuer a word. Then they asked him what he was: It was long before he made them answer, but at the length comming to him self, he said his name was Dionysius, borne in MESSINA: & being accused for certain crimes committed, he was sent from the sea thither, where he had bene a long time prisoner, & also that the god Serapis had appeared vnto him, & vndone his irons, & that he commaunded him to take the kings gowne & his diademe, and to sit him downe in his chaire of estate, & say neuer a word. When Alexander heard it, he put him to death according to the counsaile of his Soothlayers: but then his mind was troubled, & feared that the gods had forsaken him, & also grew to suspect his friends. But first of all, Alexander feared Antipater & his D sonnes, aboue all other. For one of them called Tolus, was his first cupbearer: & his brother called Cassander, was newly come out of GREECE vnto him. The first time that Cassander saw some of the barbarous people reuerencing Alexander, he hauing bene brought vp with the libertie of GREECE, & had neuer seene the like before: fel into a lowd laughing very vnreuerently. Therewith king Alexander was so offended, that he tooke him by the heare of his head with both his hands, & knocked his head & the wal together. Another time also when Cassander did answer some that accused his father Antipater: king Alexander tooke him vp sharply, & said vnto him, What failest thou, said he? Doost thou thinke that these men would haue gon so long a iorney as this, fally to accuse thy father, if he had not done them wrong? Cassander againe replied vnto Alexander, & said, that that was a manifest prooffe of their false accusation, for that they did now E accuse him being so farre off, because they thought they could not sodainly be disproued. Alexander thereat fel a laughing a good, & said, lo, these are Aristotles quiddities to argue pro & contra: but this wil not saue you from punishment, if I find that you haue done these men wronge. In fine, they report that Cassander tooke such an inward feare & conceit vpon it, that long time after when he was king of MACEDON, and had all GREECE at his commandement: going vp and downe the citie of DELPHES, and beholding the monuments and images that are there, he found one of Alexander, which put him into such a sodaine feare, that the heares of his head stoode vp right, and his body quaked in such sort, that it was a great time before he could come to him selfe againe. Nowe after that Alexander had left his trust and confidence in the goddesses, his minde was so troubled and affraide, that no strange thinge happened vnto him, F (how litle so euer it was) but he tooke it straight for a signe and prediction from the gods: so that his tent was alwayes full of Priestes and Soothlayers that did nothing but sacrifice and purifie, and tende vnto diuinements. So horrible a thing, is the mistrust and contempt of the goddess, when it is begotten in the hearts of men, and superstition also so dreadfull, that it filleth A the gilty consciences and fearefull hartes like water distilling from above: as at that time it filled Alexander with all folly, after that feare had once possessed him. This notwithstanding, after that he had received some answers touching Hephestion from the oracle of Jupiter Hammon, he left his sorrow, and returned again to his banquets and feasting. For he did sumptuously feast Nearchus, and one day when he came out of his bath according to his manner, being ready to goe to bed, Medius one of his Capteines befought him to come to a banquet to him at his lodging. Alexander went thither, and dranke there all that night and the next day, so that he got an ague by it. But that came not (as some write) by drinking vpp Hercules cuppe all at a draught: neither for the sodaine paine he felt betwene his shouliders, as if he had bene thrust into the backe with a speare. For all these were thought to be written by some, for lies and fables, because they would haue made the end of this great tragedie lamentable and pitifull. But Aristobolus writeth, that he had such an extreame feuer and thirst withall, that he dranke wine, & after that fel a rauing, & at the legh dyed the thirtie day of the month of Iune. In his household booke of things passed dayly, it is written, that his feuer beeing apon him, he slept in his hottchouise on the eyghteenth day of Iune. The next morning after he was come out of his hottchouise, he went into his chamber, and passed away all that daye with Medius, playing at dyce: and at nyght very late, after he had bathed him selfe and sacrificed vnto the goddess, he fell to meate, and had his feuer that nyght. And the twenty daye also, bathing him selfe againe, and making his ordinary sacrifice to the goddess, he did sitte downe to eate within his toooue, harkening vnto Nearchus that tolde him straunge thinges he had seene C in the great sea Oceanum. The one and twenty day also hauing done the like as before, he was much more inflamed then he had bene, & felt him selfe very ill all night, and the next day following in a great feuer: and on that day he made his bed to be remoued, and to be set vppe by the fish ponde, where he communed with his capteines touching certaine roomes that were void in his armie, and commaunded them not to place any men that were not of good experience. The three and twenty day hauing an extreame feuer vpon him, he was caried vnto the sacrifices, and commaunded that his chiefe Captieines onely should remaine in his lodging, and that the other meaner sort, as centiniers or Lieutenants of bands, that they should watch & ward without. The foure and twenty day, he was caried vnto the other pallace of the kings, which is on thother side of the lake, where he slept a litle, but the feuer neuer left him: & when D his Capteines & noble men came to doe him humble reuerence, & to see him, he lay speechles. So did he the fife and twenty day also: insomuch as the MACEDONIANS thought he was dead. Then they came & knocked at the pallace gate, & cried out vnto his friendes and familiers, and threatned them, so that they were compelled to open them the gate. Thereupon the gates were opened, & they comming in their gownes went vnto his bed side to see him. That selfe day Python & Seleucus were appointed by the kings friends to go to the temple of the god Serapis, to knowe if they should bringe king Alexander thither. The god answered them, that they should not remoue him from thence. The eight and twenty day at night Alexander dyed. Thus it is written word for word in manner, in the household booke of remembrance. At that present tyme, there was no suspicion that he was poysoned. Yet they say, that six yeares after, E there appeared some prooffe that he was poysoned. Whereupon his mother Olympias put many men to death, and cast the ashes of Iolas into the wind, that was dead before, for that it was said he gaue him poyson in his drinke. They that think it was Aristotle that counselled Antipater to do it, by whose meane the poyson was brought: they say that Agnathemus reported it, hauing heard it of king Antigonus owne mouth. The poyson (as some say) was cold as life, and fallest from a rocke in the territory of the cite of NONACRIS, & it is gathered as they would gather a deawe into the horne of the foote of an asse, for there is no other kinde of thinge that will keepe it, it is so extreme cold & percing. Others defend it, & say, that the report of his poysoning is vnttrue: & for prooffe therof they alleage this reason, which is of no smal importance, that is: That the chiefe Captieines fel at great variance after his death, so that the corps of A- F lexander remained many dayes naked without buriall, in a whor dry contry, & yet there neuer appeared any signe or token apon his body, that he was poysoned, but was still a cleane and

A faire corps as could be. Alexander left Roxane great with childe, for the which the MACEDONI- ANS did her great honor: but she did malice Statira extreame, & did finely deceiue her by a counterfeit letter she sent, as if it had come from Alexander, willing her to come vnto him. But when she was come, Roxane killed her and her filter, and then threw their bodies into a well, and filled it vp with earth, by Perdiccas helpe and consent. Perdiccas came to be king, immediately after Alexanders death, by meanes of Arideus, whom he kept about him for his guard and safety. This Arideus, being borne of a common trumpet and common woman, called philinna, was halfe lunaticke, not by nature nor by chaunce: but, as it is reported, put out of his wits when he was a young towardy boy, by drinckes, which Olympias caused to be geuen him, and thereby continued franckie.

THE LIFE OF Iulius Caesar.

What time Sylla was made Lord of all, he would haue had Caesar put away his wife Cornelia, the daughter of Cinna Dictator: but when he saw, he could neither with any promise nor threat bring him to it, he tooke her ioynter away from him. The cause of Caesars ill will vnto Sylla, was by meanes of marriage: for Marius the elder, married his fathers own sister, by whom he had Marius the younger, whereby Caesar & he were cofin germanes. Sylla being troubled in waighie matters, putting to death so many of his enemies, when he came to be conqueror, he made no reckoning of Caesar: but he was not contented to be hidden in safety, but came and made sute vnto the people for the Priesthoodshippe that was voyde, when he had scant any heare on his face. Howbeit he was repulsd by Syllas meanes, that secretly was against him. Who, when he was determined to haue killed him, some of his friendes told him, that it was to no purpose to put so young a boy as he to death. But Sylla told them againe, that they did not consider that there were many Marians in that young boy. Caesar vnderstanding F that, stole out of Rome, and hidde him selfe a long time in the contrie of the SABINES, wandring still from place to place. But one day being caried from house to house, he fell into the handes of Syllas souldiers, who searched all those places, and tooke them whom they found hidden. Caesar bribed the Captaine, whose name was Cornelius, with two talentes which he gaue him. After he had escaped them thus, he went vnto the sea side, and tooke shippes, and sailed into BITHYNIA to goe vnto king Nicomedes. When he had bene with him a while, he tooke sea againe, and was taken by pyrates about the Ile of PHARMACUSA: for those pyrates kept all vpon that sea coast, with a great flecte of shippes and bores. They asking him at the first twentie talentes for his ranfome, Caesar laughed them to scorne, as though they knew not what a man they had taken, & of him selfe promised them fiftie talentes. Then he sent his men vp and downe to get him this money, so that he was left in manner alone among these theues of the CILICIANS, (which are the cruellst butchers in the world) with one of his friends, and two of his slaues only: and yet he made so litle reckoning of them, that when he was desirous to sleepe, he sent vnto them to commaunde them to make no noyse. Thus he was eight and thirtie dayes among them, not kept as prisoner, but rather waited vpon by them as a Prince. All this time he would boldly exercise him selfe in any sporte or pastime they would goe to. And other while also he would wryte verses, and make orations, and call them together to say them before them: and if any of them seemed as though they had not vnderstoode him, or passed not for them, he called them blockheades, and brute beastes, and laughing, threatned them that he would hang them vp. But they were as merie with the matter as could be, and tooke all in good parte, thinking that this his bold speech came, through the simplicitie of his youth. So when his ranfome was come from the cite of MILETVM, they being paid their money, and he againe set at libertie: he then presently armed, and manned out certaine shippes out of the haven of MILETVM, to follow those theues, whom he found yet riding at anchor in the same lland. So he tooke the most of them, & had the spoile of their goods, but for their bodies, he brought them into the city of PERGAMVM, & there committed the to prison, while he him selfe went to speake with Iunius, who had the gouernment of ASIA, as vnto whom the execution of these pirats did belong, for that he was Prator of that contrie. But this Prator hauing a great fancie to be fingering of the money, because there was good store of it: answered, that he would consider of these prisoners at better leasure. Caesar leauing Iunius there, returned againe vnto PERGAMVM, and there hung vp all these theues openly vpon a crosse, as he had oftentimes promised them in the Ile he would doe, when they thought he did but ieast. Afterwards when Syllas power beganne to decay, Caesars frendes wrote vnto him, to pray him to come home againe. But he failed first vnto RHODES, to studie there a time vnder D. Apollonius the sonne of Molon, whose scholler also Cicero was, for he was a very honest man, & an excellent good Rethoritian. It is reported that Caesar had an excellent naturall gift to speake well before the people, & besides that rare gift, he was excellently well studied, so that doubtlesse he was counted the second man for eloquence in his time, and gaue place to the first, because he would be the first and chiefe man of warre and authoritie, being not yet comen to the degree of perfection to speake well, which his nature coulde haue performed in him, because he was geuen rather to followe waies and to mannage great matters, which in thende brought him to be Lord of all ROME. And therefore in a booke he wrote against that which Cicero made in the praise of Cato, he prayeth the readers not to compare the stile of a fouldier, with the eloquence of an excellent Orator, that had followed it the most part of his life. E When he was returned againe vnto ROME, he accused Dolabella for his ill behavior in the gouernment of his prouince, and he had diuers cities of GRECE that gaue in euidence against him. Norwithstanding, Dolabella at the length was dismissed. Caesar, to requite the good will of the GRECIANS, which they had shewed him in his accusation of Dolabella, tooke their cause in hand, when they did accuse Publius Antonius before Marcus Lucullus, Prator of MACEDON: and followed it so hard against him in their behalfe, that Antonius was driuen to appeale before the Tribunes at ROME, alleaging, to colour his appeale withall, that he coulde haue no iustice in GRECE against the GRECIANS. Now Caesar immediatly wan many mens good willes at ROME, through his eloquence, in pleading of their causes: and the people loued him maruelously also, because of the courteous manner he had to speake to euery man, and to vse them gently, being more ceremonious therein, then was looked for in one of his yerres. Furthermore, he euer kept a good bourde, and fared well at his table, and was very liberal

besides:

A besides: the which in deede did aduance him forward, and brought him in estimation with the people. His enemies iudging that this fauor of the common people would soone quale, when he could no longer hold out that charge and expence: suffered him to runne on, till by litle and litle he was growen to be of great strength & power. But in fine, when they had thus geuen him the briddell to grow to this greatnes, and that they could not then pull him backe, though in deede in fight it would turne one day to the destruction of the whole state and common wealth of ROME: too late they found, that there is not so litle a beginning of any thing, but continuance of time will soone make it strong, when through contempt there is no impediment to hinder the greatnes. Thereupon, Cicero like a wise shipmaster that feareth the calmines of the sea, was the first man that mistrusting his manner of dealing in the common wealth, found out his craft & malice, which he cunningly cloyed vnder the habit of outward curtesie and familiaritie. And yet, sayd he, when I consider howe finely he cometh his faire bush of heare, and how smooth it lyeth, and that I see him scrat his head with one finger only: my minde giues me then, that such a kinde of man should not haue so wicked a thought in his head, as to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth. But this was long time after that. The first thewe and prooffe of the loue and good will which the people did beare vnto Caesar, was: when he sued to be Tribune of the souldiers (to wit, Colonell of a thousand footemen) standing against Caius Pompeilius, at what time he was preferred and chosen before him. But the second & more manifest prooffe then the first, was at the death of his aunt Julia, the wife of Marius the elder. For being her nephew, he made a solemne oration in the market place in commendation of her, and at her buriall did boldly venter to shew forth the images of Marius: the which was the first time that they were seene after Syllas victorie, because that Marius and all his confederates had bene proclaimed traitors and enemies to the common wealth. For when there were some that cried out apon Caesar for doing of it: the people on another side kept a furre, and reioycied at it, clapping of their handes, and thanked him, for that he had brought as it were out of hell, the remembrance of Marius honor againe into ROME, which had so long time bene obscured & buried. And where it had bene an auncient custom of long time, that the ROMANES vsed to make funerall orations in praise of olde Ladies and matrons when they dyed, but not of young women: Caesar was the first that praised his owne wife with funerall oration when she was deade, the which also did increase the peoples good willes the more, seeing him of so kinde & gentle nature. After the buriall of his wife, he was made Treasorer, vnder Antistius Vetus Prator, whom he honored euer after: so that when him selfe came to be Prator, he made his sonne to be chosen Treasorer. Afterwards, when he was come out of that office, he married his thirde wife Pompeia, hauing a daughter by his first wife Cornelia, which was married vnto Pompey the great. Now for that he was very liberal in expences, bying (as some thought) but a vaine and short glorie of the fauor of the people: (where in deede he bought good cheape the greatest things that coulde be.) Some say, that before he bare any office in the common wealth, he was growen in debt, to the summe of thirtene hundred talentes. Furthermore, because he was made ouerfeer of the worke, for the high way going vnto Appius, he disbursed a great summe of his owne money towards the charges of the same. E And on the other side, when he was made Aedilis, for that he did shew the people the pastime of three hundred & twentie couple of sword players, and did besides exceede all other in sumptuousnes in the sportes and common feastes which he made to delight them withall: (and did as it were drowne all the stately shewes of others in the like, that had gone before him) he so pleased the people, & wan their loue therewith, that they deuised daily to giue him new offices for to requite him. At that time there were two factions in ROME, to wit, the faction of Sylla, which was very strong and of great power, & the other of Marius, which then was vnder foote & durst not shew it selfe. But Caesar, because he would renew it againe, euen at that time when he being Aedilis, all the feasts and common sportes were in their greatest ruffe: he secretly caused images of Marius to be made, and of victories that caried triumphes, and those he set vp one night within the Capitol. The next morning when euery man saw the glittering of these golden images excellently well wrought, shewing by the inscriptions, that they were the victories which Marius had wonne apon the Cimbres: euery one marueled much at the boldnes of him that durst set them vp there, knowing well enough who it was. Hereupon, it ranne A straight through all the citie, and euerie man came thither to see them. Then some cried out upon Cæsar, and sayd it was a tyranny which he ment to set vp, by renting of such honors as before had bene troden vnder foote, and forgotten, by common decree and open proclamation: and that it was no more but a baite to gage the peoples good wils, which he had set out in the stately shewes of his cōmon playes, to see if he had brought them to his lure, that they would abide such partes to be played, and a new alteration of things to be made. They of Marius faction on thother side, incouraging one another, shewed them selues straight a great number gathered together, and made the mount of the Capitoll ring againe with their cries and clapping of handes: in so much as the teares ranne downe many of their cheekes for very ioy, when they sawe the images of Marius, and they extolled Cæsar to the skies, judging him the worthiest man of all the kindred of Marius. The Senate being assembled thereupon, Catulus Lutatius one of the greatest authoritie at that time in Rome, rose, and vehemently inueyed against Cæsar, and spake that then which euer since hath bene noted much: that Cæsar did not now covertly goe to worke, but by plaine force sought to alter the state of the common wealth. Neuerthelesse, Cæsar at that time answered him so that the Senate was satisfied. Thereupon they that had him in estimation did grow in better hope then before, & perswaded him, that hardly he should geue place to no man, and that through the good will of the people, he should be better than all they, and come to be the chiefe man of the citie. At that time, the chiefe Bishoppe Metellus dyed, and two of the notablest men of the citie, and of greatest authoritie (Isauricus, and Catulus) contended for his roome: Cæsar notwithstanding their contention, would geue neither of them both place, but presented him selfe to the people, and made sute for it as they did. The sute being equal betwext either of them, Catulus, because he was a man of greater calling and dignitie than the other, doubting the vncertaintie of the election sent vnto Cæsar a good summe of money, to make him leaue of his sute. But Cæsar sent him word againe, that he would lenda greater summe then that, to maintaine the sute against him. When the day of the election came, his mother bringing him to the dore of his house, Cæsar weeping, kissed her, and sayd: Mother, this day thou shalt see thy sonne chiefe Bishoppe of Rome, or banished from Rome. In fine, when the voyces of the people were gathered together, and the strife well debated: Cæsar wanne the victorie, and made the Senate and noble men all affrayed of him, for that they thought that thenceforth he would make the people do what he thought good. Then Catulus and Piso fell flatly out with Cicero, and condemned him, for that he did not bewray Cæsar, when he knew that he was of conspiracie with Catiline, and had opportunitie to haue done it. For when Catiline was bent and determined, not onely to ouerthrow the state of the common wealth, but verily to destroy the Empire of Rome, he escaped out of the handes of iustice for lacke of sufficient prooffe, before his full treason and determination was knownen. Notwithstanding he left Lentulus and Cethegus in the citie, companions of his conspiracie: vnto whom, whether Cæsar did geue any secret helpe or comfort, it is not well knownen. Yet this is manifest, that when they were conuined in open Senate, Cicero being at that time Consul, asking euery mans opinion in the Senate, what punishment they should haue, and euery one of them till it came to Cæsar, gaue sentence they should dye: Cæsar E then rising vp to speake, made an oration (penned and premeditated before) and sayd, that it was neither lawfull, nor yet their custome did beare it, to put men of such nobilitie to death (but in an extremitie) without lawfull inditement and condemnation. And therefore, that if they were put in prison in some citie of ITALIE, where Cicero thought best, vntill that Catiline were ouerthrowen: the Senate then might at their pleasure quietly take such order therein, as might best appeare vnto their wisdoms. This opinion was thought more gentle, and withall was vttered with such a passing good grace and eloquence, that not only they which were to speake after him did approue it: but such also as had spoken to the contrarie before, reuoked their opinion and stucke to his, vntill it came to Cato and Catulus to speake. They both did sharply inuey against him, but Cato chiefly: who in his oration made Cæsar suspected to be of the conspiracie, and stowly spake against him, in so much that the offenders were put into the hands of the officers to be put to death, Cæsar comming out of the Senate, a company of

A of young men which guarded Cicero for the safetie of his person, did sette upon him with their swords drawn. But some say, that Cicero covered Cæsar with his gowne, and tooketh him out of their handes. And Cicero selfe, when the young men looked upon him, besicken with his head that they should not kil him, either fearing the fury of the people, or else that he thought it too shamefull and wicked a parte. But if that were true, I maruell why Cicero did not put in into his booke he wrote of his Consulshippe. But certainly they blamed him afterwards, for that he tooke not the opportunitie offered him against Cæsar, onely for onerich feare of the people, that loued him verie dearly. For shortly after, when Cæsar went into the Senate, to declare him selfe of certaine presumptions and false accusations objected against him, and being bitterly taunted among them, the Senate keeping him longer then they were wont: the people came about the counsell house, and called out aloud for him, bidding them let him out. Cato then fearing the insurrection of the poore needie persons, which were they that put all their hope in Cæsar, and did also moue the people to sturue: did perswade the Senate to make a franke distribution of corne vnto them, for a moneth. This distribution did put the common wealth to a new charge of five hundred & fiftie Myriads. This expense quenched a present great feare, and did in happy time scatter and disperse abroad the blb part of Cæsar force and power, at such time as he was made Prætor, and that for respect of his office he was most to be feared. Yet all the time he was officer, he neuer sought any alteration in the common wealth, but contrarily he him selfe had a great misfortune fell in his owne house, which was this. There was a young noble man of the order of the PATRICKS, called Publius Clodius, who lacked neither wealth nor eloquence, but otherwise as insolent and impudent person, as any was else in Rome. He became in loue with Pompeia Cæsar's wife, who mistook not withall: notwithstanding he was so straightly looked on, and that Aurelia (Cæsar's mother) an honest gentlewoman had such an eye of her, that these two louers could not meete as they would, without great perill and difficultie. The Romans doe vse to honour a goddesse which they call the good goddesse, as the GRÆCIANS haue her whom they call Gymete, to wit, the goddesse of women. Her, the PHRYGIANS doe claime to be peculiar vnto them, saying that she is king Midas mother. Howbeit the Romans hold opinion, that it is a simple of woodde, married vnto god Favunus. The GRÆCIANS, they say also, that he was one of the mother of the god Bacchus, whom they dare not name. And for prooffe hereof, on her feast day the women make certaine tabernacles of vine twiggies, and leaues of vine brānches, and all the they make as the tale goeth, a holie dragon for this goddesse, and doe set it by her: besides this not lawful for any man to be present at their sacrifices, nor within the house if she where they are made. Furthermore, they say that the women in these sacrifices do many things amongst the selues, much like vnto the ceremonies of Orpheus. Now when the time of this feast came, the husband, (whether he were Prætor or Consul) and all his men & the boyes by his house, doe come out of it, and leaue it wholly to his wife, to order the house as her pleasure, & there the sacrifices and ceremonies are done the most parte of the night, and they doe besides passe the night away, in songes and musick. Pompeia, Cæsar's wife, being that yeare do celebrat this feast, Clodius who had yet no heare on his face, & thereby thought he should not be bewrayed, E disguised him selfe in a singing wenches apparell, bisuiting his face was verie like vnto a young wenche. He finding the gates open, being secretly brought in by her chambermaid, that was made priue vnto it: she left him, and ranne to Pompeia her mistres, to tell her that he was come. The chambermaid taried long before he came againe, in so much as Clodius being wearie waiting for her where she left him, he tooke his pleasure, and went from one plide to another in the house, which had very large roomes in it, still hunting the light, and was by chance met withall by one of Aurelia's maides, who taking him for a woman, pryed her to play. Clodius refusing to play, the maide pulled him forward, and asked him what he was: Clodius then answered her, that he taried for Abra one of Pompeia's women: so Aurelia in aide knowing him by his voyce, ranne straight where the lightes and Ladies were, and called out that there was a man disguised in womans apparell. The women there with were so much that Aurelia caused them presently to leaue of the ceremonies of the sacrifice, and to close their secret thinges, and hauing seene the gates fast locked, went immediately up and down the house with torches light to seek out this man: who at the last was found out in the chamber of Pompeius' maide, with whom he hidde him selfe. Thus Clodius being found out, the women of the women: they thrust him out of the doores by the shoulders. The same night the women tolde their husbands of this chauce as soone as they came home. The next morning, there ranne a great rumor through the citie, how Clodius had attempted a great villany, and that he defuered, not only to be punished of them whom he had laundred, but also of the common wealth and the goddes. There was one of the Tribunes of the people that did denie him, & accuse him of high treason to the gods. Furthermore, there were also of the chiefest of the nobilitie and Senate, that came to depose against him, and burdened him with many horrible and detestable facts, and specially with incest committed with his owne sister, which was married vnto Lucullus. Notwithstanding, the people slowly defended Clodius against these accusations: and this did helpe him much against the Iudges, which were amazed, & afraid to stirre the people. This notwithstanding, Caesar presently put his wife away, and thereupon being brought by Clodius' accuser to be a witnes against him, he answered, he knew nothing of that they objected against Clodius. This answer being cleane contrarie to their expectation that heard it, the accuser asked Caesar, why then he had put away his wife: because I said not, sayd he, that my wife be so much as suspected. And some say, that Caesar spake truth as he thought. But others thinke, that he did it to please the common people, who were very desirous to saue Clodius. So Clodius was discharged of this accusation, because the most part of the Iudges gaue a confused iudgement, for the feare they stood one way of the danger of the common people if they condemned him: and for the ill opinion of thother side of the nobilitie, if they did quit him. The government of the prouince of SPAYNE being fallen vnto Caesar for that he was Prætor: his creditors came and cried out upon him, and were importunate of him to be payed. Caesar being vnable to satisfie them, was compelled to goe vnto Cæsar, who was the richest man of all ROME, and that stood in neede of Caesar's boldnes and courage to withstand Pompey's greatness in the common wealth. Crassus became his suretie vnto his greediest creditors for the summe of eight hundred and thirtie talentes: whereupon they suffered Caesar to departe to the government of his prouince. In his iorney it is reported, that passing ouer the mountains of the Alpes, they came through a litle poore village that had not many householdes, and yet poore cottages. There, his frendes that did accompanie him, asked him meely, if there were any contending for offices in that towne, and whether there were any strife there amongst the noble men for honor. Caesar speaking in good earnest answered: I can not tell that said he, but for my parte, I had rather be the chiefest man here, then the second person in ROME. An other time also when he was in SPAYNE, reading the history of Alexander's actes, when he had red it, he was forsores full a good while after, & then burst out in weeping. His frends seeing that, marueled what should be the cause of his sorrow. He answered them, they neede not thinke sayd he, that I haue good cause to be heauie, when king Alexander being no older than my selfe is now, had in old time wonne so many nations and countries: and that I hitherto haue done nothing worthy of my selfe. Therefore when he was come into SPAYNE, he was very carefull of his busines, and had in few dayes ioyoyed ten thousand engines more of fourteen men, vnto the other twenty which he had before. Then marching forward against the CARTHAGINIANS and LYSITANIANS, he conquered all, & went as farre as the great sea Oceanum; subduing all the people which before knew not the ROMANES for their Lordes. There he made order for pacifying of the warre, and did as wisely take order for the establishing of peace. For he did reconcile the cities together, and made them frendes one with an other, but specially he pacified all suites of law, & strife, between the debtors and creditors, which grew by reason of vicietie. For he ordained that the creditors shoulde take yearly two partes of the reuenue of their debtors, vntill such time as they had payed them selues, and that the debtors shoulde haue the third parte to them selues to liue withall. He hauing wonne great estimation by this good order taken, returned from his government very riche, and his soldiers also full of such spoiles, who called him Imperator, to say soveraine Capitaine. Now the ROMANES hauing a custome, that such as demanded honor of triumphe, should remaine a while in the citie, and that they on thother side which sued for the Consulship, shoulde

A of necessitie be there in person: Caesar comming vnhappyly at that very time when the Consuls were chosen, he sent to pray the Senate to do him that fauor, that being absent, he might by his frendes sue for the Consulship. Cato at the first did vehemently inuey against it, vouching an expresse law forbidding the contrarie. But afterwards, perceiving that notwithstanding the reasons he alleged, many of the Senators (being wonne by Caesar) fauored his request: yet he cunningly fought all he could to preuent them, prolonging time, dilating his oration vntill night. Caesar thereupon determined rather to geue ouer the sute of his triumphe, and to make sute for the Consulship: and so came into the citie, and had such a deuise with him, as went beyond them all, but Cato only. His deuise was this. Pompey and Crassus, two of the greatest personages of the city of ROME, being at iarre together, Caesar made them frends, and by that means got vnto him selfe the power of them both: for, by colour of that gentle age and frendshippe of his, he subtilly (vnto them to them all) did greatly alter and chaunge the state of the common wealth. For it was not the priuate discord between Pompey and Caesar, as many men thought, that caused the ciuill warre: but rather it was their agreement together, who ioynd all their powers first to ouerthrowe the state of the Senate and nobilitie, and afterwards they fell at iarre one with an other. But Cato, that then foresaw and prophesied many times what woulde followe, was taken but for a vaine man: but afterwards they found him a wiser man, then happie in his counsell. Thus Caesar being brought vnto the assemble of the election, in the midst of these two noble persons, whom he had before reconciled together: he was there chosen Consul, with Calphurnius Bibulus, without gaine saying or contradiction of any man. Now when he was entred into his office, he beganne to put forth lawes meeter for a seditious Tribune of the people, than for a Consul: because by them he preferred the diuision of landes, and distributing of come to euery citizen, Gratis, to please them withall. But when the noble men of the Senate were against his deuise, he desiring no better occasion, beganne to crie out, and to protest, that by the ouerhaudnesse and austeritie of the Senate, they draue him against his will to leane vnto the people: and thereupon hauing Crassus on thone side of him, and Pompey on thother, he asked them openly if thassemblies, if they did geue their consent vnto the lawes which he had put forth. They both answered, they did. Then he prayed them to stande by him against those that threatened him with force of sword to let him. Crassus gaue him his worde, he woulde. Pompey also did the like, and added therunto, that he woulde come with his sword and target both, against them that woulde withstand him with their swords. These wordes offended much the Senate, being farre vnmeet for his grauetie, and vndecent for the maiestie and honor he caried, and most of all vncomely for the presence of the Senate whome he shoulde haue reuerenced: and were speaches fitter for a rash light headed youth, than for his person. Howbeit the common people on thother side, they reioyced. Then Caesar because he woulde be more assured of Pompey's power and frendshippe, he gaue him his daughter Iulia in mariage, which was made sure before vnto Seruilius Cæpio, and promised him in exchange Pompey's wife, the which was sure also vnto Faustus the sonne of Sylla. And shortly after also, Caesar selfe did marie Calpurnia the daughter of Piso, whom he caused to be made Consul, to succede him the next yeare following. E. Cato then cried out with open mouth, and called the gods to witnes, that this was a shamefull matter, and not to be suffered, that they shoulde in that sorte make haouke of the Empire of ROME, by such horrible bawdie matches, distributing among them selues through those wicked mariages, the governments of the prouinces, and of great armies. Calphurnius Bibulus, fellow Consul with Caesar, perceiving that he did contend in vaine, making all the resistance he could to withstand this lawe, and that oftentimes he was in danger to be slaine with Cato, in the market place and assemble: he kept close in his house all the rest of his Consulshippe. When Pompey had married Iulia, he filled all the market place with souldiers, & by open force authorized the lawes which Caesar made in the behalfe of the people. Furthermore, he procured that Caesar had GAULE on this side, and beyond the Alpes, and all ILLYRIA, with foure legions graunted him for five yeares. Then Cato standing vp to speake against it: Caesar bad his officers lay holde of him, and carie him to prison, thinking he woulde haue appealed vnto the Tribunes. But Cato sayd neuer a worde, when he went his way. Caesar perceiving then, that not only the Senators and nobilitie were offended, but that the common people also for the A reuerence they bare vnto Caesars vertues, were afflamed, and went away with silence: he him selfe secretly did pray one of the Tribunes that he would take Cato from the officers. But after he had played this parte, there were few Senators that would be President of the Senate vnder him, but left the citie, because they could not away with his doings. And of them, there was an old man called Confidius, that on a time boldly told him, the rest durst not come to counsell, because they were afrayed of his souldiers. Caesar answered him againe: and why then, doest not thou kepe thee at home, for the same feare? Confidius replied, because my age taketh away feare from me: for hauing so short a time to liue, I haue no care to prolonge it further. The shamefullest parte that Caesar played while he was Consul, seemeth to be this: when he chose P. Clodius Tribune of the people, that had offered his wife such dishonor, and profaned the holy auncient misteries of the women, which were celebrated in his owne house. Clodius sued to be Tribune to no other end, but to destroy Cicero: & Caesar selfe also departed not from Rome to his army, before he had let them together by the eares, and driuen Cicero out of ITALY. All these things they say he did, before the warres with the GAULES. But the time of the great armies & conquests he made afterwards, & of the warre in the which he subdued all the GAULES (entering into an other course of life farre contrarie vnto the first) made him to be knownen for as valliant a souldier & as excellent a Captaine to lead men, as those that afore him had bene counted the wisest and most valliantest Generalls that euer were, and that by their valliant deedes had archieued great honor. For whosoeuer would compare the house of the Fabians, of the Scipios, of the Metellians, yea those also of his owne time, or long before him, as Sylla, Marius, the two Lucullians, and Pompey selfe, VVhose same ascendeth vp vnto the heauens:

It will appeare that Caesars prowes and deedes of armes, did excell them all together. The one, in the hard contries where he made warres: an other, in enlarging the realmes and con-tries which he ioyned vnto the Empire of Rome: an other, in the multitude and power of his enemies whome he ouercame: an other, in the rudenesse and austere nature of men with whom he had to doe, whose maners afterwarde he softened and made ciuill: an other, in cur-resie and clemencie which he vsed vnto them whome he had conquered: an other in great bountie and liberality bestowed vpon them that serued vnder him in those warres: and in fine, he excellend them all in the number of battells he had fought, and in the multitude of his enemies he had slaine in battell. For in lesse then tenne yeares warre in GAULE he tooke by force and assault aboue eight hundred townes, he conquered three hundred seuerall nations: and hauing before him in battell thirty hundred thousand souldiers, at sundrie times he slue tenne hundred thousand of them, & tooke as many more prisoners. Furthermore, he was so entirely beloued of his souldiers, that to doe him seruice (where otherwise they were no more then other men in any priuate quarrell) if Caesars honor were rouchend, they were inuincible, & would so desperately ventur them selues, & with such furie, that no man was able to abide them. And this appeareth plainly by the example of Atilius: who in a battell by sea before the city of MAR-SELES, bording one of his enemies shippes, one cut of his right hand with a sword, but yet he forsooke not his target which he had in his left hand, but thrust it in in his enemies faces, & made them flie, so that he wanne their shippe from them. And Cassius Scena also, in a confliet before the city of DYRRACHIUM, hauing one of his eyes put out with an arrow, his shoulder stricken through with a dart, and his thigh with an other, and hauing receiued thirty arrowes vpon his shield: he called to his enemies, and made as though he would yeelde vnto them. But when two of them came running to him, he claue one of their shoulders from his bodie with his sword, and hurt the other in the face: so that he made him turne his backe, & at the length saued him selfe, by meanes of his companions that came to helpe him. And in BRITAYNE also, when the Capitaines of the bandes were driuen into a marrie or bogge full of mire and durt, and that the enemies did fiercelie assaile them there: Caesar then standinge to viewe the battell, he sawe a priuate souldier of his thrust in among the Caprines, and fought so valliant-lie in their defence, that at the length he draue the barbarous people to flie, and by his meanes saued the Capitaines, which otherwise were in great danger to haue bene cast away.

Then

A Then this souldier being the hindemost man of all the Capitaines, marching with great paine through the myre & durt, halfe swimming, and halfe a foote: in the end got to the other side, but left his shield behinde him. Caesar wondering at his noble courage, ranne to him with his imbrace him. But the poore souldier hanging downe his head, the water standing in his eyes, fell downe at Caesars feete, and besought him to pardon him, for that he had left his target behinde him: And in AFRICKE also, Scipio hauing taken one of Caesars shippes, and Crassus, Petrone, Petronius abourde on her amongst other, not long before chosen Treasurers: he put all the rest to the sword but him, and sayd he would geue him his life. But Petronius answered him againe: that Caesars souldiers did not vfe to haue their liues geuen them, but to geue others their liues: and with those wordes he drew his sword, and thrust him selfe through. Nowe, B Caesars selfe did breede this noble courage and life in them. First, for that he gaue them bountifully, & did honor them also, shewing thereby, that he did not heape riches in the warres: to maintain his life afterwards in wantonnesse and pleasure, but that he did keepe it in store, honorably to reward their valliant seruice: and that by so much he thought him selfe rich, by howe much he was liberrall in rewarding of them that had deserued it. Furthermore, they did not wonder so much at his valliantnesse in putting him selfe at euery instant in such manifest danger, and in taking so extreme paines as he did, knowing that it was his greedie desire of honor that set him a fire, and pricked him forward to doe it: but that he alwayes continued all labour and hardnesse, more then his bodie could beare, that filled them all with admiration. For, concerning the constitution of his bodie, he was leane, white, and soft skinned, C ned, and often subiect to headache, and otherwhile to the falling sicknes: (the which tooke him the first time, as it is reported, in CORDUBA, a citie of SPAYNE) but yet therefore yeelded not to the disease of his bodie, to make it a cloke to churle him withall, but contrariwise, tooke the paines of warre, as a medicine to cure his sicke bodie fighting alwayes with his disease, travelling continually, liuing soberly, and commonly lying abroad in the field. For the most nights he slept in his coch or litter, and thereby bestowed his rest, to make him alwayes able to do some thing: and in the day time, he would trauell vp and downe the contrie to see townes, castles, and strong places. He had alwayes a secretarie with him in his coche, who did still wryte as he went by the way, and a souldier behinde him that caried his sword. He made such speede the first time he came from Rome, when he had his office: that in eight dayes, D he came to the riuier of Rhone. He was so excellent a rider of horse from his youth, that holding his handes behinde him, he would galloppe his horse vpon the spurre. In his warres in GAULE, he did further exercise him selfe to indite letters as he rode by the way, and did occupie two secretaries at once with as much as they could wryte: and as Oppius wryteth, more then two at a time. And it is reported, that Caesar was the first that deuised frendes might talke together by wryting ciphers in letters, when he had no leasure to speake with them for his urgent busines, and for the great distaunce besides from Rome. How litle accompt Caesar made, of his dyet, this example doth proue it. Caesar supping one night in MILANE with his frende Valerius Leo, there was ferued sparrage to his boude, and oyle of perfume put into it in stead of sallie oyle. He simplicie ate it, and found no fault, blaming his frendes that were offended: E and told them, that it had bene enough for them to haue absteyned to eate of that they mil-liked, and not to shame their frend, and how that he lacked good manner that found fault with his frend. An other time as he trauelled through the contrie, he was driuen by fowle weather on the sodaine to take a poore mans cottage, that had but one litle cabin in it, and that was so narrowe, that one man could but scarce lye in it. Then he sayd to his frendes that were about him: greatest roomes are meetest for greatest men, and the most necessarie roomes, for the sickest persons. And thereupon he caused Oppius that was sicke to lye there all night: and he him selfe, with the rest of his frendes, lay with out doores, vnder the eafing of the house.
 The first warre that Caesar made with the GAULES, was with the HELVETIANS and TIGUR-NIANS, who hauing sette fire of all their good cities, to the number of twelue, and four hundred villages besides, came to inuade that parte of GAULE which was subiect to the Ro-manes, as the CIMBRI and TEUTONS had done before: vnto whome for valliantnesse they gaue no place, & they were also a great number of them (for they were three hundred thou-and soules in all) whereof there were a hundred, foure score, and tennethowlande fighting men. Of those, it was not Caesar him selfe that ouercame the TIGVRINIANS, but Labienus his Lieutenant, that ouerthrew them by the riuier of Arax. But the HELVETIANS them selues came sodainly with their armie to set upon him, as he was going towards a citie of his confederates. Caesar perceiving that, made hast to get him some place of strength, and there did sette his men in battell raye. When one brought him his horse to gette vp on which he was set in battell, he sayd vnto them: when I haue ouercome mine enemies, I will then get vp on him to followe the chafe, but nowe lettevs geue them charge. Therewith he marched forward a fote, and gaue charge: and there fought it out a long time, before he coulde make them flie that were in battell. But the greatest trouble he had, was to distresse their campe, and to breake their strength which they had made with their cartes. For there, they that before had fledde from the battell, did not onely put them selues in force, and valliantly fought it out: but their wives and children also fighting for their liues to the death, were all flaine, and the battell was scant ended at midnight. Nowe if the act of this victorie was famous, vnto that he also added an other as notable, or exceeding it. For of all the barbarous people that had escaped from this battell, he gathered together againe about a hundred thowlandes of them, and compelled them to returne home into their contrie which they had forsaken, and vnto their towne also which they had burnt: because he feared the GERMAYNES would come ouer the riuier of Rheym, and occupie that contrie lying voyde. The second warre he made, was in defence of the GAULES against the GERMAYNES: although before, he him selfe had caused Ariouistus their king, to be receiued for a confederate of the ROMANES. Notwithstanding, they were grown very vnquiet neighbours, and it appeared plainly, that hauing any occasion offered them to enlarge their territories, they would not content them with their owne, but went to invade and possesse the rest of GAULE. Caesar perceiving that some of his Captaines trembled for feare, but specially the young gentlemen of noble houses of ROME, who thought to haue gone to the warres with him, as onely for their pleasure and gaine: he called them to counsell, and commaunded them that were affrayed, that they should depart home, and not put them selues in daunger against their willes, sith they had such womanlike faint hartes to shrinke when he had neede of them. And for him selfe, he sayd, he would feare upon the barbarous people, though he had left him but the tenth legion onely, saying, that the enemies were no valliantier than the CIMBRI had bene, nor that he was a Captaine inferior vnto Marius. This oration being made, the souldiers of the tenth legion sent their Lieutenantes vnto him, to thanke him for the good opinion he had of them: and the other legions also fell out with their Captaines, and all of them together followed him many dayes iorney with good will to serue him, vntill they came within two hundred furlonges of the campe of the enemies. Ariouistus corage was well cooled, when he sawe Caesar was come, and that the ROMANES came to seeke out the GERMAYNES, where they thought, and made accompt, that they durst not haue abidden them: and therefore nothinge mistrusting it would haue come so to passe; he wondered much at Caesar's corage, and the more when he sawe his owne armie in a maze withall. But muche more did their corages fall, by reason of the foolish women prophiciers they had among them, which did foretell things to come: who, considering the waues and trouble of the riuers, and the terrible noyle they made runninge downe the streame, did forewarne them not to fight, vntill the newe moone. Caesar hauinge intelligence thereof, and perceiving that the barbarous people thereupon sturred not: thought it best then to sette vpon them, being discouraged with this superstitious feare, rather then losinge time; he shoulde tarie their leisure. So he did skirmishe with them euen to their fortres, and litle hilles where they lay, and by this meanes provoked them so, that with great furie they came downe to fight. There he ouercame them in battell, and followed them in chase, with great slaughter, three hundred furlonge, euen vnto the riuier of Rheym: and he filled all the fieldes thitherto with dead bodies and spoyle. Howebeit Ariouistus flyinge with speede, gotte ouer the riuier of Rheym, and escaped with a fewe of his men. It is sayd that there were flaine foure score thowlande persons at this battell. After this exployte, Caesar left his armie amongst the SEQUANS to winter there

A & he him selfe in the meane time, thinking of thaffayres at ROME, went ouer the mountaines into GAULE about the riuier of Po, being parte of his prouince which he had in charge. For there, the riuier called Rubico, denideth the rest of ITALIE from GAULE on this side the Alpes. Caesar lying there, did practise to make frendes in ROME, because many came thither to see him: vnto whom he graunted their sutes they demanded, and sent them home also, partly with liberal rewards, and partly with large promises and hope. Now during all this conquest of the GAULES, Pompey did not consider how Caesar enteraungeable did conquer the GAULES with the weapons of the ROMANES, and wanne the ROMANES againe with the money of the GAULES. Caesar being aduertised that the BELGE (which were the warlikest men of all the GAULES, and that occupied the third parte of GAULE) were all vp in armes, and had raised a great power of men together: he straight made towards them with all possible speede, and founde them spoiling and ouerrunninge the contrie of the GAULES, their neighbours, and confederates of the ROMANES. So he gaue them battell, and they fighting cowardly, he ouerthrew the most parte of them which were in a troupe together, & they such a number of them, that the ROMANES passed ouer deepe riuers and lakes a foote, upon their dead bodies, the riuers were so full of them. After this ouerthrow, they that dwelt next vnto the sea side, and were next neighbours vnto the Ocean, did yeeld them selues without any compulsion or fight: whereupon, he led his army against the NERVIANS, the stoutest warriors of all the BELGE. They dwelling in the wodde contrie, had conueyed their wives, children, and goods, into a maruelous great Forrest, as farre from their enemies as they could: and being about the number of fixe score thowland fighting men and more, they came one day and set upon Caesar, when his armie was out of order, and fortifying of his campe, litle looking to haue fought that day. At the first charge, they brake the horsemen of the ROMANES, and compassing in the twelfth & seuenth legion, they slue all the Centurions & Captaines of the bands. And had not Caesar selfe taken his shield on his arme, and dying in amongst the barbarous people, made a lane through them that fought before him: & the tenth legion also seeing him in daunger, ranne vnto him from the toppes of the hill where they stoode in battell, and broken the ranks of their enemies: there had not a ROMAN escaped a liue that day. But taking example of Caesar's valliantnes, they foughte desperately beyond their power, and yet could not make the NERVIANS flie, but they fought it out to the death, till they were all in manner D slaine in the field. It is written that of three score thowland fighting men, there escaped onely but fixe hundred: and of foure hundred gentlemen and counsellors of the ROMANES, but three, saved. The Senate vnderstanding it at ROME, ordained that they shoulde doe sacrifice vnto the goddes, and keepe feastes and solemne processions fiftene dayes together without intermission, hauing neuer made the like ordinance at ROME, for any victorie that euer was obtained. Because they sawe the daunger had bene maruelous great, so many nationes rising as they did in armes together against him: and further, the loue of the people vnto him made his victory much more famous. For when Caesar had set his affaires at a stay in GAULE, on the other side of the Alpes: he alwayes vied to lye about the riuier of Poin in the winter time, to geue direction for the establisshing of thinges at ROME, at his pleasure. For, not only they that made E sure for offices at ROME were cholen Magistrates, by means of Caesar's money which he gaue them, with little which; bribing the people, they bought their voyces, and when they were in office, did al that they could to increase Caesar's power and greatnes: but the greatest & chiefest men also of the nobilitie, went vnto LYKE vnto him. As Pompey, Crassus, Appian, Prator of SARDINIA, and Mepell, Proconsull in SPAYNE. In somuch that there were at one time, fixe score sergeants carrying rodde and axes before the Magistrates: and about two hundred Senators besides. There they fell in consultation, and determined that Pompey & Crassus should againe be thosen Consuls the next yere following. Butthermore, they did appoint, that Caesar should haue money againe deliuered him to pay his armie, and besides, did proroge the time of his government, fixe yeres further. This was thought a very strange & an vnreasonable matter. R vnto wise men: For they the selues that had taken so much money of Caesar, perswaded the Senate to let him haue money of the comon treasure, as though he had had none before: yea to speake more plainly, they compelled the Senate vnto it, fighting & laweing to see the decrees they passed: Cato was not there then, for they had purposely sent him before into Cyprus. Howbeit Faonius that followed Cato's steps, when he saw that he could not prevail, nor withstand them: he went out of the Senate in choller, and cried out amongst the people, that it was a horrible shame. But no man did hearken to him: some for the reverence they bare unto Pompey, and Craffus, and others favouring Caesar's proceedings, did put all their hope and trust in him: and therefore did quiet them selves, and sturied not. Then Caesar returning into Gaul beyond the Alpes vnto his armie, founde there a great warre in the contrie. For two great nations of GERMANY had not long before passed over the river of Rheyn, to conquer newe landes: and the one of these people were called Ipses, and the other Tenebridae. Now touching the battell which Caesar fought with them, he him selfe doth describe it in his commentaries, in this sorte. That the barbarous people having sent Ambassadors vnto him, to require peace for a certaine time: they notwithstanding, against lawe of armes, came and sette upon him as betrauelled by the way, insomuch as eight hundred of their men of armes ouerthrewe five thousande of his horsemen, who nothinge at all mistrusted their coming. Again, that they sent him other Ambassadors to mocke him once more: but that he kept them, and therewith caused his whole armie to marche against them, thinking it a follie, and madnesse, to keepe faith with such trayterous barbarous breakers of leagues. Caesarius wryteth, that the Senate appointing againe to doe newe sacrifices, processions, and feastes, to geue thanks to the goddess for this victorie: Cato was of contrarie opinion, that Caesar should be deliuered into the handes of the barbarous people, for to pounce their city and common wealth of this breache of faith, and to turne the curse upon him, that was the author of it. Of these barbarous people, which came ouer the Rheyn (being about the number of foure hundred thousand persons) they were all in maner slaine, saving a very fewe of them, that flying from the battell got ouer the river of Rheyn againe, who were receiued by the Sicambrians, an other people of the GERMANIES. Caesar taking this occasion against them, lacking no good will of him selfe besides, to haue the honor to be counted the first ROMANE that euer passed ouer the river of Rheyn with an armie: he built a bridge ouer it. This river is maruelous broade, and runneth with great furie. And in that place specially where he built his bridge, for there it is of a great breadth from one side to thother, and it hath so strong and swift a streame besides: that men casting downe great bodies of trees into the river (which the streame bringeth downe with it) did with the great blowes and force thereof maruelously shake the postes of the bridge he had set vp. But to prevent the blowes of those trees, and also to breake the furie of the streame: he made a pile of great wodde about the bridge a good way, and did forcible ramme them in to the bottome of the river, so that in ten dayes space, he had set vp and finishe his bridge of the goodliest carpenters worke, and most excellent inuention to see to, that could be possible thought or deuised. Then passing ouer his army vpon it, he found none that durst any more fight with him. For the Sueuians, which were the warlikest people of all GERMANY, had gotten them selves with their goodnes into wonderfull great valles and bogges, full of woddes and forrestes. Nowe when he had burnt all the contrie of his enemies, and confirmed the league with the confederats of the ROMANES: he returned backe againe into Gaul after he had taried eightene dayes at the most in GERMANY, on thother side of the Rheyn. The iorney he made also into ENGLAND, was a noble enterprise, and very commendable. For he was the first that sailed the west Ocean with an army by sea, & that passed through the sea Atlanticum with his army, to make warre in that so great & famous Ile: (which many ancient wryters would not beleue that it was so in deede, and did make them vary about it, saying that it was but a fable & a lye) and was the first that enlarged the ROMANE Empire, beyond the earth inhabitable. For twice he passed ouer the narrowe sea against the firme lande of Gaul, and fighting many battells there, did hurt his enemies more, then enriche his owne men: because, of men hardie brought vp, and poore, there was nothing to be gotten. Whereupon his warre had not such successe as he looked for, and therefore takinge pledges onely of the kinge, and amassing a yearly tribute upon him, to be payed vnto the people of ROME: he returned againe into Gaul. There he was no longer landed; but he founde letters ready to be sent ouer the sea vnto him:

At the which he was aduertised from ROME, of the death of his Daughter, that she was dead with child by Pompey. For the which, Pompey & Caesar both, were maruelous sorrowfull: & their friends mounted also, thinking that this alliance which maintained the common wealth (that otherwise was very tickle) in good peace and concord, was now seuered, and broken a sunder, and the rather likely, because the child liued not long after the mother. So the common people at ROME tooke the corps of Julia, in despite of the Tribunes, and buried it in the field of Mars. Now Caesar being driuen to deuide his armie (that was very great) into sundry garrisons for the winter tittle, and returning againe into ITALY as he was wont: all Gaul rebelled againe, and had rayled great armies in euery quarter to set upon the ROMANES, and to assay if they could distresse their forts where they lay in garrison. The greatest number and most warlike men of these GAVLES, that entred into action of rebellion, were led by one Ambiorix, and first did set vpon the garrisons of Cotta, and Tutrinus, whom they slue, and all the souldiers they had about them. Then they went with three score thousand fighting men to bessege the garrison which Quintus Cicero had in his charge, and had almost taken them by force, because all the souldiers were euery man of them hurt: but they were so valiant and courageous, that they did more then men (as they say) in defending of them selves. These newes being cometh to Caesar, who was farre from thence at that time, he returned with all possible speede, and leauing seuen thousand souldiers, made haste to helpe Cicero that was in such distresse. The GAVLES that did bessege Cicero, vnderstanding of Caesar's coming, rayled their feece inconfinently to god and mee: him: making accompt that he was but a handfull in their handes, they were to keepe Caesar to deceiue them, still drew backe, and made as though he fled from them, lodging in places meete for a Capitaine that had but a few, to fight with a great number of his enemies, and commaunded his men in no wise to stirre out to skirmish with them, but compelled them to rayse vp the rampers of his campe, and to fortifie the gates, as men that were afraid, because the enemies should the lesse esteeme of them: vntill that at length he tooke opportunity, by their disorderly coming to assaile the trenches of his campe, (they were grown so such a presumptuous boldnes and brauery) and then slaying out upon them, he put them all to flight with slaughter of a great number of them. This did suppress all the rebellions of the GAVLES in those parties, and furthermore, he him selfe in person went in the midst of winter thither, where he heard they did rebell: for that there was come a newe supply out of ITALY of three whole legions in their roome, which he had lost: of the which, two of them Pompey lent him, and the other legiō, he him selfe had leauied in Gaul about the ritter of Posidonius. During these stormes, brake forth the beginning of the greatest & most daungerous warre that he had in all GAVLES, the which had bene secretly practised of long time by the chiefest & most warlike people of that contrie, who had leauied a wonderfull great power: For euery where they leauied multitudes of men, & great riches besides, to fortifie their stronge holdes. Furthermore the contrie where they rose, was very ill to come vnto, and specially at that time being winter, when the riuers were frosen, the woodes and forrests couered with snowe, the meadowes drowned with fluddes, and the fieldes so deepe of snow, that no wayes were to be found, neither the marshes nor riuers to be decerned, all was so ouerthrowen and drowned with water, all which troubles together were enough (as they thought) to keepe Caesar from setting vpon the rebels. Many nations of the GAVLES were of this conspiracy, but two of the chiefest were the ARVERNIANES and CARNUTES: who had chosen Vercingetorix for their Lieutenant general, whose father the GAVLES before had put to death, because they thought he applied to make him selfe king. This Vercingetorix deniuing his armie into diuers parties, and appointing diuers Capitaines ouer them, had gotten to take his part, all the people and contries thereabout, eue as farre as they that dwell towards the *sea Adriatick, hauing further determined (vnderstanding that ROME did conspire against Caesar) to make all GAVLES his armes against him? So that if he had but taried a litle longer, vntill Caesar had entred into his ciuill warres: he had put all ITALY in as great feare and danger, as it was when the CIMBRI did come and invade it: But Caesar, that was very valiant in all affaies and daungers of warre, and that was very skillfull to take time and oportunitie: so soone as he vnderstoode the newes of the rebellion, he departed with speede, and returned backe the selfe same way which he had gone, making the barbarous people know, that they should deal with an armie vnuincible, which they could not possibly withstand, considering the great speede he had made with the same, in so sharpe and hard a winter. For where they would not possibly haue beleueed, that a poste or currer could haue come in so short a time from the place where he was, vnto them, they wondered when they saw him burning and destroying the contry, the townes and strong forts where he came with his armie, taking all to mercy that yielded vnto him: vntill such time as the Helvi tooke armes against him, who before were wont to be called the brethren of the Romanes, and were greatly honored of them. Wherefore Cæsar's men when they vnderstoode that they had ioynd with the rebells, they were marvellous sory, and halfe discouraged. Thereupon, Cæsar departing from those parties, went throughe the contry of the Lingones, to enter the contry of the *Burgonians, who were confederats of the Romanes, and the nearest vnto Italy on that side, in respect of all the rest of Gaul. Thither the enemies came to set upon him, and to enuiron him of all sides, with an infinit number of, thousand of fighting men. Cæsar on thother side taried their coming, and fighting with them a long time, he made them so affraid of him, that at length he ouercame the barbarous people. But at the first, it seemeth notwithstanding, that he had receyued some overthrow: for the Arverniens (showing a sworde hanged vpon in one of their temples, which they sayde they had wonne from Cæsar. In so much as Cæsar selfe comming that way by occasion, sawe it, and fell a laughing at it. But some of his friends going about to take it away, he would not suffer them, but bad them let it alone, and touch it not, for it was a holy thinge. Notwithstanding, such as at the first had saued them selues by fleeing, the most of them were gotten with their king into the cite of Alexia, the which Cæsar went and beleeged, although it seemed inexpugnable, both for the height of the wals, as also for the multitude of souldiers they had to defend it. But now during this siege, he fell into a maruelous great danger without almost incredible. For an armie of three hundred thousand fighting men of the best men that were among all the nations of the Gauls, came against him, being at the siege of Alexia, besides them that were within the cite, which amounted to the number of three score and tenne thousand fighting men at the least: so that perceiuing he was shut in betwixt two so great armies, he was driuen to forsake him selfe with two walls, the one against them of the cite, and the other against them without. For if those two armies had ioynd together, Cæsar had bene vtterly vndone. And therefore, this siege of Alexia, and the battell he wanne before it, did deservedly winne him more honor and fame, then any other. For there, in that instant and extreame daunger, he shewed more valiantnes and wisdom, then he did in any battell he fought before. But what a wonderfull thing was this: that they of the cite neuer heard any thing of them that came to assaile them, vntill Cæsar had ouercome them: and furthermore, that the Romanes them selues, which kept watch vpon the wall that was built against the cite, knew also no more of it, when they, but when it was done, and that they heard the cries and lamentacions of men & women in Alexia, when they perceiued on thother side of the cite such a number of glittering shields of gold and silver, such store of bloody coferlets and armors, such a deale of plate and mowables, and such a number of tents and pavilions after the facion of the Gauls, which the Romanes had gotten of their spoyles in their campe. Thus sodainly was this great armie vnished, as a dreame or vision: where the most part of them were slaine that day in battell. Furthermore, after that they within the cite of Alexia had done great hurt to Cæsar, and then selues also: in the ende, they all yielded them selues. And Vercingentorix (he that was their king, and Capteine in all this warre) went out of the gates excellently well armed, and his horse furnished with riche capparion accordingly, and rode round about Cæsar, who sat in his chayer of estate. Then lighting from his horse, he tooke of his capparion and furniture, and vnarmed him selfe, and layed all on the ground, and went and sate downe at Cæsar's feete, and sayd neuer a word. So Cæsar at length committed him as a prisoner taken in the warres, to leade him afterwards in his triumph at Rome. Nowe Cæsar had of long time determined to destroy Pompey, and Pompey him also. For Crassus being killed amongst the Parthians, who onely did let that one of them two must needs fall: nothing kept Cæsar from being the greatest person, but because he destroyed not Pompey, that was the greater: neither did any thing let Pompey to win stand

A. And that it should not come to passe, but because he did not first ouercome Cæsar, whom one-ly he feared. For till then, Pompey had not long feared him, but alwayes before set light by him, thinking it an easie matter for him to put him downe when he would: sith he had brought him to that extreame he was come vnto. But Cæsar contrarily, hauing had that discomfite in his head from the beginning, like a wrestler that studieth for trickes to ouerthrowe his aduersary: he went farre from Rome, to exercise him selfe in the warres of Gauls, where he did trayne his armie, and presently by his valiant deedes did increase his fame and honor. By these meanes became Cæsar as famous as Pompey in his doings, and lacked no more to put his enterprise in execution, but some occasions of culler, which Pompey partly gaue him, and partly also the tyme deliuered him, but chiefly, the hard fortune and ill government at that tyme of the common wealth at Rome. For they that made sure for honor and offices, bought the voyces of the people with ready money, which they gaue out opely to vsury, without shame or feare. Thereupon, the common people that had sold their voyces for money, came to the market place at the day of election, to fight for him that had hyered them out with their voyces, but with their bowes, slings, and swordes. So that the assembly seldom tyme brake vp, but that the pulpit for orations was defiled and sprinkled with the blood of them that were slayne in the market place, the cite remaying all that tyme without government of Magistrate, like a shippe left without a Pilote. In so much, as men of deepe iudgement & discrecion seeing such furie & madness of the people, thought the selues happy if the common wealth were no worse troubled, then with the absolut state of a Monarchy & soueraine Lord to gouerne them. Furthermore, there were many that were not affraid to speake it opely, that there was no other help to remedy the troubles of the common wealth, but by the authority of one man only, that should commaund the all: & that this medicine must be ministred by the hands of him, that was the greatest Philisition, meaning couertly Pompey. Now Pompey vsed many fine speeches, making semblance as though he would none of it, yet cunningly vnder hand did lay all the yrons in the fire he could, to bring it to passe, that he might be chosen Dictator. Cato finding the mark he shot at, & fearing least in the end the people should be compelled to make him Dictator: he perswaded the Senate rather to make him sole Consul, that contenting him self with that more iust & lawfull gouernment, he should not couet the other vnlawfull. The Senate following his counsell, did not only make him Consul, but further did protoge his gouernment of the prouinces he had. For he had two prouinces, all SPAYNE, & AFRICA, the which he gouerned by his Lieutenants: & further, he receiued yearly of the common treasure to pay his souldiers a thousand talents. Hereupon Cæsar tooke occasion also to send his men to make sure in his name for the Consulship, & also to haue the gouernment of his prouinces proroged. Pompey at the first held his peace. But Marcellus and Lentulus (that otherwise hated Cæsar) withstood them, and to shame and dishonor him, had much needeles speech in matters of weight. Furthermore, they tooke away the freedom from the Colonies which Cæsar had lately brought vnto the cite of NOVVM COMVM in Gaul towards Italy, where Cæsar not long before had lodged them. And moreover, when Marcellus was Consul, he made one of the Senators in that cite to be whipped with rodde, who came to Rome about those matters: & said, he gaue him those markes, that he should know he was no ROMANE Citizen, and bad him goe his way, and tell Cæsar of it. After Marcellus Consulship, Cæsar setting open his cofers of the treasure he had gotte among the Gauls, did franklye giue it out amongst the Magistrates at Rome, without restraite or spare. First, he set Curio, the Tribune cleare out of debt: and gaue also vnto Paulus the Consul a thousand five hundred talents, with which money he built that notable pallace by the market place, called Paulus Basilicke, in the place of Fulvius Basilicke. Then Pompey being affraid of this practise, began openly to procure, both by him selfe and his friends, that they should send Cæsar a succesor: and moreover, he sent vnto Cæsar for his two legions of men of warre which he had lent him, for the conquest of Gaul. Cæsar sent him them againe, and gaue euery private souldier, two hundred and fifty siller drachmas. Now, they that brought these two legions backe from Cæsar, gaue out ill and seditious wordes against him amongst the people, and did also abuse Pompey with false perswasions and vaine hopes, informing him that he was maruelously desired and wished for in Cæsar's campe: and that though in Rome, for the malice and secret spire which the gouernours there did beare him; he could hardly obceyne that he desired: yet in GAVLE he might assure him selfe, that all the armie was at his commaundement. They added further also, that if the souldiers there did once returne ouer the mountaines againe into ITALY, they would all straight come to him, they did so hate Cæsar: because he wearied them with too much labor and continuall fight, and withal, for that they suspected he aspired to be king. These words breeding securitie in Pompey, & a vaine conceit of him selfe, made him negligent in his doings, so that he made no preparatiõ for warre, as though he had no occasion to be afraid: but onely studied to thwart Cæsar in speech, & to crosse the futes he made. Howbeit Cæsar passed not of all this. For the report went, that one of Cæsars Captaines which was sent to ROME to prosecute his sute, being at the Senate dore, and hearing that they denied to proroge Cæsars time of gouernment which he sued for: clapping his hand vpon his sword, he said, sith you wil not graunt it him, this shal giue it him. Notwithstanding, the request that Cæsar propounded, caried great semblance of reason with them. For he said, that he was contented to lay downe armes, so that Pompey did the like: & that both of them as priuat persons should come & make sute of their Citizens to obtaine honorable recompence: declaring vnto them, that taking armes from him, & granting them vnto Pompey, they did wrongfully accuse him in going about to make him selfe a tyranne, & in the meane time to graunt the other meanes to be a tyranne. Curio making these offers & perswasions opely before the people, in the name of Cæsar: he was heard with great reioycing & clapping of hands, and there were some that cast flowers and nosegayes vpon him when he went his way, as they commonly vse to doe vnto any man, when he hath obtayned victory, and wonne any games. Then Antonius one of the Tribunes, brought a letter sent from Cæsar, and made it openly to be read in despite of the Consuls. But Scipio in the Senate, Pompeys father in law, made this motion: that if Cæsar did not dismissh his armie by a certaine day appoynted him, the ROMANES should proclaime him an enemy vnto ROME. Then the Consuls openly asked in the preeence of the Senators, if they thought it good that Pompey should dismissh his armie: But few agreed to that demand. After that againe they asked, if they liked that Cæsar should dismissh his armie: thereto they all in manner answered, yea, yea. But when Antonius requested agayne that bothe of them should lay downe armes: then they were all indifferently of his minde. Notwithstanding, because Scipio did insolently behaue him selfe, and Marcellus also, who cryed that they must vse force of armes, & not mens opinions against a theefe: the Senate rose straight vpon it without further determination, & men chaunged apparel through the citie because of this dissention; as they vse to do in a common calamity. After that, there came other letters from Cæsar, which seemed much more reasonable in the which he requested that they would graunt him GAVLE, that lyeth betwene the Mountaines of the Alpes & ITALY, & ILLYRIA, with two legions only, & then that he would request nothing els, vntill he made sute for the second Consulship. Cicero the Orator, that was newly come from his gouernment of CILICIA, trauelled to reconcile them together, & pacified Pompey the best he could: who told him, he would yeld to any thing he would haue him, so he did let him alone with his armie. So Cicero onely, that Cæsars friends to be contented, to take those two prouinces, and fix thousand men onely, that they might be friends & at peace together. Pompey very willingly yelded vnto it, & granted them. But Lentulus the Consul would not agree to it, but shamefully draue Curio and Antonius out of the Senate: whereby they them selues gaue Cæsar a happy occasion & culler, as could be, stirring vp his souldiers the more against them, whẽ he shewed them these two notable men & Tribunes of the people that were driuen to flie, disguised like slaues, in a carriers cart. For, they were driuen for feare to steale out of ROME, disguised in that manner. Nowe at that time, Cæsar had not in all about him, aboue fise thousand footemen, and three thousand horsemen: for the rest of his armie, he left on thother side of the Mountaines to be brought after him by his Lieutenants. So, considering that for the execution of his enterprise, he should not neede so many men of warre at the first, but rather sodainly stealing vpon them, to make them afraid with his vainties, taking benefit of the oportunitie of tyme, because he should more easily make his enemies afraid of him, comming so sodainly when they looked not for him, then he should otherwise diffesse them, assailing them with his whole armie, in giuing them leysure to provide

A vnder further for him: he commaunded his Captaines and Lieutenants to go before, without any other armor then their swords, to take the citie of ARIMINVM, (a great citie of GAVLE, being the first citie men cometo, when they come out of GAVLE) with as litle bloodshed and tumult, as they could possible. Then committing that force and armie he had with him, vnto Hortensius one of his friends: he remeynd a whole day together, openly in the sight of euery man, to see the sworde players handle their weapons before him. At night he went into his lodging, and bathing his body a litle, came afterwards into the hall amongst them, and made mery with them a while, whome he had bidden to supper. Then when it was well forward night, and very darke, he rose from the table, and prayed his company to be mery, and no man to stirre, for he would straight come to them againe: howbeit he had secretly before commaunded a few of his trustiest friends to followe him, not altogether, but some one way, and some an other way. He him selfe in the meane tyme tooke a coche he had hyered, and made as though he would haue gone some other waye at the first, but sodainly he turned backe againe towards the citie of ARIMINVM. When he was come vnto the litle ryuer of Rubicon, which deuiddeth GAVLE on this side the Alpes from ITALY: he stayed vpon a sodaine. For, the nearer he came to execute his purpose, the more remorse he had in his conscience, to thinke what an enterprise he tooke in hand: & his thoughts also fell out more doubtful, when he entred into consideration of the desperatnes of his attempt. So he fell into many thoughts with him selfe, and spake neuer a word, wauing sometime one way, sometime an other way, and often times chaunged his determination, contrary to him selfe. So did he talke much also with his friends he had with him, amongst whom was Afinius Pollio, telling them what michieues the beginning of this passage ouer that riuer would breede in the world, and how much their posteritie and them that liued after them, would speake of it in time to come. But at length, casting from him with a noble courage, all those perillous thoughts to come, & speaking these words which valiant men commonly say, that attempt dangerous and desperat enterprises, A desperat man feareth no daunger, come on: he passed ouer the riuer, and when he was come ouer, he ranne with his coche and neuer staid, so that before day light he was within the citie of ARIMINVM, and tooke it. It is said, that the night before he passed ouer this riuer, he dreamed a damnable dreame, that he carnally knew his mother. The citie of ARIMINVM being taken, and the rumor thereof disperised through all ITALY, even as if it had bene opened in warre both by sea & land, & as if all the lawes of ROME, together with the extreme bounds and confines of the same had bene broken vp: a man would haue sayd, that not onely the men and women for feare, as experience proued at other times, but whole cities them selues leauing their habitations, fled from one place to another through all ITALY. And ROME it selfe also was immediatly filled with the flowing repaire of all the people their neighbours thereabouts, which came thither from all parties like droues of cattell, that there was neither officer nor Magistrate that could any more commaund them by authoritie, neither by any perswasion of reason bridle such a confused and disorderly multitude: so that ROME had in manner destroyed it selfe for lacke of rule and order. For in all places, men were of contrary opinions, and there were dangerous sturres and tumults euery where: because they that were glad of this trouble, could keepe in no certaine place, but running vp and downe the citie, when they met with others in diuers places, that seemed either to be afraid or angry with this tumult (as otherwise it is impossible in so great a citie) they flayly fell out with them, and boldly threatened them with that that was to come. Pompey him selfe, who at that time was not a litle amazed, was yet much more troubled with the ill wordes some gaue him on the one side, and some on the other. For some of them reproued him, and sayd that he had done wisely, and had paid for his folly, because he had made Cæsar so great and stronge against him & the common wealth. And other againe did blame him, because he had refused the honest offers and reasonable condicions of peace, which Cæsar had offered him, suffering Lentulus the Consul to abuse him too much. On thother side, Phaonius spake vnto him, and bad him stampe on the ground with his foote: For Pompey beeing one day in a brauerie in the Senate, sayd openly: let no man take thought for preparation of warre, for when he lysted, with one stampe of his foote on the ground, he would fill all ITALY with souldiers. This notwithstanding, Pompey at that tyme had greater number of souldiers then Cæsar: but they would neuer let him follow his owne determination. For they brought him so many lyes, and put so many examples of feare before him, as if Cæsar had bene already at their heeles, and had wonne all: so that in the ende he yelded vnto them, and gaue place to their furie and madnes, determining (seeing all things in such tumult and garboyle) that there was no way but to forsake the citie, and thereupon commaunded the Senate to follow him, and not a man to tary there, ynles he loued tyrannie, more then his owne libertie and the common wealth. Thus the Consuls then felues, before they had done their common sacrifices accustomed at their going out of the citie, fled euery man of them. So did likewise the moste parte of the Senators, taking their owne things in haste, such as came first to hande, as if by stealth they had taken them from another. And there were some of them also that alwayes loued Cæsar, whose wits were then so troubled and besides them selues, with the feare they had conceived: that they also fled, and followed the streame of this tumult, without manifest cause or necessitie. But aboute all things, it was a lamentable sight to see the citie it selfe, that in this feare and trouble was left at all aduenture, as a shippé tossed in storme of sea, forsoaken of her Pilots, and dispiraling of her safetie. This their departure being thus miserable, yet men esteemed their banishment (for the loue they bare vnto Pompey) to bee their naturall contry, and reckoned Rome no better then Cæsars campe. At that tyme also Labiæus, who was one of Cæsars greatestt friendes, and had bene alwayes vied as his Lieutenant in the warres of Gavie, and had valiantly fought in his cause: he likewise forsooke him then, and fled vnto Pompey. But Cæsar sent his money and cariage after him, and then went and encamped before the citie of Corfinium, the which Domitius kept, with thirty cohorts or ensignes. When Domitius sawe he was besegged, he straight thought him selfe but vndone, and dispayring of his successe, he bad a Phisition, a slaue of his, giue him poyson. The Phisition gaue him a drinke which he dranke, thinking to haue dyed. But shortly after, Domitius hearing them reporte what clemencie and wonderfull curtesie Cæsar vied vnto them he tooke: repented him then that he had dronke this drinke, and beganne to lament and bewaile his desperate resolucion taken to dye. The Phisition did comfort him againe, and tolde him, that he had taken a drinke, onely to make him sleepe, but not to destroy him. Then Domitius reioyced, and went straight and yelded him selfe vnto Cæsar: who gaue him his life, but he notwithstanding stalle away immediatly, and fled vnto Pompey. When these newes were brought to Rome, they did maruelously reioyce and comfort them that still remayned there: and moreover there were of them that had forsaken Rome, which returned thither againe. In the meane tyme, Cæsar did put all Domitius men in paye, and he did the like through all the cities, where he had taken any Captaines, that leauied men for Pompey. Now Cæsar hauing assembled a great and dreadfull power together, went straight where he thought to finde Pompey him selfe. But Pompey taried not his comming, but fled into the citie of Brundysium, from whence he had sent the two Consuls before with that armie he had, vnto Dyrrachium: and he him selfe also went thither afterwards, when he vnderstoode that Cæsar was come, as you shall here more amply hereafter in his life. Cæsar lacked no good will to follow him, but wanting shippes to take the seas, he returned forthwith to Rome: So that in lesse then three skore dayes, he was Lord of all Italy, without any blood shed. When he was come to Rome, and found it much quieter then he looked for, and many Senators there also: he curteously intreated them, and prayed them to send vnto Pompey, to pacifie all matters betweene them, upon reasonable conditions. But no man did attempt it, eyther because they feared Pompey for that they had forsaken him, or els for that they thought Cæsar ment not as he spake, but that they were wordes of course, to culler his purpose withall. And when Metellus also, one of the Tribunes, would not suffer him to take any of the common treasure out of the temple of Saturne, but tolde him that it was against the lawe: I tush, sayd he, tyme of warre and lawe are two things. If this that I doe, q he, doe offend thee, then get thee hence for this tyme: for warre can not abyde this francke and bolde speeche. But when warres are done, and that we are all quiet agayne, then thou shalt speake in the pulpit what thou wilt: and yet I doe tell thee this of fauor, inpayring so much my right, for thou art myne, both thou, and all them that haue risen against me, and whom I haue in my hands.

A When he had spoken thus vnto Metellus, he went to the temple dore where the treasure laye: and finding no keyes there, he caused Smythes to be sent for, and made them breake open the lockes. Metellus thereupon beganne agayne to withstande him; and certen men that stood by prayed him in his doing: but Cæsar at length speaking biggely to him, threatened him he would kill him presently, if he troubled him any more: and told him furthermore, younge man, q he, thou knowest it is harder for me to tell it thee, than to doe it. That word made Metellus quake for feare, that he gotte him away rowndly: and euer after that, Cæsar had all at his commaundement for the warres. From thence he went into Spain, to make warre with Petruus and Varro, Pompeys Lieutenants: first to gette their armies and provinces into his hands which they gouerned, that afterwarde he might follow Pompey the better, leaving neuer an enemie behinde him. In this iorney he was oftentimes him selfe in daunger, through the ambushes that were layde for him in diuers straunge sortes and places, and likely also to haue lost all his armie for lacke of vittells. All this notwithstanding, he neuer left following of Pompeys Lieutenants, prouoking them to battell, and intrenching them in: vntill he had gotten their campe & armies into his hands, albeit that the Lieutenants them selues fled vnto Pompey. When Cæsar returned agayne to Rome, Piso his father in lawe gaue him counsell to sende Ambassadors vnto Pompey, to treat of peace. But Isauricus, to flatter Cæsar, was against it. Cæsar being then created Dictator by the Senate, called home againe all the banished men, and restored their children to honor, whose fathers before had bene slayne in Syllas tyme: and did somewhat cutte off the vlturies that did oppresse them, and besides, did make some such other ordinances as those, but very fewe. For he was Dictator but eleuen dayes onely, and then did yeld it vpe of him selfe, and made him selfe Consul, with Servilius Isauricus, and after that determined to followe the warres. All the rest of his armie he left comming on the way behind him, and went him selfe before with six hundred horse, and siue legions onely of footemen, in the winter quarter, about the moneth of Ianuary, which after the Athenians, is called Poσειδων. Then hauing past ouer the sea Ionium, and landed his men, he wanne the cities of Oricum and Apollonia. Then he sent his shippes backe agayne vnto Brundysium, to transport the rest of his souldiers that could not come with that peece he did. They as they came by the way, (like men whose strength of body, & lusty youth, was decayed) being wearied with so many sundry battells as they had fought with their enemies: complained of Cæsar in this sorte. To what ende and purpose doth this man hale vs after him, vp and downe the world, vsing vs like slaues and drudges? It is not our armor, but our bodies that beare the blowes away: and what, shall we neuer be without our harnes of our backs, and our shields on our armes? should not Cæsar thinke, at the least when he seeth our blood and woundes, that we are all mortall men, and that we feele the miserie and paynes that other men doe feele? And now euen in the dead of winter, he putteth vs into the mercie of the sea and tempest, yea which the gods them selues can not withstand: as if he fled before his enemies, and pursued them not. Thus spending time with this talke, the souldiers still marching on, by small iorneys came at length vnto the citie of Brundysium. But when they were come, & found that Cæsar had already passed ouer the sea, then they straight chauged their complaints and mindes. For they blamed them selues, and tooke on also with their Captaines, because they had not made them make more haste in marching: and sitting vpon the rockes and clyffes of the sea, they looked ouer the mayne sea, towards the Realme of Epirus, to see if they could discern the shippes returning backe, to transport them ouer. Cæsar in the meane time being in the citie of Apollonia, hauing but a small armie to fight with Pompey, it greued him for that the rest of his armie was so long a comming, not knowing what way to take. In the ende he followed a daungerous determination, to imbarke vnknewen in a litle pynnaf of twelue ores onely, to passe ouer the sea agayne vnto Brundysium: the which he could not doe without great daunger, considering that all that sea was full of Pompeys shippes and armies. So he tooke shippe in the night apparelled like a slaue, and went aborde vpon this litle pynnaf, & said neuer a word, as if he had bene some poore man of meane condition. The pynnaf laye in the mouth of the riuer of Anius, the which commonly was wont to be very calme & quiet, by reason of a litle wind that came from the shore, which euery morning draue backe the waues farre into the maine sea. But that night, by ill fortune, there came a great wind from the sea that ouercame the land wind, inso much as the force & strength of the riuer fighting against the violence of the rage & waues of the sea, the encounter was maruailous dangerous, the water of the riuer being driuen backe, and rebounding vppward, with great noyse and danger in turning of the water. Thereupon the Maister of the pynnafe seeing he could not possibly get out of the mouth of this riuer, bad the Maryners to cast about againe, and to returne against the streame. Cæsar hearing that, straight discovered him selfe vnto the Maister of the pynnafe, who at the first was amazed when he saw him: but Cæsar then taking him by the hand sayd vnto him, good fellow, be of good cheere, and forwardes hardly, feare not for thou hast Cæsar and his fortune with thee. Then the Maryners forgetting the danger of the storme they were in, laid on lode with ores, and labored for life what they could against the winde, to get out of the mouth of this riuer. But at length, perceiuing they labored in vaine, and that the pynnafe tooke in abundance of water, and was ready to sincke: Cæsar then to his great griefe was driuen to returne backe again. Who when he was returned vnto his campe, his souldiers came in great companies vnto him, & were very sory, that he mistrusted he was not able with them alone to ouercome his enemies, but would put his person in danger, to goe fetch them that were absent, putting no trust in them that were present. In the meane time Antonius arrived, and brought with him the rest of his army from BRVNDISIUM. Then Cæsar finding him selfe strong enough, went & offered Pompey battell, who was passingly well lodged, for vittelling of his campe both by sea & land. Cæsar on thother side, who had no great plenty of vittells at the first, was in a very hard case: inso much as his men gathered rootes, & mingled the with milke, & ate them. Furthermore, they did make breade of it also, & sometime when they skirmished with the enemies, & came alongest by them that watched and warded, they cast of their bread into their trenches, and sayd: that as long as the earth brought forth such frutes, they would neuer leaue besieging of Pompey. But Pompey straightly commaunded them, that they should neither cary those words nor bread into their campe, fearing least his mens hartes would faile them, and that they would be affraid, when they should thinke of their enemies hardnes, with whome they had to fight, si the they were weary with no paynes, no more then brute beastes. Cæsar's men did daily skirmish hard to the trenches of Pompey's campe, in the which Cæsar had euer the better, sauing once only, at what tyme his men fled with such feare, that all his campe that daye was in greate hazarde to haue bene caste awaye. For Pompey came on with his battell upon them, and they were not able to abyde it, but were fought with, and dryuen into their campe, and their trenches were filled with deade bodyes, which were slayne within the very gate and bullwarkes of their campe, they were so valiantly pursued. Cæsar stoode before them that fledde, to make them to turne heade agayne: but he coulde not preuaile. For when he woulde haue taken the ensignes to haue stayed them, the ensigne bearers threw them downe on the ground: so that the enemyes tooke two and thirtie of them, and Cæsar selfe also escaped hardly with lyfe. For stryking a greate bigge souldier that fledde by him, commaunding him to staye, and turne his face to his enemye: the souldier being affrayde, lift vpp his sword to stryke at Cæsar. But one of Cæsar's Pages preuenting him, gaue him suche a blowe with his sword, that he strake of his howlde. Cæsar that daye was brought vnto so greate extremite, that (if Pompey had not eyther for feare, or spytefull fortune, left of to followe his victorie, and retyred into his campe, being contented to haue dryuen his enemyes into their campe) returning to his campe with his friends, he sayde vnto them: the victorie this daye had bene our enemies, if they had had a Capteyne, that coulde haue tolde howe to haue ouercome. So when he was come to his lodging, he went to bedde, and that nyght troubled him more, then any nyght that euer he had. For still his mynde ranne with great sorowe of the fowle faulte he had committed in leading of his armye, of selfe will to remaine there so long by the sea side, his enemies being the stronger by sea: considering that he had before him a goodly contrie, riche and plentifull of all thinges, and goodly cities of MACEDON and THESSALY, and had not the witte to bringe the warre from thence, but to lose his tyme in a place, where he was rather besieged of his enemyes for lacke of vittells, then that he did beseege them by force

A force of armes. Thus, fretting and chafing to see him selfe so strayghted with vittells, and to thinke of his yll lucke, he rayled his campe, intending to goe sette vpon Scipio, making accompt, that either he should drawe Pompey to battell against his will, when he had not the sea at his backe to furnish him with plenty of vittells: or els that he should easily ouercome Scipio, finding him alone, vnles he were ayded. This remoue of Cæsar's campe, did much encourage Pompey's armye and his captaines, who would needes in any case haue followed after him, as though he had bene ouercome, and had fled. But for Pompey him selfe, he would in no respect hazard battell, which was a matter of so great importance. For finding him selfe well provided of all thinges necessary to tary tyme, he thought it better to drawe this warre out in length, by tract of time, the rather to consume this litle strength that remainyd in Cæsar's armye: of the which, the best men were maruailous well trayned and good souldiers, and for valiantnes, at one daies battell, were incomparable. But on thother side againe, to remoue here and there to soe oft, and to fortifie their campe where they came, and to beseege any wall, or to keepe watch all night in their armor: the most part of them could not doe it, by reason of their age, being then vnable to away with that paynes, so that the weakenes of their bodies did also take away the life and courage of their hartes. Furthermore, there fell a pestilent discaise amonge them that came by ill meates hunger draue them to eate: yet was not this the worst. For besides, he had no store of money, neither could tell how to come by vittells: so that it seemed in all likelihood, that in very short tyme he would come to nothing. For these respects, Pompey would in no case fight, and yet had he but Cato only of his minde in that, who stucke in it the rather, because he would auoyde shedding of his contry mens bloode. For when Cato had viewed the deade bodies slayne in the campe of his enemies, at the last skirmish that was betwene them, the which were no lesse then a thousand persons: he covered his face, and went away weeping. All other but he, contrarily fell out with him, and blamed him, because he so long refrayned from battell: and some prickt him forward, and called him Agamemnon, and king of kings, saying, that he delayed this warre in this sort, because he would not leaue his autoritie to commaund them all, and that he was glad alwaies to see so many Captaines round about him, which came to his lodging to honor him, and waite vpon him. And Paonius also, a harebraynd fellowe, frantlyky counterfeiting the round and playne speche of Cato, made as though he was maruailous angry, and sayd: is it not great pitie, that we shall not eate this yere of TVSCVLYM figges, and all for Pompey's ambitious minde to raigne alone? and Afranius, who not long before was but lately come out of SPAYNE, (where, because he had but ill successe, he was accused of treason, that for money he had solde his armye vnto Cæsar;) he went busily asking, why they fought not with that Marchant, vnto whom they sayde he had solde the prouince of SPAYNE? So that Pompey with these kinde of speeches, against his will, was driuen to followe Cæsar, to fight with him. Then was Cæsar at the first, maruailously perplexed, and troubled by the waye: because he founde none that would giue him any vittells, being despised of euery man, for the late losse and ouerthrowe he had receuyed. But after that he had taken the cite of GOMPHES in THESSALY, he did not only meete with plenty of vittells to relieue his armye with: but he strangely also did ridde them of their discaise. For the souldiers meeting with plenty of wyne, drinking harde, and making mery: draue awaye the infection of the pestilence. For they disposed them selues vnto dauncing, masking, and playing the BACCHERIANS by the waye: inso much that drinking droncke they ouercame their discaise, and made their bodies newe agayne. When they both came into the contry of PHARSALIA, and both camps laye before thother: Pompey returned agayne to his former determination, and the rather, because he had ill signes and tokens of misfortune in his sleepe. For he thought in his sleepe that when he entred into the Theater, all the ROMANES receuyed him with great clapping of handes. Whereupon, they that were about him grewe to suche boldnes and securitie, assuring them selues of victory: that Dorsitius, Spinther, and Scipio, in a brauery contended betwene them selues, for the chiefe Bishoppricke which Cæsar had. Furthermore, there were diuers that sent vnto ROME to hyre the nearest houses vnto the market place, as being the fittest places for Prators, and Consuls: making their accompt already, that those offices coulde not scape them, incontinently after the warres. But besides those, the younge gentlemen, and ROMANE knights were maruelous desirous to fight, that were brauely mounted, and armed with glittering gilt armors, their horses fat and very finely kept, and them selues goodly young men, to the number of seuen thousand, where the gentlemen of Cæsar's side, were but one thousand onely. The number of his footemen also were much after the same reckoning. For he had fide and forty thousand against two and twenty thousand. Wherefore Cæsar called his souldiers together, & told the how Cornificius was at hande, who brought two whole legions, and that he had fiftene enignes led by Calenus, the which he made to stay about MEGARA & ATHENS. Then he asked them if they would tary for that ayde or not, or whether they would rather them selues alone venter battell. The souldiers cryed out to him, and prayed him not to deferre battell, but rather to deuise some fetch to make the enemy fight assoone as he could. Then as he sacrificed vnto the gods, for the purifying of his armie: the first beast was no sooner sacrificed, but his Soothsayer assured him that he should fight within three dayes. Cæsar asked him againe, if he saw in the sacrifices, any lucky signe, or token of good lucke. The Soothsayer answered, for that, thou shalt answer thy selfe, better then I can doe: for the gods doe promise vs a maruelous great chaunge, and alteration of thinges that are now, vnto an other cleane contrary. For if thou bee'st well now, doe'st thou thinke to haue worse fortune hereafter, and if thou be ill, assure thy selfe thou shalt haue better. The night before the battell, as he went about midnight to visite the watch, men saw a great firebrand in the element, all of a light fire, that came ouer Cæsar's campe, and fell downe in Pompey's. In the morning also when they releued the watche, they heard a false alarm in the enemies campe, without any apparant cause, which they commonly call, a sodaine feare, that makes men besides them selues. This notwithstanding, Cæsar thought not to fight that day, but was determined to haue raised his camp from thence, and to haue gone towards the cite of SCOTVSA: and his tents in his campe were already ouerthrowen when his skowtes came in with great speede, to bringe him newes that his enemies were preparing them selues to fight. Then he was very glad, & after he had made his prayers vnto the gods to helpe him that day, he set his men in battell ray, & deuicid them into three squadrons: giuing the middle battell vnto Domitius Calpinus, and the left winge vnto Antonius, and placed him selfe in the right winge, choosing his place to fight in the tenth legion. But seeing that against that, his enemies had set all their horsemen: he was halfe affraid when he saw the great number of them, and so braue besides. Wherefore he closely made fix enignes to come from the rereward of his battell, whom he had layd as an ambush behind his right winge, hauing first appointed his souldiers what they should do, when the horsemen of the enemies came to giue them charge. On thother side, Pompey placed him selfe in the right winge of his battell, gaue the left winge vnto Domitius, and the middle battell vnto Scipio his father in law. Now all the ROMANE knights (as we haue told you before) were placed in the left winge, of purpose to enuyrone Cæsar's right winge behinde, and to giue their hottest charge there, where the generall of their enemies was: making their accompt, that there was no squadron of footemen how thicke soeuer they were, that could recieue the charge of so great a trowpe of horsemen, and that at the first onset, they should ouerthrow them all, and marche vpon their bellies. When the trompeters on either side did sound the alarm to the battell, Pompey commaunded his footemen that they should stande still without furring, to recieue the charge of their enemies, vntill they came to throwing of their darts. Wherefore Cæsar afterwards sayde, that Pompey had committed a fowle faulte, not to consider that the charge which is giuen ronning with furie, besides that it giueeth the more strength also vnto their blowes, doth sette mens hartes also a fire: for the common hurling of all the souldiers that ronned together, is vnto them as a boxe of the eare that setteth men a fire. Then Cæsar making his battell marche forward to giue the onfette, sawe one of his Captaines (a valiant man, and very skillfull in warre, in whome he had also greates confidence) speaking to his souldiers that he had vnder his charge, encouraging them to fight lyke men that daye. So he called him alowde by his name, and sayde vnto him: well, Caius Crasinius, what hope shall we haue to day? how are we determined, to fight it out manfully? Then Crasinius casting vp his hand, answered him alowd: this day, O Cæsar, we shall haue a noble victory, and I promise thee

A wonder scene in the element, before the battell in Phœsalia.

Cæsar's armie and his order of battell, in the fieldes of Phœsalia.

An ill counsel and fowle faulte of Pompey.

A thee ere night thou shalt praye me alyue or dead. When he had told him so, he was him selfe the foremost man that gaue charge vpon his enemies, with his band following of him, beeing about fix score men, and making a lane through the foremost rankes, with great slaughter he cuttred farre into the battell of his enemies: vntill that valiantly fighting in this sort, he was thrust in at length in the mouth with a sworde, that the poynt of it came out agayne at his necke. Nowe the footemen of both battells being come to the sworde, the horsemen of the left winge of Pompey, did marche as fiercely also, spreading out their trowpes, to compass in the right winge of Cæsar's battell. But before they beganne to giue charge, the fix enignes of footemen which Cæsar had layd in ambush behind him, they beganne to runne, full upon them, not throwing away their darts farre of as they were wont to doe, neyther striking their enemies on the thighes nor on the legges, but to seeke to hit them full in the eyes, and to hurt them in the face, as Cæsar had taught them. For he hoped that these lusty younge gentlemen that had not bene often in the warres, nor were viced to see them selues hurt, & the which, beeing in the pryme of their youth and beautie, would be affrayd of those hurtes, as well for the feare of the present daunger to be slayne, as also for that their faces should not for euer be deformed. As in deede it came to passe, for they could neuer abyde that they shoulde come so neare their faces, with the poyntes of their darts, but honge downe their heades for feare to be hitte with them in their eyes, and turned their backs, couering their face, because they shoulde not be hurt. Then, breaking of them selues, they beganne a length cowardly to flye, and were occasion also of the losse of all the rest of Pompey's armie. For they that had broken them, ranne immediatly to sette vpon the squadron of the footemen behind, and slue them. Then Pompey seeing his horsemen from the other winge of his battell, so scattered and disperled; flying away: forgate that he was any more Pompey the great which he had bene before, but rather was like a man whose wittes the goddes had taken from him, being affrayd and amazed with the slaughter sent from aboue, and so retyred into his tent speaking neuer a worde, and fate there to see the ende of this battell. Vntill at length all his army beeing ouerthrowen, and put to flight, the enemies came, and gotte vp vpon the rampers and defence of his campe, and fought hande to hande with them that stood to defende the same. Then as a man come to him selfe agayne, he spake but this onely worde: What, euen into our campe? So in halte, casting of his coare armor and apparell of a generall, he shifted him, and put on such, as became his miserable fortune, and so staled out of his campe. Furthermore, what he did after this ouerthrowe, and howe he had put him selfe into the handes of the EGYPTIANS, by whome he was miserably slayne: we haue sette it forth at large in his life. Then Cæsar entring into Pompey's campe, and seeing the bodies layd on the grounde that were slayne, and others also that were a killing, sayde, fetching a great sigh: it was their owne doing, and against my will. For Caius Cæsar, after he had wonne so many famous conquests, and overcome so many great battells, had bene vtterly condemned notwithstanding, if he had departed from his armie. Asinius Pollio writeth, that he spake these wordes then in Laryn, which he afterwards wrote in Greeke, and sayeth furthermore, that the moste parte of them which were put to the sworde in the campe, were slaues and bondmen; and that there were not slayne in all at this battell, about fix thousand souldiers. As for them that were taken prisoners, Cæsar did put many of them amongst his legions, and did pardon also many men of estimation, amonge whome Brutus was one, that afterwards slue Cæsar him selfe: and it is reported, that Cæsar was very sorry for him, when he could not immediatly be founde after the battell, and that he reioyced againe, when he knewe he was alyue, and that he came to yeelde him selfe vnto him. Cæsar had many signes and tokens of victorie before this battell: but the notablest of all other that hapned to him, was in the cite of TRALLIS. For in the temple of victorie, within the same cite, there was an image of Cæsar, and the earth all about it very hard of it selfe, and was pained besides with hard stone: and yet some say that there sprang vnto a palme hard by the base of the same image. In the cite of PADYRA, F. Caius Cornelius an excellent Soothsayer, (a contry man and friende of Tiberius Linius the Historiographer) was by chaunce at that time let to beholde the flying of birdes. He (as Linius reporteth) knewe the very tyme when the battell beganne, and tolde them that were present, even now they gaue the onset on both sides, and both armies do meete at this instant. They sitting downe againe to consider of the birdes, after he had bethought him of the signes: he sodainly rose vp on his feete, and cryed out as a man possessed with some spirit, oh, Cæsar, the victory is thine. Euery man wondering to see him, heooke the crowne he had on his head, and made an othe that he would neuer put it on againe, till the euent of his prediotion had proued his arte true. Linie testifieth, that it so came to passe. Cæsar afterwards giuing freedom vnto the THESSALIANS, in respect of the victory which he wanne in their contry, he followed after Pompey. When he came into ASIA, he gaue freedom also vnto the GVNDIANS for Thopompus sake, who had gathered the fables together. He did releafe ASIA also, the thirde part of the tribute which the inhabitants payd vnto the ROMANES. Then he came into ALEXANDRIA, after Pompey was slaine: and detested Theodorus, that presented him Pompeys heade, and turned his head at toe side bicause he would not see it. Notwithstanding, he tooke his scale, and beholding it, wept. Furthermore, he curteously vied all Pompeys friendes and families, who wandering vp and downe the contry, were taken of the king of EGYPT, and wanne them all to be at his commendement. Continuing these curtesies, he wrote vnto his friendes at ROME, that the greatest pleasure he tooke of his victorie, was, that he dayly saued the liues of some of his contry men that bare armes against him. And for the warre he made in ALEXANDRIA, some say, he needed not haue done it, but that he willingly did it for the loue of Cleopatra: Wherein he wanne little honor, and besides did purhis person in great danger. Others doe lay the fault vpon the king of *EGYPT*s Ministers, but specially on Pothimus the Euenuke, who bearing the greatest swaye of all the kinges seruants, after he had caused Pompey to be slaine, and driuen Cleopatra from the Court, secretly layd waite all the wayes he could, how he might likewise kill Cæsar. Wherefore Cæsar hearing an inckling of it, beganne thenceforth to spend all the night long in feasting and banquetting, that his person might be in the better facie. But besides all this, Pothimus the Euenuke spake many things openly not to be come, onely to shame Cæsar, and to stirre vp the people to enuie him. For he made his souldiers haue the worst and oldest wheate that could be gotten: then if they did complayne of it, he told them, they must be contented, seeing they ate at anothers mans cosse. And he would serue them also at the table in treene and earthen dishes, saying, that Cæsar had away all their gold and siluer, for a debt that the kings father (that then reigned) did owe vnto him: which was a thousand seven hundred and fiftie Minades, whereof Cæsar had before forgiuen seven hundred & fiftie thousand vnto his children. Howbeit then he asked a Myllion to paye his souldiours withall. Thereto Pothimus answered him, that at that tyme he should doe better to follow his other causes of greater importance, and afterwarde that he should at more leysure recouer his dette, with the kinges good will and fauor. Cæsar replied vnto him, and sayd, that he would not aske counsell of the EGYPTIANS for his affayres, but would be payd: and thereupon secretly sent for Cleopatra which was in the contry to come vnto him. She onely taking Apollodorus SCITILIAN of all her friendes, tooke a little bote, and went away with him in it in the night, and came and landed hard by the foote of the castell. Then hauing no other meane to come in to the court, without being knowne, she laid her selfe downe vpon a mattresse or flockbed, which Apollodorus her friend tooke & bound vp together like a bûdel with a great leather thong, and so tooke her vp on his backe, and brought her thus hamperd in this fardell vnto Cæsar, in at the castell gate. This was the first occasion, (as it is reported) that made Cæsar to loue her: but afterwards, when he sawe her sweete conuersation and pleasant entertainment, he fell then in further liking with her, & did reconcile her againe vnto her brother the king, with condition, that they two ioyntly should raigne together. Apon this newe reconciliation, a great feast being prepared, a slaue of *Cæsar*s that was his barber, the fearefullest wretch that liued, full busily prying and listening abroad in euery corner, being mistrustfull by nature: found that Pothimus and Achillas did lie in waite to kill his Maister Cæsar. This beeing proued vnto Cæsar, he did sette such fure watch about the hall, where the feast was made, that in fine, he flue the Euenuke Pothimus him selfe. Achillas on thother side, saued him selfe, and fled vnto the kinges campe, where he rayed a maruelous daingerous & difficult warre for Cæsar: bicause he hauing then but a few men about him as he had, he was to fight against a great & strong city. A daunger he fell into, was for the lacke of water he had: for that his enemies had stopped the mouth of the pipes, the which conueyed the water vnto the castell. The seconde daunger he had, was, that seeing his enemies came to take his shippes from him: he was driuen to repulsa that daunger with fire, the which burnt the arsenall where the shippes lay: and that notable librarie of ALEXANDRIA withall. The third daunger was in the battell by sea, that was fought by the tower of Phar: where meaning to helpe his men that fought by sea, he leapt from the peere, into a boate. Then the EGYPTIANS made towards him with their oars, on either side: but he leaping into the sea, with great hazard saued him selfe by swimming. Cris sayd, that then holding diuers bookes in his hand, he did neuer let them go, but kept them alwayes vpon his head about water, & swamme with the other hand, notwithstanding that they shot maruelously at him, and was driuen sometime to ducke into the water: howbeit the boate was drowned presently. In fine, the king comming to his men that made warre with Cæsar, he went against him, and gaue him battell, and wanne it with great slaughter, and effusion of blood. But for the king, no man could euer tell what became of him after. Thereupon Cæsar made Cleopatra his siter, Queene of EGYPT: who being great with childe by him: was shortly brought to bedde of a sonne, whom the ALEXANDRIANS named Cæsarion. From thence he went into SYRIA, and so going into ASIA, there it was told him that Dionisius was ouerthrowen in battell, by Pharnaces, the sonne of king Adirbrides, and was fled out of the realme of PONTE, with a few men with him: and that this king Pharnaces greedily following his victorie, was not contented with the winning of BITHYNIA, & CAPPADOCIA, but further would needs attempt to winne ARMENIA the lesse, procuring all those kinges, Princes, and Governours of the prouinces thereabouts, to rebell against the ROMANES. Thereupon Cæsar went thither straight with three legions, and fought a great battell with king Pharnaces, by the citie of ZELA, where he flue his armie, & draue him out of all the realme of PONTE. And bicause he would aduerise one of his friendes of the foddaines of this victorie, he onely wrote three words vnto Annius at ROME: Veni, Vidi, Vici: to wit, I came, I saw, I ouercame. These three wordes ending all with like sound and letters in the Latin, haue a certaine Rhot grace, more pleasant to the eare, then can be well exprest in any other tongue. After this, he returned againe into ITALIE, and came to ROME, ending his yeare for the which he was made Dictator the seconde time, which office before was neuer granted for one whole yeare, but vnto him. Then he was chosen Consul for the yeare following. Afterwarde he was very ill spoken of, for that his souldiers in a mutine hauing slaine two Pretors, Cosconius, and Gabius, he gaue them no other punishment for it, but in steade of calling them souldiers, he named them citizens, and gaue vnto euery one of them, a thousand Drachmas a man, and great possessions in ITALIE. He was much misliked also for the desperate parts and madnes of Dolabella, for the couetousnes of Annius, for the dronkenness of Antonius and Cornificius, which made Pompeys house be pulled downe and builded vp againe, as a thing not bigge enough for him, whereas the ROMANES were maruelously offended. Cæsar knew all this well enough: and would haue bene contented to haue redressed them: but to bring his matters to passe he pretended, he was driuen to serue his turne by such instrumentes. After the battell of Pharsalia, Cato and Scipio being fled into AFRICKA, king Iuba ioynd with them, & leaued a great puissant armie. Wherefore Cæsar determined to make warre with them, & in the middle of winter, he tooke his iorney into SICILIE. There, bicause he would take all hope from his Captiues and souldiers to make any long abode there, he went and lodged vpon the very sandes by the sea side, and with the next gale of winde that came, he tooke the sea with three thousand footemen, and a few horsemen. Then hauing put them a land, vnto them, he hoysed sayle againe, to goe fetch the rest of his armie, being afraied least they should meete with some dainger in passing ouer, and meeting them middle way, he brought them all into his campe. Where, when it was tolde him that his enemies trusted in an ancient Oracle, which sayd, that it was predestined vnto the family of the Scipios to be conquerors in AFRICKA: either of purpose to mocke Scipio the Generall of his enemies, or otherwise in good earnest to take the benefit of this name (geuen by the Oracle) vnto him selfe, in all the skirmishes & battells he fought, he gaue the charge of his army, vnto again of meane quality and accompt, called Scipio Sal-

Intius, who came of the race of Scipio, AFRICAN, and made him alwayes his Generall whom he fought. For he was effoones compelled to weary and harrie his enemies: for that neither his men in his campe had come enough, nor his beasts forrage, but the souldiers were driuen to take sea weedes, called Alga: and (washing away the brackishnes thereof with fresh water, putting to it a litle erbe called dogges tooth) to salt it so to their horse to eat. For the NVMDIANS (which are light horsemen, and very ready of service) being a great number together, would be on a sodaine in euery place, and spread all the fieldes ouer thereabout, so that no man durst peepe out of the campe to goe for forrage. And one day as the men of armes were flaying to beholde an AFRICAN doing notable things in dauncing, and playing with the flutes, they being set downe quietly to take their pleasure of the view thereof, hauing in the meane time geuen their slaues their horses to hold, the enemies stealing sodainly vpon them, compassed them in round about, and slue a number of them in the field, and chasing the other ab so that fled, followed them pell mell into their campe. Furthermore had not Cæsar him selfe in person, and Afinius Pollio with him gone out of the campe to the rescue, and stayed them that fled: the warre that day had bene ended. There was also an other skirmish where his enemies had the vpper hande, in the which it is reported, that Cæsar taking the ensigne bearer by the collar that carried the Eagle in his hande, stayed him by force, and turning his face, tolde him: see, there be thy enemies. These aduantage did lift vp *Scipio*s hart aloft, and gaue him courage to hazard battell: and leauing Africanus on the one hand of him, and king Iuba on the other hande, both their campes lying neere to other, he did fortifie him selfe by the citie of Thapsacus, aboute the lake, to be a safe refuge for them all in this battell. But whilest he was busie intrenching of him selfe, Cæsar hauing maruelous speedily passed through a great contrie full of wod, by bypathes which men would neuer haue mistrusted, he stole vpon some behinde, and sodainly assailed the other before, so that he ouerthrowe them all, and made them flee. Then following this first good happe he had, he went forthwith to set apon the campe of Africanus, the which he tooke at the first onset, and the campe of the NVMDIANS also, king Iuba being fled. Thus in a litle peece of the day only, he tooke three campes, & slue fifty thousand of his enemies, and lost but fifty of his souldiers. In this forte is set downe the effect of this battell by some wryters. Yet others doe wryte also, that Cæsar selfe was not there in person at the execution of this battell. For as he did set his men in battell ray, the falling sickenes took him, whereunto he was geuen, and therefore feeling it comming, before he was ouercome withall, he was caried into a castell not farre from thence, where the battell was fought, and there tooke his rest till the extremity of his disease had left him. Now, for the Prætors & Consuls that escaped from this battell, many of them being taken prisoners, did kill them selues, and others also Cæsar did put to death: but he being specially desirous of all men else to haue Cato aliue in his hands, he went with all possible speede vnto the citie of Vtica, whereof Cato was Gouvernor, by meanes whereof he was not at the battell. Norwithstanding being certified by the way that Cato had slaine him selfe with his owne handes, he then made open shew that he was very sorry for it, but why or wherefore, no man could tell. But this is true, that Cæsar sayd at that present time: O Cato, I enuy thy death, because thou diddest enuy my glory, to save thy life. This notwithstanding, the booke that he wrote afterwards against Cato being dead, did shew no very great affection nor pitiefull hart towards him. For how could he haue pardoned him, if liuing he had had him in his handes: that being dead did speake so vehemently against him? Notwithstanding, men suppose he would haue pardoned him, if he had taken him aliue, by the clemencie he shewed vnto Cicero, Brutus, and diuers others that had borne armes against him. Some reporte, that he wrote that booke, not so much for any priuate malice he had to his death, as for a ciuill ambition, apon this occasion. Cicero had written a booke in praise of Cato, which he intituled, Cato. This booke in likely hooe was very well liked of, by reason of the eloquence of the Orator that made it, and of the excellent subiect thereof. Cæsar therewith was maruelously offended, thinking that to praise him, of whose death he was author, was euen as much as to accuse him self: & therefore he wrote a letter against him, & heaped vp a number of accusations against Cato, and intituled the booke Anticato. Both these bookes haue fauourers vnto this day, some defending the one for the loue they bare to Cæsar, and

A and others allowing the other for *Cato*s sake. Cæsar being now returned out of AFRICA, first of all made an oration to the people, wherein he greatly praised and commended this his last victorie, declaring vnto them, that he had conquered so many contries vnto the Empire of Rome, that he coule furnishe the common wealth yearely, with two hundred thousand bushells of wheate, & twenty hundred thousand pound weight of oyle. Then he made three triumphes, the one for Ægypt, the other for the kingdom of Pontus, and the third for AFRICA: not because he had ouercome Scipio there, but king Iuba. Whose sonne being likewise called Iuba, being then a young boy, was led captiue in the shewe of this triumphe. But this his imprisonment fel out happily for him: for where he was but a barbarous NVMDIAN, by the study he fel vnto when he was prisoner, he came afterwards to be reckoned one of the best historiographers of the Grecians. After these three triumphes ended, he very liberally rewarded his souldiers: and to curry fauor with the people, he made great feasts & common sportes. For he feasted all the ROMANES at one time, at two and twenty thousand tables, and gaue them the pleasure to see diuers sword players to fight at the sharpe, and battells also by sea, for the remembrance of his daughter Julia, which was dead long afore. Then after all these sportes, he made the people (as the manner was) to be mustered: and where there were at the last musters before, three hundred and twenty thousand citizens, at this muster only there were but a hundred and fifty thousand. Such misery and destruction had this ciuill warre brought vnto the common wealth of Rome, and had consumed such a number of ROMANES not speaking at all of the mischieues and calamities it had brought vnto all the rest of ITALIE, and to the other prouinces pertaining to Rome. After all these things were ended, he was chosen Consul the fourth time, and went into SPAYNE to make warre with the sonnes of Pompey: who were yet but very young, but had notwithstanding raised a maruelous great army together, and shewed to haue had manhoode and courage worthie to commande such an armie, inso much as they put Cæsar him selfe in great danger of his life. The greatest battell that was fought betwene them in all this warre, was by the citie of MVnda. For then Cæsar seeing his men forely distressed, and hauing their hands full of their enemies: he ranne into the prease among his men that fought, and cried out vnto them: what are ye not ashamed to be beaten and taken prisoners, yeelding your selues with your owne handes to these young boyes? And so, with all the force he could make, hauing with much a doe put his enemies to flight: he slue about thirty thousand of them in the field, and lost of his owne men a thousand of the best he had. After this battell he went into his tent, and told his friends, that he had often before fought for victory, but this last time now, that he had fought for the safety of his owne life. He wanne this battell on the very feast day of the BACCHANALIANS, in the which men say, that Pompey the great went out of Rome, about foure yeares before, to beginne this ciuill warre. For his sonnes, the younger escaped from the battell: but within few days after, Didius brought the heade of the elder. This was the last warre that Cæsar made. But the triumphe he made into Rome for the same, did as much offend the ROMANES, and more, than any thing that euer he had done before: because he had not ouercome Captaines that were strangers, nor barbarous kings, but had destroyed the sonnes of the noblest man in Rome, whom fortune had ouerthrowen. And because he had plucked vp his race by the rootes, men did not thinke it meete for him to triumphe so, for the calamities of his contrie, reioicing at a thing for the which he had but one excuse to alleage in his defence, vnto the gods and men: that he was compelled to doe that he did. And the rather they thought it not meete, because he had neuer before sent letters nor messengers vnto the common wealth at Rome, for any victorie that he had euer wonne in all the ciuill warres: but did alwayes for shame refuse the glorie of it. This notwithstanding, the ROMANES inclining to *Cæsar*s prosperitie, and taking the bit in the mouth, supposing that to be ruled by one man alone, it would be a good meane for them to take breth a litle, after so many troubles and miseries as they had abidden in these ciuill warres: they chose him perpetuall Dictator. This was a plaine tyranny: for to this absolute power of Dictator, they added this, neuer to be affraid to be deposed. Cicero propounded before the Senate, that they should geue him such honors, as were meete for a man: howbeit others afterwards added to, honors beyonde all reason. For, men striuing who should most honor him, they made him hatefull and troublefome to them felues that most fauored him, by reason of the vnmeasurable greatnes and honors which they gaue him. Thereupon it is reported, that euen they that most hated him, were no lesse fauorers and furtherers of his honors, then they that most flattered him: because they might haue greater occasions to rise, and that it might appeare they had iust cause and colour to attempt that they did against him. And now for him selfe, after he had ended his ciuill warres, he did so honorably behaue himselfe, that there was no fault to be founde in him: and therefore me thinks, amongst other honors they gaue him, he rightly deserued this, that they should builde him a temple of clemency, to thanke him for his curesse he had vsed vnto them in his victorie. For he pardoned many of them that had borne armes against him, and furthermore, did preferre some of them to honor and office in the common wealth: as amongst others, Cassius and Brutus, both of which were made Prætors. And where Pompeys images had bene throwen downe, he caused them to be set vp againe: whereupon Cicero sayd then, that Cæsar setting vp Pompeys images againe, he made his owne to stand the surer. And when some of his friends did counsell him to haue a gard for the safety of his person, and some also did offer them felues to serue him: he would neuer consent to it, but sayd, it was better to dye once, then alwayes to be affrayed of death. But to win him selfe the loue and good will of the people, as the honorablest gard and best safety he could haue: he made common feasts againe, & generall distributions of come. Furthermore, to gratifie the souldiers also, he replenished many cities againe with inhabitants, which before had bene destroyed, and placed them there that had no place to repaite vnto: of the which the noblest & chiefeft cities were these two, CARTHAGE, & CORINTH, and it chaunced so, that like as aforetime they had bene both taken and destroyed together, euen so were they both set a foote againe, and replenished with people, at one selfe time. And as for great personages, he wanne them also, promising some of them, to make them Prætors and Consuls in time to come, and vnto others, honors and preferments, but to all men generally good hope, seeking all the wayes he coule to make euery man contented with his raigne. In somuch as one of the Consuls called Maximus, chauncing to dye a day before his Consulshippe ended, he declared Cæsar Rebilus Consul only for the day that remained. So, diuers going to his house (as the manner was) to salute him, & to congratulate with him of his calling and preferment, being newly chosen officer: Cicero pleasauntly sayd, come, let vs make haist, and be gone thither, before his Consulshippe come out. Furthermore, Cæsar being borne to attempt all great enterprises, & hauing an ambitious desire besides to coeuct great honors: the prosperous good successe he had of his former conquestes bred no desire in him quietly to enioy the frutes of his labours, but rather gaue him hope of thinges to come, still kindling more and more in him, thoughts of greater enterprises, and desire of new glory, as if that which he had present, were stale and nothing worth. This humor of his was no other but an emulation with him selfe as with an other man, and a certaine contention to overcome the thinges he prepared to attempt. For he was determined, & made preparacion also, to make warre with the PERSIANS. Then when he had overcome them, to passe through HYRCANIA (compassing in the sea Caspium, and mount Caucasus) into the realme of PONTVS, and so to inuade SCYTHIA: and ouerrunning all the contries, and people adioyning vnto high GERMANY, and GERMANY it selfe, at length to returne by GAULE into ITALIE, and so to enlarge the ROMANE Empire round, that it might be euery way compassed in with the great sea Oceanum. But whilst he was preparing for this voiage, he attempted to cut the barre of the straight of PELOPONNESVS, in the place where the city of CORINTH standeth. Then he was minded to bring the riuers of Anienus and Tiber, straight from ROME, vnto the citie of TRÆNES, with a deepe channell and high bankes cast vp on either side, and so to fall into the sea at TERRACINA, for the better safety and commodity of the marchants that came to ROME to trafficke there. Furthermore, he determined to draine and seawe all the water of the marishes betwixt the cities of NOMENTVM and SETIVM, to make it firme land, for the benefit of many thousandes of people: and on the sea coast next vnto ROME, to cast great high bankes, and to cleanse all the haueu about OSTIA, of rockes and stones hidden vnder the water, and to take away all other impediments that made the harborough dangerous for for shippes, and to make new hauens and arsenalls meete to harbor such shippes, as did continually trafficke thither. All these thinges were purposed to be done, but tooke no effecte. But, the ordinance of the kalender, and reformation of the yeare, to take away all confusion of time, being exactly calculated by the Mathematicians, and brought to perfection, was a great commoditie vnto all men. For the ROMANES vying then the ancient computation of the yeare, had not only such incertainty and alteration of the moneth and times, that the sacrifices and yearly feasts came by lide and lide to seasons contrary for the purpose they were ordained: but also in the reuolution of the sunne (which is called Annus Solaris) no other nation agreed with them in account: and of the ROMANES them selues, only the priests vnderstood it. And therefore when they listed, they sodainly (no man being able to controll them) did thrust in a moneth, about their ordinary number, of which they called in old time, * Mercedonius. Some say, that Numa Pompilius was the first, that deuised this way, to put a moneth betwene: but it was a weake remedy, and did litle helpe the correction of the errors that were made in the account of the yeare, to frame them to perfection. But Cæsar committing this matter vnto the Philosophers, and best expert Mathematicians at that time, did set forth an excellent and perfect kalender, more exactly calculated, then any other that was before: the which the ROMANES doe vse vntill this present day, and doe nothing erre as others, in the difference of time. But his enemies notwithstanding that enuid his greatnes, did not sticke to finde fault withall. As Cicero the Orator, when one sayd, to morow the starre Lyra will rise, sayd he, at the commaundement of Cæsar, as if men were compelled so to say and thinke, by Cæsar edict. But the chiefeft cause that made him mortally hated, was the couetous desire he had to be called king: which first gaue the people iust cause, and next his secret enemies, honest colour to beare him ill will. This notwithstanding, they that procured him this honor and dignity, gaue it out among the people, that it was written in the Sybilline prophecies, how the ROMANES might overcome the PARTHIANES, if they made warre with them, and were led by a king, but otherwise that they were vnconquerable. And furthermore they were so bold besides, that Cæsar returning to ROME from the citie of ALBA, when they came to salute him, they called him king. But the people being offended, and Cæsar also angry, he said he was not called king, but Cæsar. Then euery man keeping silence, he went his way heauy and sorrowfull. When they had decreed diuers honors for him in the Senate, the Consuls and Prætors accompanied with the whole assembly of the Senate, went vnto him in the market place, where he was set by the pulpit for orations, to tell him what honors they had decreed for him in his absence. But he sitting still in his maiesty, disdainning to rise vp vnto them when they came in, as if they had bene priuate men, answered them: that his honors had more neede to be cut of, then enlarged. This did not onely offend the Senate, but the common people also, to see that he should so lightly esteeme of the Magistrates of the common wealth: in somuch as euery man that might lawfully goe his way, departed thence very sorrowfully. Thereupon also Cæsar rising, departed home to his house, and tearing open his doublet collar, making his necke bare, he cried out aloud to his frendes, that his throte was ready to offer to any man that would come and cut it. Norwithstanding, it is reported, that afterwarde to excuse this folly, he imputed it to his dis ease, saying, that their wittes are not perfit which haue his dis ease of the falling euil, when standing of their feete they speake to the common people, but are soome troubled with a trembling of their body, and a sodaine dimmes and guidines. But that was not true. For he would haue risen vp to the Senate, but Cornelius Balbus one of his frendes (but rather a flatterer) would not let him, saying: what, doe you not remember that you are Cæsar, and will you not let them reuerence you, and doe their duties? Besides these occasions and offences, there followed also his shame and reproache, abusing the Tribunes of the people in this sorte. At that time, the feast Lupercalia was celebrated, the which in olde time men say was the feast of shepheards or heard men, and is much like vnto the feast of the LYCAIANS in ACADIA. But howsoever it is, that day there are diuers noble mens sonnes, young men, (and some of them Magistrates them selues that gouerne them) which run naked through the city, striking in sport them they meete in their way, with leather thonges, beare and all on, to make them geue place. And many noble women, and gentle women also, goe of purpose to stand in their way, and doe put forth their hands to be striken, as schoolers hold themselves to their schoolemaster, to be striken with the ferula: perfwading them selves that being with childe, they shall haue good deliuerie, and also being barren, that it will make them to conceiue with child. Cæsar fate to beholde that sport upon the pulpit for orations, in a chayer of gold, appareled in triumphing manner. Antonius, who was Consul at that time, was one of them that ranne this holy course. So when he came into the market place, the people made a lane for him to runne at libertie, and he came to Cæsar, and presented him a Diademe wreathed about with laurell. Whereupon there rose a certaine crie of reioicing, not very great, done onely by a few, appointed for the purpose. But when Cæsar refused the Diademe, then all the people together made an outcrie of ioy. Then Antonius offering it him againe, there was a second shout of ioy, but yet of a few. But whē Cæsar refused it againe the second time, then all the whole people shewed. Cæsar hauing made this prooffe, found that the people did not like of it, and thereupon rose out of his chayer, and commaunded the crowne to be carried vnto Iupiter in the Capitoll. After that, there were set vp images of Cæsar in the city with Diademes vpon their heades, like kinges. Those, the two Tribunes, Flavius and Martius, went and pulled downe: and furthermore, meeting with them that first saluted Cæsar as king, they committed them to prison. The people followed them reioicing at it, and called them Brutes: because of Brutus, who had in old time driuen the kings out of Rome, & that brought the kingdom of one person, vnto the gouernment of the Senate and people. Cæsar was so offended withall, that he depriued Martius and Flavius of their Tribuneshippes, and accusing them, he spake also against the people, and called them Bruti, and Cumani, to witte, beasts, and fooles. Hereupon the people went straight vnto Marcus Brutus, who from his father came of the first Brutus, and by his mother, of the house of the Servilians, a noble house as any was in Rome, and was also nephew and sonne in law of Marcus Cato. Notwithstanding, the great honors and fauor Cæsar shewed vnto him, kept him backe that of him selfe alone, he did not conspire nor consent to depose him of his kingdom. For Cæsar did not onely saue his life, after the battell of Pharsalia when Pompey fled, and did at his request also saue many more of his frendes besides: but furthermore, he put a maruelous confidence in him. For he had already preferred him to the Prætorshippe for that yeare, and furthermore was appointed to be Consul, the fourth yeare after that, hauing through Cæsars frendshippe, obtained it before Cassius, who likewise made sute for the same: and Cæsar also, as it is reported, sayd in this contention, in deede Cassius hath alleged best reason, but yet shall he not be chosen before Brutus. Some one day accusing Brutus while he practised this conspiracy, Cæsar would not heare of it, but clapping his hande on his bodie, told them, Brutus will looke for this skinne: meaning thereby, that Brutus for his vertue, deferred to rule after him, but yet, that for ambitions sake, he would not shewe him selfe vnthankfull nor dishonorable. Nowe they that desired chaunge, and wished Brutus only their Prince and Gouernour aboue all other: they durst not come to him them selves to tell him what they would haue him to doe, but in the night did cast sundrie papers into the Prætors seate where he gaue audience, and the most of them to this effect. Thou sleepest Brutus, and art not Brutus in deede. Cassius finding Brutus ambitious flurred vp the more by these seditious billes, did pricke him forward, and egge him on the more, for a priuate quarrell he had conceiued against Cæsar: the circumstance whereof, we haue sette downe more at large in Brutus life. Cæsar also had Cassius in great gelouzie, and suspected him much: whereupon he sayed on a time to his frendes, what will Cassius doe, thinke ye? I like not his pale lookes. An other time when Cæsars frendes complained vnto him of Antonius, and Dolabella, that they pretended some mischief towards him: he answered them againe, as for those fatte men and smooth comed heades, & he, I neuer reckon of them: but these pale visaged and carian leane people, I feare them most, meaning Brutus and Cassius. Certainly, defense may easier be foreseene, then auoyded: considering the strange & wonderful signes that were sayd to be seene before Cæsars death. For, touching the fires in the element, and spirites running vp and downe in the night, and also these solitarie birdes to be seene at noone dayes sittinge in the great market place: are not all these signes perhappes worth the noting, in such a wonderfull chaunce as happened. But Strabo the Philosopher wryteth,

A wryeth, that diuers men were seene going vp and downe in fire: and furthermore, that there was a floue of the souldiers, that did cast a maruelous burning flame out of his hande, inso much as they that saw it, thought he had bene burnt, but when the fire was out, it was found he had no hurt. Cæsar selfe also doing sacrifice vnto the goddes, found that one of the beastes which was sacrificed had no hart: and that was a strange thing in nature, how a beast could liue without a hart. Furthermore, there was a certaine Soothsayer that had geuen Cæsar warning long time afore, to take heede of the day of the Ides of Marche, (which is the fifteenth of the moneth) for on that day he shoulde be in great danger. That day beng come, Cæsar going vnto the Senate house, and speaking merily to the Soothsayer, tolde him, the Ides of Marche be come: so be they, softly answered the Soothsayer, but yet are they not past. And the very day before, Cæsar supping with Marcus Lepidus, sealed certaine letters as he was wont to do at the bord: so talke falling out amongst them, reasoning what death was best: he preuenting their opinions, cried out alowde, death vnlooked for. Then going to bedde the same night as his manner was, and lying with his wife Calpurnia, all the windowes and dores of his chamber flying open, the noyse awooke him, and made him affrayed when he saw such light but more, when he heard his wife Calpurnia, being fast a sleepe, weepe and sigh, and put forth many fumbling lamentable speeches. For she dreamed that Cæsar was slaine; and that she had him in her armes. Others also doe denie that she had any such dreame, as amongst other, Titus Livius wryteth, that it was in this sorte. The Senate hauing set vpon the topp of Cæsars house, for an ornament and setting forth of the same, a certaine pinnacle: Calpurnia dreamed that she sawe it broken downe, and that she thought she lamented and wept for it. Inso much that Cæsar rising in the morning, he prayed him if it were possible, not to goe out of the dores that day, but to adorne the session of the Senate, vntill an other day. And if that he made no reckoning of her dreame, yet that he would seache further of the Soothsayers by their sacrifices, to knowe what should happen him that day. Thereby it seemed that Cæsar likewise did feare and suspect somewhat, because his wife Calpurnia vntill that time, was neuer geuen to any feare or supersticion: and then, for that he saw her so troubled in minde with this dreame she had. But much more afterwards, when the Soothsayers hauing sacrificed many beastes one after an other, tolde him that none did like them: then he determined to sende Antonius to adorne the session of the Senate. But in the meane time came Decimus Brutus, surnamed Albinus, in whom Cæsar put such confidence, that in his last will and testament he had appointed him to be his next heire, and yet was of the conspiracie with Cassius and Brutus: he feareing that if Cæsar did adorne the session that day, the conspiracie would out, laughed the Soothsayers to scorn, and reprovved Cæsar, saying: that he gaue the Senate occasion to mislike with him, and that they might thinke he mocked them, considering that by his commaundement they were assembled, and that they were readie willingly to graunt him all thinges, and to proclaime him king of all the prouinces of the Empire of Rome out of Italy, and that he should weare his Diademe in all other places, both by sea and land. And furthermore, that if any man should tell them from him, they should departe for that present time, and returne againe when Calpurnia shoulde haue better dreames: what would his enemies and ill willers say, and how could they like of his frendes wordes? And who could perswade them otherwise, but that they would thinke his dominion a slaerie vnto them, and tyrannicall in him selfe? And yet if it be so, sayd he, that you vterly mislike of this day, it is better that you goe your selfe in person, and saluting the Senate, to dismisse them till an other time. Therewithall he tooke Cæsar by the hand, and brought him out of his house. Cæsar was not gone farre from his house, but a bondman, a stranger, did what he could to speake with him: and when he sawe he was put backe by the great prease and multitude of people that followed him, he went straight vnto his house, and put him selfe into Calpurnias handes to be kept, till Cæsar came backe againe, telling her that he had great matters to imparte vnto him. And one Artemidorus also borne in the life of GNIDUS, a Doctor of Rethorike in the Greeke tongue, who by meanes of his profession was verie familiar with certaine of Brutus confederates, and therefore knew the most parte of all their practises against Cæsar: came & brought him a litle bill wrytten with his owne hand, of all that he ment to tell him. He marking howe

Decimus Brutus Albinus, perfidious to Cæsar.

Decimus Brutus brought Cæsar into the Senate house. The tokens of the conspiracy against Cæsar.

Cæsar receiued all the supplications that were offered him, and that he gaue them straight to his men that were about him, pressed neerer to him, and sayd: Cæsar, reade this memoriall to your selfe, and that quickly, for they be matters of great waight and touche you neere. Cæsar tooke it of him, but could neuer reade it, though he many times attempted it, for the number of people that did salute him: but holding it still in his hande, keeping it to him selfe, went on withall into the Senate house. Howbeit other are of opinion, that it was found man else that gaue him that memoriall, and not Artemidorus, who did what he could all the way as he went to geue it Cæsar, but he was always repulged by the people. For these things, they may seeme to come by chance: but the place where the murder was prepared, and where the Senate were assembled, and where also there stood vpon an image of Pompey dedicated by him selfe amongst other ornaments which he gaue vnto the Theater: all these be manifest proofes that it was the ordinance of some god, that made this treason to be executed, specially in that verie place. It is also reported, that Cassius (though otherwise he did fauour the doctrine of Epicurus) beholding the image of Pompey, before they entered into the action of their traitorous enterprise: he did softly call vpon it, to aide him. But the instant dainger of the present time, taking away his former reason, did sodainly put him into a furious passion, and made him like a man halfe besides him selfe. Now Antonius, that was a faithful frende to Cæsar, and a valiant man besides of his handes, him, Decius Brutus Albinus entertained out of the Senate house, hauing begon a long tale of set purpose. So Cæsar comming into the house, all the Senate stood vpon on their feete to doe him honor. Then parte of Brutus companie and confederates stood rounde about Cæsar's chayer, and parte of them also came towards him, as though they made sute with Metellus Cimber, to call home his brother againe from banishment: and thus prosecuting still their sute, they followed Cæsar, till he was let in his chayer. Who, denying their petitions, and being offended with them one after an other, because the more they were denied, the more they pressed vpon him, and were the earnestest with him: Metellus at length, taking his gowne with both his handes, pulled it ouer his necke, which was the signe geuen the confederates to sette upon him. Then Cæsar behinde him strake him in the necke with his sword, howbeit the wounde was not great nor mortall, bicause it seemed, the feare of such a deuillish attempt did amaze him, and take his strength from him, that he killed him not at the first blowe. But Cæsar turning straight vnto him, caught hold of his sword, and held it hard: and they both cried out, Cæsar in Latin: O vile traitor Cæsa, what doest thou? And Cæsa in Greeke to his brother, brother, helpe me. At the beginning of this sturre, they that were present, not knowing of the conspiracie were so amazed with the horrible sight they sawe: that they had no power to flie, neither to helpe him, nor so much, as once to make any outcrie. They on thother side that had conspired his death, compassed him in on euerie side with their swordes drawn in their handes, that Cæsar turned him no where, but he was stricken at by some, and still had naked swordes in his face, and was hacked and mangled amonge them, as a wilde beaste taken of hunters. For it was agreed amonge them, that euery man should geue him a wound, bicause all their partes should be in this murder: and then Brutus him selfe gaue him one wounde about his priuities. Men reporte also, that Cæsar did still defende him selfe against the rest, running euerie waye with his bodie: but when he sawe Brutus with his sword drawn in his hande, then he pulled his gowne ouer his heade, and made no more resistance, and was driuen either casually, or purposely, by the counsell of the conspirators, against the base whereupon Pompeys image stood, which ranne all of a goare bloude, till he was slaine. Thus it seemed, that the image tooke iust reuenge of Pompeys enemy, being thrown downe on the ground at his feete, and yielding vp his ghost there, for the number of woundes he had vpon him. For it is reported, that he had three and twenty woundes upon his body: and diuers of the conspirators did hurt them selues, striking one body with so many blowes. When Cæsar was slaine, the Senate (though Brutus stood in the middelt amongst them as though he would haue sayd fowmhat touching this fact) presently ran out of the house, and flying, filled all the city with maruelous feare and tumult. Insomuch as some did shut to their doores, others forsooke their shops & warehouses, and others ranne to the place to see what the matter was: and others also that had feared it, ran

A ran home to their houses againe. But Antonius and Lepidus, which were two of Cæsar's chiefest friends, secretly conueyng them selues away, fled into other mens houses, and forsooke their owne. Brutus and his confederates on thother side, being yet hotte with this murder, they had committed, hauing their swordes drawn in their hands, came all in a troupe together out of the Senate, and went into the market place, not as men that made couinenances to flie, but otherwise boldly holding vp their heades like men of corage, and called to the people to defende their libertie, and stayed to speake with euery great personage whom they met in their way. Of them, some followed this troupe, and went amongst them, as if they had bene of the conspiracie, and falsely challenged parte of the honor with them: amonge them was Caius Octavius, and Lentulus Spinther. But both of them were afterwards put to death, for their valie & couetousnes of honor, by Antonius, and Octavius Cæsar the younger: and yet had no parte of that honor for the which they were put to death, neither did any man beleue that they were any of the confederates, or of counsell with them. For they that did put them to death, tooke reuenge rather of the will they had to offend, then of any fact they had committed. The next morning, Brutus and his confederates came into the market place to speake vnto the people, who gaue them such audience, that it seemed they neither greatly reprobred, nor allowed the fact: for by their great silence they showed, that they were sorry for Cæsar's death, and also that they did reuerence Brutus. Nowe the Senate graunted generall pardon for all that was past, and to pacifie euery man, ordained besides, that Cæsar's funerals should be honored as a god, and established all things that he had done: and gaue certaine promises also, and conuenient honors vnto Brutus and his confederates, whereby euery man thought all things were brought to good peace & quiemes againe. But when they had opened this testamēt, and found a liberall legacie of money, bequeathed vnto euery citizen of Rome, and that they saw his body (which was brought into the market place) all bemangled with gashes of swordes: then there was no order to keepe the multitude and common people quiet, but they plucked vp formes, tables, and stools, and layed them all about the body, & setting them a fire, burnt the corse. Then when the fire was well kindled, they tooke the firebrandes, and went vnto their houses that had slaine Cæsar, to set them a fire. Other also ranne vp and downe the cite to see if they could meete with any of them, to cut them in peeces: howbeit they could meete with neuer a man of them, bicause they had locked them selues vp safely in their houses.

D There was one of Cæsar's friends called Cinna, that had a maruelous strange & terrible dreame the night before. He dreamed that Cæsar had him to supper, & that he refused, and would not goe: then that Cæsar tooke him by the hand, and led him against his will. Now Cinna hearing at that time, that they burnt Cæsar's body in the market place, notwithstanding that he feared his dreame, and had an agew on him besides: he went into the market place to honor his funerals. When he came thither, one of the meane sorte asked what his name was? He was straight called by his name. The first man told it to an other, and that other vnto an other, so that it ranne straight through them all, that he was one of them that murdered Cæsar: (for in deede one of the traitors to Cæsar, was also called Cinna as him selfe) wherefore taking him for Cinna the murderer, they fell vpon him with such furie, that they presently dispatched him in the market place. This sturre and furie made Brutus and Cassius more affrayed, then of all that was past, and therefore within fewe dayes after, they departed out of Rome: and touching their doings afterwards, and what calamity they suffered till their deatnes, we haue written it at large, in the life of Brutus. Cæsar dyed at six and fifty yeres of age: and Pompey also liued not passing foure yeres more then he. So he reaped no other frute of all his raigne & dominion, which he had so vehemently desired all his life, and pursued with such extreme daunger: but a vaine name only, and a superficial glory, that procured him the enuy and hatred of his contrie. But his great prosperitie and good fortune that fauored him all his life time, did continue afterwards in the reuenge of his death, pursuing the murderers both by sea & land, till they had not left a man more to be executed, of all them that were actors or counsellors in the conspiracy of his death. Furthermore, of all the chaunces that happen vnto men vpon the earth, that which came to Cassius about all other, is most to be wondered at. For he being overcome in battell at the iorney of Philippes, slue him selfe with the same sword, with the which he

strake Caesar. Again, of signes in the element, the great comet which seuen nightes together was seene very bright after Caesars death, the eight night after was neuer scene more. Also the brightnes of the sunne was darkened, the which all that yeare through rose very pale, and shined not out, whereby it gaue but small heate: therefore the ayer being very cloudy & darke, by the weakenes of the heate that could not come forth, did cause the earth to bring forth but raw and vnripe frute, which rotted before it could ripe. But aboue all, the ghost that appeared vnto Brutus shewed plainly, that the goddes were offended with the murder of Caesar. The vision was thus. Brutus being ready to passe ouer his army from the citie of Arduos, to the other coast lying directly against it, slept euery night (as his manner was) in his tent, and being yet awake, thinking of his affaires: (for by reporte he was as carefull a Captaine, and liued with as litle sleepe, as euer man did) he thought he heard a noyse at his tent dore, & looking towards the light of the lampe that waxed very dimme, he saw a horrible vision of a man, of a wonderfull greatnes, and dreadfull looke, which at the first made him maruelously afraid. But when he sawe that it did him no hurt, but stood by his bedde side, and sayd nothing: at length he asked him what he was. The image answered him: I am thy ill angell, Brutus, and thou shalt see me by the citie of Philippes. Then Brutus replied againe, and sayd: well, I shall see thee then. Therewithall, the spirit presently vanished from him. After that time Brutus being in battell neere vnto the citie of Philippes, against Antonius and Octavius Caesar, at the first battell he wan the victorie, and ouerthrowing all them that withstood him, he draue them into young Caesars campe, which he tooke. The second battell being at hand, this spirit appeared again vnto him, but spake neuer a word. Thereupon Brutus knowing he should dye, did put him selfe to all hazard in battell, but yet fighting could not be slaine. So seeing his men put to flight and ouerthrowen, he ranne vnto a litle rocke not farre of, and there setting his swordes point to his brest, fell vpon it, and slue him selfe, but yet as it is reported, with the helpe of his friend, that dispatched him.

THE LIFE OF Phocion.

He Orator Demades on a time flourished in Athens, because in all his doings and sayings in the administration and gouernment of the common wealth, he alwayes fauored the Macedonians and Antipater: in respect whereof he was easilones compelled, both in his counsell and lawes, to preferre many things to the dishonor of his city, saying, that they must pardon him, because he gouerned the shippewracks of his contrie. This was an arrogant speache: but yet referring it to the gouernment of Phocion he sayd truly. For in dedde Demades selfe was the shippewracke of the common weale, because he liued so insolently, and gouerned so lowly. In somuch as Antipater sayd of him, after he was very old: that there was nothing left of him, no more then of a beast sacrificed, but the tongue and belly. But the vertues of Phocion, which had to fight against the cruell and bitter enemy of the time, were obscured by the calamities of Greece: that his fame was nothing so great as he deserved. For we must not credit Sophocles words, making vertue of it selfe but weake, in these verses.

When stormes of fore aduersities (o king) doe men assaile,

It dauntes their courage, cuts their combs, and makes their harts to quail.

But we must onely geue place to fortune, who when she frowneth vpon any good and vertuous men, her force is so great, that where they deserue honor and fauor, she violently heapeth false & malicious accusations against them, which maketh their vertue lame, & not of that credit which in dedde it deserueth. And yet it seemeth to many, that free cities are most cruel vnto their good citizens in time of prosperity: because they flow in wealth & live at ease, which maketh them of haughty mindes. But it is cleane contrary. For aduersity commonly maketh mens maners fower, chollericke, and very haisty: besides, slow to heare, churlish, and offended with euery litle sharpe word. For he that correcteth them that offend, seemeth to cast their aduersity in their teeth: and he that telleth them plainly of their fautes, seemeth also to despise them. For like as honnie sweete by nature, applied vnto woundes, doth bring both smart and paine: euen so, sharpe wordes, though profitable, doe bite the vnfortunate man, if they be not tempered with discrecion & curtesie. And therefore Homer the Poet calleth sweet and pleasaunt thinges μικράτα, as yeelding and not struing with contrariety, against that parte A of the minde, whereby we be angrie and froward. For euen as fore eyes doe like to looke on blacke and darke colours, and can not abide the bright and glazing: so in a city, where for want of foresight and gouernment, things goe not well, men be so diuers and vnwilling to heare of their owne fault and estate, that they had rather continue in their follie and danger, then by sharpnes of words to be rebuked and restored. So that it being impossible to amend one fault with a greater, that common wealth must be in great danger, that when it hath most nede of helpe, is loseth to receiue any: and he also hazardeth him selfe, that plainly telleth them their faulces. Like as therefore the Mathematician sayth, that the sunne doth not altogether follow the motion of the highest heauen, nor yet is moued directly contrary, but fetching a compase a litle ouerthwart, maketh an oblique circle, and by variety of approaching and departing pre- serueth all things, & kepeth the world in good temperature. Euen so, too seuerer gouernment, contrarying the peoples mindes in all things, is not good: as also it is maruelous dangerous, not to correct offenders when they offend, for feare of the peoples displeasure. But the meane, sometime to yeelde vnto the people to make them the more willing to obey, and to graunt them things of pleasure, to demand of them againe things profitable: that is a good way to gouerne men the better by. For, by gentlee meanes they are brought to doe many profitable things, when they seeke it not of them, by rigor & authority. In deede this meane is very hard to be obserued, because authority is hardly tempered with lenity. But when they meete together, there is no harmony more muscical, nor concordance more perfite then that: and therefore it is said, that thereby God doth gouerne the world, working rather a voluntary, then a forced C obedience in men. But this fault of feuerenes was in Cato the younger, for he could not fashion him selfe to the peoples maners, neither did they like him: neither did he win his estimation in the common wealth by flattering of them. And therefore Cicero sayd, that he was put by the Consulship, for that he behaued him selfe as though he liued in the common wealth deuised by Plato, & not amongst the disordered and corrupt posterity of Romulus. We thinke him A like him properly vnto vntime frute: the which though men doe take pleasure to see and wonder at, yet they eate them not. Euen so, the auncient simplicitie of Cato's maner (hauing so long time bene out of vse, & coming then to shew it selfe in that corrupt time & ill maners of the city) was in deede much praiseworthy: but yet not the conuenientest, nor the fittest for him, because it answered nor respected not the vse and maners of his time. For he found not D his contray (as Phocion did) utterly destroyed, but tossed in a dangerous tempest: & being not of authority like the pilot to take the sterne in hand, & gouerne the shippe: he tooke him selfe to tricking the failes, and preparing the racle, so to assist men of greater power. And yet being in no greater place, he so thwarted fortune (which seemed to haue sworne the ouerthrowe of the estate of Rome) that with much a doe, with great difficulty, & a long time after, she executed her malice. And yet the common wealth had almost gotten the victory of her, by meanes of Cato & his vertue: with whom I doe compare the vertue of Phocion, who yet in my opinion, were not in all things alike, neither in their honesty, nor policy of gouernment. For there is difference betwixt manhood & manhood, as there was betwixt that of Alcibiades, and that of Epaminondas: betwixt wisdom & wisdom, as betwixt that of Aristides, & that of Themistocles: & betwixt iustice & iustice, as betwixt that of Numa, & that of Agesilanus. But the vertues E of these men (to him that shall superficially regard, & slightly consider them) seeme all one in quality, in maner, & vse, both alike in temperance of curtesie with severity, & manhood with wisdom: a vigilant care for others, with presence of corage & security of mind for them selues, abhorring all filthines & corruption, & imbracing constancy & loue of iustice: that for any man to discern the difference betweene the, it requireth an excellent good wit & iudgement. Now touching Cato, euery man knoweth that he was of a noble house, as we will shew you hereafter in his life: but for Phocion, I gesse he came of no base parentage. For if he had bene the sonne of a spoonemaker, as Idomeneus testifieth: Glauippus the sonne of Hyperides, hauing in an inuective he wrote against him, reherfed all the mischiefs he could of him, he would not haue forgottē F to haue vpbraided him with his base paréage, neither he him selfe also (if that had bene true) had bene so well brought vp as he was. For when he was but a young man, he was Plato's Scholler, and

Cicero saying of Cato, that the common wealth as Rome, Cato's plain maner, became not the corrupt and fustie time.

The paréage of Phocion.

And afterwards Xenocrates scholler, in the schoole of Academia: and so, euen from his first beginning, he gaue him selfe to followe them that were learned. For as Darius writeth, neuer A THENTIAN saw him weepe nor laugh, nor washe him selfe in any common bathe, nor his hands out of his sleeues when he ware a long gowne. For when he went to the warres, he would alwaies goe afoote, and neuer wore gowne, vnles it were extreme cold: and then the souldiers to mocke him withall, would say it was a signe of a sharpe winter, when they sawe Phocion in his gowne. Nowe, though in deede he was very curteous and gentle of nature, yet he had of his familiar acquaintance. And therefore when Chares the Orator one day mocked him for the bending of his browes, and that the ATHENIANS fell in a laughter withall: My Maisters, Phocion, the bending of my browes haue done you no hurt, but the foolery and laughing of these flatterers, haue made ye oftentimes to weepe. Furthermore, his maner of speech was very profitable, for the good sentences and counsells he vttered: but it was mixed with an imperious, austere, and bitter shortnes. For as Zeno the Philosopher sayeth, that the wise man should temper his wordes with witte and reason, before he vtter them: euen so was Phocion's speech, the which in few words comprehended much matter. And thereupon it seemeth that Polyarchus SPHETTIAN sayd, that Demosthenes was an excellent Orator, but in speech, Phocion was very wittie. For like as coynes of gold or siluer, the lighter they waye, the finer they be of goodnes: euen so the excellencie of speeche consisteth in signifying much, by fewe wordes. And touching this matter, it is reported, that the Theater being full of people, Phocion walked C all alone vpon the scaffold where the players played, and was in a great muse with him selfe: whereupon, one of his friendes seeing him so in his muses, said vnto him, Surely Phocion, thy minde is occupied about somewhat. In deede so it is, sayd he: for I am thinking with my selfe, if I could abridge any thing of that I haue to say to the people. For Demosthenes selfe little esteeming all other Orators, when Phocion rose vp to speake, he would round his friendes in their eares, and told them: See, the cutter of my wordes riseth. Peraduenture he ment it by his maners also: For when a good man speaketh, not a word onely, but a wincke of an eye, or a nod of his head, doth counteruaile many artificiall wordes & speeches of Rethoricians. Furthermore, when he was a young man, he went to the warres vnder Capitaine Chabrias, and followed him: of whom he learned to be a perfite souldier, and in recompence thereof, he reformed many of D his Capitaines imperfections, and made him wiser then he was. For Chabrias otherwise beeing very dull and slothfull of him selfe, when he came to fight, he was so hotte and courageous, that he would thrust himselfe into danger, with the desperatest persons: & therefore for his rashnes, it afterwards cost him his life, in the cite of Chio, where launching out with his gally before the rest, he pressed to land in despite of his enemies. But Phocion being wise to loke to him selfe, and very quicke to execute: on the one side quickened Chabrias slownes, and on the other side also, by wisdom cooled his heate and furie. Chabrias therefore, being a good man & curteous, loued Phocion very well, and did preferre him in matters of seruice, making him famous amongst the GRECIANS, and employed him in his hardiest enterprises. For by his meanes he achieved great fame and honor in a battell by sea, which he wanne by the Ile of Naxos, E giuing him the left winge of his armie: on which side the fight was sharpest of all the battell, and there he soonest put the enemies to flight. This battell being the first which the cite of ATHENS wanne with their owne men onely, after it had bene taken: gaue the people cause to loue Chabrias, and made them also to make accompt of Phocion, as of a noble souldier, & worthy to haue charge. This victory was gotten on the feast day of the great misteries, in memory whereof, Chabrias did yearly, on the sixteenth day of the moneth Boedromion (now called August) make all the people of ATHENS drinke. After that time, Chabrias sending Phocion to receive the tribute of the Ilanders, their confederats, and the shippes which they should send him: he gaue him twenty gallies to bringe him thither. But Phocion then (as it is reported) said vnto him: if he sent him to fight with his enemies, he had neede to haue moe shippes: but if he F sent him as an Ambassador vnto his friendes, then, that one shippe would serue his turne. So he went with one gallye onely: and after he had spoken with the cities, and curteously dealt with the gouernors of euery one of them, he returned backe, furnished of their confederats, XXX iiii with a great fleet of shippes and money, to cary vnto ATHENS. So Phocion did not onely inuenerence Chabrias while he liued, but after his death also he tooke great care of his friends and kinfmen, and fought to make his sonne Ctesippus, an honest man: whom, though he sawe very wilde and vntoward, yet he neuer left to reforme him, and hide his fault. It is sayde also, that when this young man did trouble him much with vaine frivolous questions, seruing then vnder him, he being Captaine, and taking vpon him to giue him counsell, to reprove him, and to teache him the dutie of a Captaine: he could not but say, O Chabrias, Chabrias: now doe I paye for the loue thou didst beare me when thou wert aloue, in bearing with the folly of thy sonne. But when he saw that the heads of the citie of ATHENS had as it were by lot deuised amonge them selues the offices of warre and peace, and that some of them, as Eubulus, Aristo-phon, Demosthenes, Lycurgus, and Hyperides were common speakers and preferers of matters in counsell and Senate: and that others, as Diopithes, Menestheus, Leosthenes, and Chares, became great men by the warres, and had charge of armies: he determined rather to follow the manner of government, of Pericles, Aristides, & Solon, as being mingled of both. For either of them, seemed (as the Poet Archilocus sayth)

To bee both Champions stout, of Mars his warlike band, And of the Muses eke, the artes to vnderstand.

He knew also, that Pallas the goddesse and protector of ATHENS, was called Polemica, and Politica: to wit, skillfull to rule both in warre and peace. So, hauing thus disposed of him selfe in government, he alwaies perswaded peace and quietnes, and yet was often chosen Captaine, and had charge of armies, being the onely man that of all the Captaines afore him, and in his time, did neuer sue for charge, neither yet refused it at any time, when he was called to serue the common wealth. It is certain that he was chosen siue and forty times Prator, and was alwaies absent at the elections, but yet sent for. Whereuppon all the wise men wondred to see the manner of the people towards him, considering that Phocion had neuer done nor sayd any thing to flatter them withall, but commonly had bene against their desires: and how they vsed other gouernours notwithstanding, that were more pleasant and delightfull in their orations, like men to sport at, as it is sayd of kings, who after they haue washed their hands to goe to their meate, doe vse to haue lessers and flatterers to make them mery: but on thother side when they had occasion of warres in deede, how then like wise men they could bethinke them selues, and choose the wisest and stowrest man of the citie, & that most would withstand their minde and desires. For on a time an oracle of Apollo Delphicus, being openly red before them, which sayd, that all the other ATHENIANS being agreed, yet there was one amongst them that was contrary to all the rest of the citie: Phocion stepping forth before them all, bad them neuer seeke further for the man, for it was he that liked none of all their doings. Another time he chaunced to say his opinion before all the people, the which they all praised and approoued: but he saw they were so fodeinly become of his minde, he turned backe to his friends, and asked them: alas, hath not some euill thing slipped my mouth vnwares? Another time a generall collection being gathered of the people at ATHENS, towards the solemnizing of a sacrifice: other men of his estate hauing payd their part, he was often also called vpon to pay his.
But he answered them againe, aske them that be rich, for it were a shame for me to giue you any thing, being yet in this mans debt: pointing to Callicles the Viceroy, who had lent him money. But when they left him not for all this, to cry out upon him for the contribution, he began to tell them this tale: that on a time there was a coward preparing to goe to the warres, and as he was ready to depart, he heard the Rauens what a crying they made, and taking it for an ill signe, he put of his harness, and kept him at home. After that he put on his harness againe, he went on his way towards the campe: the Rauens beganne againe to make a goodlier cry behind him. But thereuppon he staid straight, and at length sayd: ye shall crooke as low as ye list, before ye feede of my carcas. An other time the ATHENIANS being in warre vnder his charge, would needes haue him to leade them to giue charge vpon their enemies, but he would not: thereuppon they called him coward, and sayd he durst not. Well, sayd he againe, it is not you can make me valiant, no more then my selfe can make you cowards: and yet one of vs know an other. Another time in a maruelous dangerous time, the people handled him very

A very churlishly, and would needes haue him presently deliuer account of his charge: but he answered them, O my friends, first saue your selues. Furthermore, the people being very lowly and humble, for feare, in time of warres: and presently in peace againe waxing braue in wordes against Phocion, charging him that he had taken the victorie out of their hands: he onely sayd this to them, you are happy that haue a Captaine that knowes you, els you would tinge a new longe. Another time there was a quarrell betwixt the BOEOTIANS, and them, about their bounds and frontiers: the which they would not try by lawe, but by battell. But Ph-ocion told them, they did they wist not what, & counselled them rather to fight it out in words, in which they were the stronger, and not with weapons, where they were the weaker. Another time they so much misliked his opinion in the assembly, that they would not abide to heare him, nor suffer him to speake. Well, my Maisters, he then, you may make me doe that which is not to be done: but you shall neuer compell me, against my minde, to say that which is not to be spoken. He would as gallantly also gird the Orators his aduersaries, when they were but sie with him. As on a time he answered Demosthenes, that sayd vnto him: the people, Phocion, will kill thee one day, and if it take them in the heades. Yea thee, he, if they be wise. Agayne, when Polyechus SHERETIAN, in a hotte day perswaded the people of ATHENS to make warre with king Philip, sweating, and with much a doe fetching his breath, being a fatte man, that he was driuen oftentimes to drinke water, to ende his oration: surely sayd Phocion, ye shall doe maruelous wisely, to make warre at such a mans motion. Why, what thinke ye will he doe, when he hath his curats and his target vpon him, and that the enemies be ready to fight: that now in making an oration onely before you, which he hath studied long before, is almost tified? Another time also when Lycurgus in his oration had openly reproued him for many things before the people, and among the rest, for that Alexander demanding tenne Citizens of A-THENS to do with them what he thought good, that he had counselled them to deliuer them: Phocion answered him, I haue oftentimes counselled them for the best, but they would neuer follow my counsell. There was one Archibiades at that time in ATHENS, that counterfeited the LACEDÆMONIAN, with a maruelous long beard, a beggerly cloke, and a fower looke. Pho-cion being cheere one day before the people, appealed vnto Archibiades for a wimes, to con-firme that he spake. But he rising vp, counselled the people contrarily, to flatter them withall.
Phocion perceiuing it, tooke him by the beard, and sayd vnto him: alas Archibiades, why diddest thou not then clippe thy beard, seeing thou wouldst needes flatter? There was another great pleader, one Aristogiton, that in all assemblies of the citie, did nothing but bustle warres continually in their eares. Afterwards when men were to be leauied and mustered, and their names entered that should goe to the warres: Aristogiton came halting into the market place with a
